It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

ENTERED, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1859, by
D. APPLETON & COMPANY,
In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, December 3, 1832.

Election of President pro tem.

At 12 o'clock, the Senate was called to order by the Secretary, Mr. LOWRIE, (the VICE PRESIDENT being absent, and the President pro tempore, Mr. TAZEWELL, having resigned his seat in the Senate,) and thirty-two members appearing in their seats, and there being a quorum, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to proceed to the election of President pro tempore, which was agreed to.

The Hon. HUGH L. WHITE, of Tennessee, having received a majority of all the votes, was declared duly elected President of the Senate, pro tempore, and being conducted to the chair by Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, returned his acknowledgments to the Senate, as follows:

To the members of the Senate I tender my sincere acknowledgments for the distinguished honor conferred by their vote.

No person who has been so long a member of this body could have been selected who has made the rules of its proceedings less an object of his study. This circumstance will make my errors more numerous than might be anticipated, and will throw me oftener on the kind indulgence of the Senate.

Whatever my errors may be, I have the consolation of knowing that they can be revised and corrected at the instance of any member; and I beg every one to believe that so far from feeling hurt at the correctness of my decisions being questioned, it will be matter of gratification that the sense of the Senate may be taken in every instance when it may be supposed I am mistaken.

Whatever industry and attention can do towards removing defects in qualifications I promise shall be done, and I shall take the chair, determined that in anxious desire to do that which is just towards every member, and that which will most promote the correct discharge of the important business we may have to perform, I will not be exceeded by any who have preceded me.

On motion it was ordered that messages communicating the election of Mr. WHITE as President pro tempore, be sent to the House of Representatives, and to the President of the United States.

Messrs. GRUNDY and FRELINGHUYSEN were appointed on the Joint Committee, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the readiness of the two Houses to receive from him any communication.

TUESDAY, December 4.

The sitting to-day was occupied in receiving and reading the President's Message as follows:

Fellow Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

It gives me pleasure to congratulate you upon your return to the seat of Government, for the purpose of discharging your duties to the people of the United States. Although the pestilence which had traversed the Old World has entered our limits, and extended its ravages over much of our land, it has pleased Almighty God to mitigate its severity, and lessen the number of its victims, compared with those who have fallen in most other countries over which it has spread its terrors. Notwithstanding this visitation, our country presents, on every side, marks of prosperity and happiness, unequalled, perhaps, in any other portion of the world. If we fully appreciate our comparative condition, existing causes of discontent will appear unworthy of attention, and, with hearts of thankfulness to that Divine Being who has filled our cup of prosperity, we shall feel our resolution strengthened to preserve and hand down to posterity that liberty and that union which we have received from our fathers, and which constitute the sources and the shield of all our blessings.

The relations of our country continue to present the same picture of amicable intercourse that I had the satisfaction to hold up to your view at the opening of your last session. The same friendly professions, the same desire to participate in our flourishing commerce, the same disposition to refrain from injuries unintentionally offered, are, with few exceptions, evinced by all nations with whom we have any intercourse. This desirable state of things may be mainly ascribed to our undeviating practice of the rule which has long guided our national policy, to require no exclusive privileges in commerce, and to grant none. It is daily producing its beneficial effect, in the respect shown to our flag, the protection of our citizens and their property abroad, and in the increase of our navigation, and the extension of our mercantile operations. The returns which have been made out since we last met will show an increase during the last preceding year of more than 80,000 tons in our shipping, and of near forty millions of dollars in the aggregate of our imports and exports.

Nor have we less reason to felicitate ourselves on the position of our political than of our commercial concerns. They remain in the state in which they were when I last addressed you—a state of prosperity and peace, the effect of a wise attention to the parting advice of the revered father of his country on this subject condensed into a maxim for the use of posterity by one of his most distinguished successors, to cultivate free commerce and honest friendship with all nations, but to make entangling alliances with none. A strict adherence to this policy has kept us aloof from the perplexing questions that now agitate the European world, and have more than once deluged those countries with blood. Should those scenes unfortunately recur, the parties to the contest may count on a faithful performance of the duties incumbent on us as a neutral nation, and our citizens may equally rely on the firm assertion of their neutral rights.

With the nation that was our earliest friend and ally in the infancy of our political existence, the most friendly relations have subsisted through the late revolutions of its Government, and, from the events of the last, promise a permanent duration. It has made an approximation in some of its political institutions to our own, and raised a monarch to the throne, who preserves, it is said, a friendly recollection of the period during which he acquired among our citizens the high consideration that could then have been produced by his personal qualifications alone.

Our commerce with that nation is gradually assuming a mutually beneficial character, and the adjustment of the claims of our citizens has removed the only obstacle there was to an intercourse not only lucrative, but productive of literary and scientific improvement.

From Great Britain I have the satisfaction to inform you that I continue to receive assurances of the most amicable disposition, which have, on my part, on all proper occasions, been promptly and sincerely reciprocated. The attention of that Government has latterly been so much engrossed by matters of a deeply interesting domestic character that we could not press upon it the renewal of negotiations which had been unfortunately broken off by the unexpected recall of our Minister, who had commenced them with some hopes of success. My great object was the settlement of questions which, though now dormant, might hereafter be revived under circumstances that would endanger the good understanding which it is the interest of both parties to preserve inviolate, cemented, as it is, by a community of language, manners, and social habits, and by the high obligations we owe to our British ancestors for many of our most valuable institutions, and for that system of representative Government which has enabled us to preserve and improve them.

The question of our North-eastern boundary still remains unsettled. In my last annual Message I explained to you the situation in which I found that business on my coming into office, and the measures I thought it my duty to pursue for asserting the rights of the United States before the Sovereign who had been chosen by my predecessor to determine the question; and, also, the manner in which he had disposed of it. A special message to the Senate in their executive capacity, afterwards brought before them the question, whether they would advise a submission to the opinion of the sovereign arbiter. That body having considered the award as not obligatory, and advised me to open a further negotiation, the proposition was immediately made to the British Government: but the circumstances to which I have alluded, have hitherto prevented any answer being given to the overture. Early attention, however, has been promised to the subject, and every effort, on my part, will be made for a satisfactory settlement of this question, interesting to the Union generally, and particularly so to one of its members.

The claims of our citizens on Spain are not yet acknowledged. On a closer investigation of them than appears to have heretofore taken place, it was discovered that some of these demands, however strong they might be upon the equity of that Government, were not such as could be made the subject of national interference. And, faithful to the principle of asking nothing but what was clearly right, additional instructions have been sent to modify our demands, so as to embrace those only on which, according to the laws of nations, we had a strict right to insist. An inevitable delay in procuring the documents necessary for this review of the merits of these claims, retarded this operation, until an unfortunate malady which has afflicted his Catholic Majesty, prevented an examination of them. Being now, for the first time, presented in an unexceptionable form, it is confidently hoped the application will be successful.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the application I directed to be made for the delivery of a part of the archives of Florida, which had been carried to the Havana, has produced a royal order for their delivery, and that measures have been taken to procure its execution.

By the report of the Secretary of State, communicated to you on the 25th of June last, you were informed of the conditional reduction obtained by the Minister of the United States at Madrid, of the duties on tonnage levied on American shipping in the ports of Spain. The condition of that reduction having been complied with on our part, by the act passed the 13th of July last, I have the satisfaction to inform you that our ships now pay no higher nor other duties in the continental ports of Spain than are levied on their national vessels.

The demands against Portugal for illegal captures in the blockade of Terceira, have been allowed to the full amount of the accounts presented by the claimants, and payment was promised to be made in three instalments. The first of these has been paid; the second, although due, had not, at the date of our last advices, been received, owing, it was alleged, to embarrassments in the finances, consequent on the civil war in which that nation is engaged.

The payments stipulated by the Convention with Denmark have been punctually made, and the amount is ready for distribution among the claimants, as soon as the Board now sitting shall have performed their functions.

I regret that, by the last advices from our Chargé d'Affaires at Naples, that Government had still delayed the satisfaction due to our citizens; but at that date the effect of the last instructions was not known. Despatches from thence are hourly expected, and the result will be communicated to you without delay.

With the rest of Europe our relations, political and commercial, remain unchanged. Negotiations are going on, to put on a permanent basis the liberal system of commerce now carried on between us and the Empire of Russia. The treaty concluded with Austria is executed by His Imperial Majesty with the most perfect good faith; and, as we have no diplomatic agent at his court, he personally inquired into, and corrected, a proceeding of some of his subaltern officers, to the injury of our Consul in one of his ports.

Our treaty with the Sublime Porte is producing its expected effects on our commerce. New markets are opening for our commodities, and a more extensive range for the employment of our ships. A slight augmentation of the duties on our commerce, inconsistent with the spirit of the treaty, had been imposed; but, on the representation of our Chargé d'Affaires, it has been promptly withdrawn, and we now enjoy the trade and navigation of the Black Sea, and of all the ports belonging to the Turkish Empire and Asia, on the most perfect equality with all foreign nations.

I wish earnestly that, in announcing to you the continuance of friendship and the increase of a profitable commercial intercourse with Mexico, with Central America, and the States of the South, I could accompany it with the assurance that they all are blessed with that internal tranquillity and foreign peace which their heroic devotion to the cause of their independence merits. In Mexico, a sanguinary struggle is now carried on, which has caused some embarrassment to our commerce; but both parties profess the most friendly disposition towards us. To the termination of this contest we look for the establishment of that secure intercourse so necessary to nations whose territories are contiguous. How important it will be to us we may calculate from the fact, that, even in this unfavorable state of things, our maritime commerce has increased, and an internal trade by caravans, from St. Louis to Santa Fe, under the protection of escorts furnished by the Government, is carried on to great advantage, and is daily increasing. The agents provided for, by the treaty with this power, to designate the boundaries which it established, have been named on our part; but one of the evils of the civil war now raging there has been that the appointment of those with whom they were to co-operate has not yet been announced to us.

The Government of Central America has expelled from its territory the party which some time since disturbed its peace. Desirous of fostering a favorable disposition towards us, which has on more than one occasion been evinced by this interesting country, I made a second attempt in this year to establish a diplomatic intercourse with them, but the death of the distinguished citizen whom I had appointed for that purpose, has retarded the execution of measures from which I hoped much advantage to our commerce. The union of the three States which formed the Republic of Colombia has been dissolved; but they all, it is believed, consider themselves as separately bound by the Treaty which was made in their federal capacity. The Minister accredited to the Federation continues in that character near the Government of New Granada, and hopes were entertained that a new Union would be formed between the separate States, at least for the purposes of foreign intercourse. Our Minister has been instructed to use his good offices, whenever they shall be desired, to produce the re-union so much to be wished, for the domestic tranquillity of the parties, and the security and facility of foreign commerce.

Some agitations, naturally attendant on an infant reign, have prevailed in the empire of Brazil, which have had the usual effect upon commercial operations; and while they suspended the consideration of claims created on similar occasions, they have given rise to new complaints on the part of our citizens. A proper consideration for calamities and difficulties of this nature has made us less urgent and peremptory in our demands for justice than duty to our fellow-citizens would, under other circumstances, have required. But their claims are not neglected, and will on all proper occasions be urged, and, it is hoped, with effect.

I refrain from making any communication on the subject of our affairs with Buenos Ayres, because the negotiation communicated to you in my last annual Message was, at the date of our last advices, still pending, and in a state that would render a publication of the details inexpedient.

A Treaty of Amity and Commerce has been formed with the Republic of Chili, which, if approved by the Senate, will be laid before you. That Government seems to be established, and at peace with its neighbors; and its ports being the resorts of our ships which are employed in the highly important trade of fisheries, this commercial convention cannot but be of great advantage to our fellow-citizens engaged in that perilous but profitable business.

Our commerce with the neighboring State of Peru, owing to the onerous duties levied on our principal articles of export, has been on the decline, and all endeavors to procure an alteration have hitherto proved fruitless. With Bolivia we have yet no diplomatic intercourse, and the continued contests carried on between it and Peru have made me defer, until a more favorable period, the appointment of any agent for that purpose.

An act of atrocious piracy having been committed on one of our trading ships by the inhabitants of a settlement on the west coast of Sumatra, a frigate was despatched with orders to demand satisfaction for the injury, if those who committed it should be found members of a regular government, capable of maintaining the usual relations with foreign nations; but if, as it was supposed, and as they proved to be, they were a band of lawless pirates, to inflict such a chastisement as would deter them and others from like aggressions. This last was done, and the effect has been an increased respect for our flag in those distant seas, and additional security for our commerce.

In the view I have given of our connection with foreign powers, allusions have been made to their domestic disturbances or foreign wars, to their revolutions or dissensions. It may be proper to observe that this is done solely in cases where those events affect our political relations with them, or to show their operation on our commerce. Further than this it is neither our policy nor our right to interfere. Our best wishes on all occasions, our good offices when required, will be afforded to promote the domestic tranquillity and foreign peace of all nations with whom we have any intercourse. Any intervention in their affairs further than this, even by the expression of an official opinion, is contrary to our principles of international policy, and will always be avoided.

The report which the Secretary of the Treasury will, in due time, lay before you, will exhibit the national finances in a highly prosperous state. Owing to the continued success of our commercial enterprise, which has enabled the merchants to fulfil their engagements with the Government, the receipts from customs during the year will exceed the estimate presented at the last session; and, with the other means of the Treasury, will prove fully adequate, not only to meet the increased expenditures resulting from the large appropriations made by Congress, but to provide for the payment of all the public debt which is at present redeemable. It is now estimated that the customs will yield to the Treasury, during the present year, upwards of twenty-eight millions of dollars. The public lands, however, have proved less productive than was anticipated, and, according to present information, will not much exceed two millions. The expenditures for all objects other than the public debt are estimated to amount, during the year, to about sixteen millions and a half, while a still larger sum, viz., eighteen millions of dollars, will have been applied to the principal and interest of the public debt.

It is expected, however, that, in consequence of the reduced rates of duty which will take effect after the 3d of March next, there will be a considerable falling off in the revenue from customs in the year 1833. It will, nevertheless, be amply sufficient to provide for all the wants of the public service, estimated even upon a liberal scale, and for the redemption and purchase of the remainder of the public debt. On the first of January next the entire public debt of the United States, funded and unfunded, will be reduced to within a fraction of seven millions of dollars, of which $2,227,868 are not of right redeemable until the 1st of January, 1834, and $4,735,296 not until the 2d of January, 1835. The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, however, being invested with full authority to purchase the debt at the market price, and the means of the Treasury being ample, it may be hoped that the whole will be extinguished within the year 1833.

I cannot too cordially congratulate Congress and my fellow-citizens on the near approach of that memorable and happy event, the extinction of the public debt of this great and free nation. Faithful to the wise and patriotic policy marked out by the Legislature of the country for this object, the present Administration has devoted to it all the means which a flourishing commerce has supplied, and a prudent economy preserved, for the public Treasury. Within the four years for which the people have confided the Executive power to my charge, fifty-eight millions of dollars will have been applied to the payment of the public debt. That this has been accomplished without stinting the expenditures for all other proper objects, will be seen by referring to the liberal provision made during the same period for the support and increase of our means of maritime and military defence, for internal improvements of a national character, for the removal and preservation of the Indians, and lastly, for the gallant veterans of the Revolution.

The final removal of this great burden from our resources, affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defence which the constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for them. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury it will be seen that after the present year such a reduction may be made to a considerable extent; and the subject is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in the hope that the combined wisdom of the Representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall unequally upon any, and as may promote all the great interests of the community.

Long and patient reflection has strengthened the opinions I have heretofore expressed to Congress on this subject, and I deem it my duty, on the present occasion, again to urge them upon the attention of the Legislature. The soundest maxims of public policy, and the principles upon which our Republican institutions are founded, recommend a proper adaptation of the revenue to the expenditure, and they also require that the expenditure shall be limited to what, by an economical administration, shall be consistent with the simplicity of the Government, and necessary to an efficient public service. In effecting this adjustment it is due, in justice to the interests of the different States, and even to the preservation of the Union itself, that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war. If, upon investigation, it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to any particular interest is greater than is indispensably requisite for these objects, I recommend that it be gradually diminished, and that, as far as may be consistent with these objects, the whole scheme of duties be reduced to the revenue standard as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will permit.

That manufactures adequate to the supply of our domestic consumption would, in the abstract, be beneficial to our country, there is no reason to doubt; and to effect their establishment, there is perhaps, no American citizen who would not, for a while, be willing to pay a higher price for them. But, for this purpose, it is presumed that a tariff of high duties, designed for perpetual protection, has entered into the minds of but few of our statesmen. The most they have anticipated is a temporary and generally incidental protection, which they maintain has the effect to reduce the price, by domestic competition, below that of the foreign article. Experience, however, our best guide on this as on other subjects, makes it doubtful whether the advantages of this system are not counterbalanced by many evils, and whether it does not tend to beget, in the minds of a large portion of our countrymen, a spirit of discontent and jealousy dangerous to the stability of the Union.

What then shall be done? Large interests have grown up under the implied pledge of our National Legislation, which it would seem a violation of public faith suddenly to abandon. Nothing could justify it but the public safety, which is the supreme law. But those who have vested their capital in manufacturing establishments cannot expect that the people will continue permanently to pay high taxes for their benefit when the money is not required for any legitimate purpose in the administration of the Government. Is it not enough that the high duties have been paid as long as the money arising from them could be applied to the common benefit in the extinguishment of the public debt?

Those who take an enlarged view of the condition of our country must be satisfied that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war. Within this scope, on a reasonable scale, it is recommended, by every consideration of patriotism and duty, which will doubtless always secure to it a liberal and efficient support. But beyond this object we have already seen the operation of the system productive of discontent. In some sections of the Republic its influence is deprecated as tending to concentrate wealth into a few hands, and as creating those germs of dependence and vice which in other countries have characterized the existence of monopolies, and proved so destructive of liberty and the general good. A large portion of the people in one section of the Republic declares it not only inexpedient on these grounds, but as disturbing the equal relations of property by legislation, and therefore unconstitutional and unjust.

Doubtless, these effects are, in a great degree, exaggerated, and may be ascribed to a mistaken view of the considerations which led to the adoption of the tariff system; but they are nevertheless important in enabling us to review the subject with a more thorough knowledge of all its bearings upon the great interests of the republic, and with a determination to dispose of it so that none can with justice complain.

It is my painful duty to state, that, in one quarter of the United States, opposition to the revenue laws has risen to a height which threatens to thwart their execution, if not to endanger the integrity of the Union. Whatever obstructions may be thrown in the way of the judicial authorities of the General Government, it is hoped they will be able peaceably to overcome them by the prudence of their own officers and the patriotism of the people. But should this reasonable reliance on the moderation and good sense of all portions of our fellow-citizens be disappointed, it is believed that the laws themselves are fully adequate to the suppression of such attempts as may be immediately made. Should the exigency arise, rendering the execution of the existing laws impracticable from any cause whatever, prompt notice of it will be given to Congress, with the suggestion of such views and measures as may be deemed necessary to meet it.

In conformity with principles heretofore explained, and with the hope of reducing the General Government to that simple machine which the constitution created, and of withdrawing from the States all other influence than that of its universal beneficence in preserving peace, affording a uniform currency, maintaining the inviolability of contracts, diffusing intelligence, and discharging unfelt its other superintending functions, I recommend that provision be made to dispose of all stocks now held by it in corporations, whether created by the General or State Governments, and placing the proceeds in the Treasury. As a source of profit, these stocks are of little or no value: as a means of influence among the States, they are adverse to the purity of our institutions. The whole principle on which they are based, is deemed by many unconstitutional; and to persist in the policy which they indicate is considered wholly inexpedient.

It is my duty to acquaint you with an arrangement made by the Bank of the United States with a portion of the holders of the three per cent. stock, by which the Government will be deprived of the use of the public funds longer than was anticipated. By this arrangement, which will be particularly explained by the Secretary of the Treasury, a surrender of the certificates of this stock may be postponed until October, 1833; and thus the liability of the Government, after its ability to discharge the debt, may be continued by the failure of the Bank to perform its duties.

Such measures as are within the reach of the Secretary of the Treasury have been taken to enable him to judge whether the public deposits in that institution may be regarded as entirely safe; but, as his limited power may prove inadequate to this object, I recommend the subject to the attention of Congress, under the firm belief that it is worthy of their serious investigation. An inquiry into the transactions of the institution, embracing the branches as well as the principal Bank, seems called for by the credit which is given throughout the country to many serious charges, impeaching its character, and which, if true, may justly excite the apprehension that it is no longer a safe depository of the money of the people.

Among the interests which merit the consideration of Congress, after the payment of the public debt, one of the most important, in my view, is that of the public lands. Previous to the formation of our present constitution, it was recommended by Congress that a portion of the waste lands owned by the States should be ceded to the United States, for the purposes of general harmony, and as a fund to meet the expenses of the war. The recommendation was adopted, and, at different periods of time, the States of Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, granted their vacant soil for the uses for which they had been asked. As the lands may now be considered as relieved from this pledge, the object for which they were ceded having been accomplished, it is in the discretion of Congress to dispose of them in such a way as best to conduce to the quiet, harmony, and general interest of the American people. In examining this question, all local and sectional feelings should be discarded, and the whole United States regarded as one people, interested alike in the prosperity of their common country.

It cannot be doubted that the speedy settlement of these lands constitutes the true interests of the Republic. The wealth and strength of a country are its population, and the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are everywhere the basis of society, and true friends of liberty.

In addition to these considerations, questions have already arisen, and may be expected hereafter to grow out of the public lands, which involve the rights of the new States and the powers of the General Government; and, unless a liberal policy be now adopted, there is danger that these questions may speedily assume an importance not now generally anticipated. The influence of a great sectional interest, when brought into full action, will be found more dangerous to the harmony and union of the States, than any other cause of discontent; and it is the part of wisdom and sound policy to foresee its approaches, and to endeavor, if possible, to counteract them.

Of the various schemes which have been hitherto proposed in regard to the disposal of the public lands, none has yet received the entire approbation of the National Legislature. Deeply impressed with the importance of a speedy and satisfactory arrangement of the subject, I deem it my duty, on this occasion, to urge it upon your consideration, and, to the propositions which have been heretofore suggested by others, to contribute those reflections which have occurred to me, in the hope that they may assist you in your future deliberations.

It seems to me to be our true policy, that the public lands shall cease as soon as practicable to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compact. The advantages of accurate surveys and undoubted titles, now secured to purchasers, seem to forbid the abolition of the present system, because none can be substituted which will more perfectly accomplish these important ends. It is desirable, however, that in convenient time this machinery be withdrawn from the States, and that the right of soil, and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the States respectively in which it lies.

The adventurous and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their equal share of taxation, under our import system, have, in the progress of our Government, for the land they occupy, paid into the Treasury a large proportion of forty millions of dollars; and of the revenue received therefrom, but a small part has been expended amongst them. When, to the disadvantage of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor alone which gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from their sale are distributed chiefly among States which had not originally any claim to them, and which have employed the undivided emoluments arising from the sale of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause, to put an end forever to all partial and interested legislation on the subject, and to afford to every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands.

In former Messages I have expressed my conviction that the constitution does not warrant the application of the funds of the General Government to objects of internal improvement which are not national in their character, and, both as a means of doing justice to all interests, and putting an end to a course of legislation calculated to destroy the purity of the Government, have urged the necessity of reducing the whole subject to some fixed and certain rule. As there never will occur a period, perhaps, more propitious than the present to the accomplishment of this object, I beg leave to press the subject again upon your attention.

Without some general and well-defined principles ascertaining those objects of internal improvement to which the means of the nation may be constitutionally applied, it is obvious that the exercise of the power can never be satisfactory. Besides the danger to which it exposes Congress, of making hasty appropriations to works of the character of which they may be frequently ignorant, it promotes a mischievous and corrupting influence upon elections, by holding out to people the fallacious hope that the success of a certain candidate will make navigable their neighboring creek or river, bring commerce to their doors, and increase the value of their property. It thus favors combinations to squander the Treasury of the country upon a multitude of local objects, as fatal to just legislation as to the purity of public men.

If a system compatible with the constitution cannot be devised, which is free from such tendencies, we should recollect that that instrument provides within itself the mode of its amendment; and that there is, therefore, no excuse for the assumption of doubtful powers by the General Government. If those which are clearly granted shall be found incompetent to the ends of its creation, it can, at any time, apply for their enlargement; and there is no probability that such an application, if founded on the public interest, will ever be refused. If the propriety of the proposed grant be not sufficiently apparent to command the assent of three-fourths of the States, the best possible reason why the power should not be assumed on doubtful authority is afforded; for if more than one-fourth of the States are unwilling to make the grant, its exercise will be productive of discontents which will far overbalance any advantages that could be derived from it. All must admit that there is nothing so worthy of the constant solicitude of this Government, as the harmony and union of the people.

Being solemnly impressed with the conviction that the extension of the power to make internal improvements beyond the limit I have suggested, even if it be deemed constitutional, is subversive of the best interests of our country, I earnestly recommend to Congress to refrain from its exercise, in doubtful cases, except in relation to improvements already begun, unless they shall first procure from the States such an amendment of the constitution as will define its character and prescribe its bounds. If the States feel competent to these objects, why should this Government wish to assume the power? If they do not, then they will not hesitate to make the grant. Both Governments are the Governments of the people: improvements must be made with the money of the people; and if the money can be collected and applied by those more simple and economical political machines, the State Governments, it will unquestionably be safer and better for the people, than to add to the splendor, the patronage, and the power of the General Government. But if the people of the several States think otherwise, they will amend the constitution, and in their decision all ought cheerfully to acquiesce.

For a detailed and highly satisfactory view of the operations of the War Department, I refer you to the accompanying report of the Secretary of War.

The hostile incursions of the Sac and Fox Indians necessarily led to the interposition of the Government. A portion of the troops, under Generals Scott and Atkinson, and of the militia of the State of Illinois, were called into the field. After a harassing warfare, prolonged by the nature of the country and by the difficulty of procuring subsistence, the Indians were entirely defeated, and the disaffected band dispersed or destroyed. The result has been creditable to the troops engaged in the service. Severe as is the lesson to the Indians, it was rendered necessary by their unprovoked aggressions; and it is to be hoped that its impression will be permanent and salutary.

This campaign has evinced the efficient organization of the army, and its capacity for prompt and active service. Its several departments have performed their functions with energy and despatch, and the general movement was satisfactory.

Our fellow-citizens upon the frontiers were ready, as they always are, in the tender of their services in the hour of danger. But a more efficient organization of our militia system is essential to that security which is one of the principal objects of all Governments. Neither our situation nor our institutions require or permit the maintenance of a large regular force. History offers too many lessons of the fatal result of such a measure not to warn us against its adoption here. The expense which attends it, the obvious tendency to employ it because it exists, and thus to engage in unnecessary wars, and its ultimate danger to public liberty, will lead us, I trust, to place our principal dependence for protection upon the great body of the citizens of the republic. If, in asserting rights or in repelling wrongs, war should come upon us, our regular force should be increased to an extent proportioned to the emergency, and our present small army is a nucleus around which such force could be formed and embodied. But for the purposes of defence under ordinary circumstances, we must rely upon the electors of the country. Those by whom, and for whom, the Government was instituted and supported, will constitute its protection in the hour of danger, as they do its check in the hour of safety.

But it is obvious that the militia system is imperfect. Much time is lost, much unnecessary expense incurred, and much public property wasted under the present arrangement. Little useful knowledge is gained by the musters and drills, as now established, and the whole subject evidently requires a thorough examination. Whether a plan of classification, remedying these defects, and providing for a system of instruction, might not be adopted, is submitted to the consideration of Congress. The constitution has vested in the General Government an independent authority upon the subject of the militia, which renders its action essential to the establishment or improvement of the system. And I recommend the matter to your consideration, in the conviction that the state of this important arm of the public defence requires your attention.

I am happy to inform you, that the wise and humane policy of transferring from the eastern to the western side of the Mississippi the remnants of our aboriginal tribes, with their own consent and upon just terms, has been steadily pursued, and is approaching, I trust, its consummation. By reference to the report of the Secretary of War, and to the documents submitted with it, you will see the progress which has been made since your last session, in the arrangement of the various matters connected with our Indian relations. With one exception, every subject involving any question of conflicting jurisdiction, or of peculiar difficulty, has been happily disposed of; and the conviction evidently gains ground among the Indians, that their removal to the country assigned by the United States for their permanent residence, furnishes the only hope of their ultimate prosperity.

With that portion of the Cherokees, however, living within the State of Georgia, it has been found impracticable, as yet, to make a satisfactory adjustment. Such was my anxiety to remove all the grounds of complaint, and to bring to a termination the difficulties in which they are involved, that I directed the very liberal propositions to be made to them which accompany the documents herewith submitted. They cannot but have seen in these offers the evidence of the strongest disposition, on the part of the Government, to deal justly and liberally with them. An ample indemnity was offered for their present possessions, a liberal provision for their future support and improvement, and full security for their private and political rights. Whatever difference of opinion may have prevailed respecting the just claims of these people, there will probably be none respecting the liberality of the propositions, and very little respecting the expediency of their immediate acceptance. They were however rejected, and thus the position of these Indians remained unchanged, as do the views communicated in my Message to the Senate, of February, 1831.

I refer you to the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, which accompanies this Message, for a detail of the operations of that branch of the service during the present year.

Besides the general remarks on some of the transactions of our Navy, presented in the view which has been taken of our foreign relations, I seize this occasion to invite to your notice the increased protection which it has afforded to our commerce and citizens on distant seas, without any augmentation of the force in commission. In the gradual improvement of its pecuniary concerns, in the constant progress in the collection of materials suitable for use during future emergencies, and in the construction of vessels and the buildings necessary to their preservation and repair, the present state of this branch of the service exhibits the fruits of that vigilance and care which are so indispensable to its efficiency. Various new suggestions contained in the annexed report, as well as others heretofore submitted to Congress, are worthy of your attention: but none more so than that urging the renewal, for another term of six years, of the general appropriation for the gradual improvement of the Navy.

From the accompanying report of the Postmaster-General, you will also perceive that that Department continues to extend its usefulness, without impairing its resources, or lessening the accommodations which it affords in the secure and rapid transportation of the mail.

I beg leave to call the attention of Congress to the views heretofore expressed in relation to the mode of choosing the President and Vice President of the United States, and to those respecting the tenure of office generally. Still impressed with the justness of those views, and with the belief that the modifications suggested on those subjects, if adopted, will contribute to the prosperity and harmony of the country, I earnestly recommend them to your consideration at this time.

I have heretofore pointed out the defects in the law for punishing official frauds, especially within the District of Columbia. It has been found almost impossible to bring notorious culprits to punishment; and according to a decision of the Court for this District, a prosecution is barred by a lapse of two years after the fraud has been committed. It may happen again, as it has already happened, that, during the whole two years, all the evidences of the fraud may be in the possession of the culprit himself. However proper the limitation may be in relation to private citizens, it would seem that it ought not to commence running in favor of public officers until they go out of office.

The Judiciary system of the United States remains imperfect. Of the nine Western and South-western States, three only enjoy the benefits of a Circuit Court. Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, are embraced in the general system; but Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, have only District Courts. If the existing system be a good one, why should it not be extended? If it be a bad one, why is it suffered to exist? The new States were promised equal rights and privileges when they came into the Union, and such are the guarantees of the constitution. Nothing can be more obvious, than the obligation of the General Government to place all the States on the same footing in relation to the administration of justice, and I trust this duty will be neglected no longer.

On many of the subjects to which your attention is invited in this communication, it is a source of gratification to reflect that the steps to be now adopted are uninfluenced by the embarrassments entailed upon the country by the wars through which it has passed. In regard to most of our great interests, we may consider ourselves as just starting in our career, and, after a salutary experience, about to fix upon a permanent basis the policy best calculated to promote the happiness of the people, and facilitate their progress towards the most complete enjoyment of civil liberty. On an occasion so interesting and important in our history, and of such anxious concern to the friends of freedom throughout the world, it is our imperative duty to lay aside all selfish and local considerations, and be guided by a lofty spirit of devotion to the great principles on which our institutions are founded.

That this Government may be so administered as to preserve its efficiency in promoting and securing these general objects, should be the only aim of our ambition; and we cannot, therefore, too carefully examine its structure, in order that we may not mistake its powers, or assume those which the people have reserved to themselves, or have preferred to assign to other agents. We should bear constantly in mind the fact, that the considerations which induced the framers of the constitution to withhold from the General Government the power to regulate the great mass of the business and concerns of the people, have been fully justified by experience; and that it cannot now be doubted that the genius of our institutions prescribes simplicity and economy as the characteristics of the reform which is yet to be effected in the present and future execution of the functions bestowed upon us by the constitution.

Limited to a general superintending power to maintain peace at home and abroad, and to prescribe laws on a few subjects of general interest, not calculated to restrict human liberty, but to enforce human rights, this Government will find its strength and its glory in the faithful discharge of these plain and simple duties. Relieved by its protecting shield from the fear of war, and the apprehension of oppression, the free enterprise of our citizens, aided by the State sovereignties, will work out improvements and ameliorations, which cannot fail to demonstrate that the great truth, that the people can govern themselves, is not only realized in our example, but that it is done by a machinery in Government so simple and economical as scarcely to be felt. That the Almighty Ruler of the Universe may so direct our deliberations, and overrule our acts, as to make us instrumental in securing a result so dear to mankind, is my most earnest and sincere prayer.

The President laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing the Treasury report of the state of the finances, for the year 1832; which was ordered to be printed.*

* Report of LOUIS McLANE, Esq., Secretary of the Treasury, on the Finances. Extracts:—

I. THE PUBLIC DEBT.

"After the first of January next, no part of the public debt, except the remaining fragments of the unfunded debt, of which only small portions are occasionally presented, will be redeemable before the following year: and, though there will be in the Treasury, during the year, ample means to discharge the whole debt, they can be applied only to the purchase of stock at the market price. It is now manifest, that, if the Bank shares had been sold, and the proceeds applied to this object, the entire debt might, in this manner, have been extinguished within the present year. But it is, nevertheless, pleasing to reflect, that, after the present year, it may be considered as only a nominal debt; as the Bank shares, which have been actually paid for within the last four years, by the redemption of the stock subscribed for them, are greater in value than the whole amount of that debt: and the debt itself ceases to be a burthen, inasmuch as the dividends derived from the Bank shares yield more to the Treasury than will be required to pay the interest. The debt may, therefore, be considered as substantially extinguished after the first of January next; which is earlier than was looked for under the most prosperous and economical administration of our affairs that could have been anticipated. It will, nevertheless, be gratifying to the national pride, that every thing having even the appearance of debt should cease; and measures will therefore be adopted to invite the early presentation of all the outstanding stocks, that they may be paid off as fast as the means are received, and the evidences of the public debt finally cancelled. It will be a proud day for the American people, when, to all these honorable characteristics, which have rendered their Vetoed Bill.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 6, 1832.

To the Senate of the United States.

I avail myself of this early opportunity to return to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act providing for the final settlement of the claims of the States for interest on advances to the United States, made during the last war," with the reasons which induced me to withhold my approbation, in consequence of which it has failed to become a law.

This bill was presented to me for my signature on the last day of your session, and when I was compelled to consider a variety of other bills of greater urgency to the public service. It obviously embraced a principle in the allowance of interest different from that which had been sanctioned by the practice of the accounting officers, or by the previous legislation of Congress, in regard to advances by the States, and without any apparent grounds for the change.

Previously to giving my sanction to so great an extension of the practice of allowing interest upon accounts with the Government, and which, in its consequences, and from analogy, might not only call for large payments from the Treasury, but disturb the great mass of individual accounts long since finally settled, I deemed it my duty to make a more thorough investigation of the subject than it was possible for me to do previously to the close of your last session. I adopted this course the more readily, from the consideration that as the bill contained no appropriation, the States which would career so memorable among nations, they shall add the rare happiness of being a nation without debt."

II. INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.

"Taking an average of the importations for the last six years as a probable criterion of the ordinary importations for some years to come, the revenue from customs, at the rates of duty payable after the 3d March next, may be estimated at eighteen millions annually. The public lands, bank dividends, and other incidental receipts, may be estimated at three millions—making an aggregate revenue of about twenty-one millions a year. In the last annual report on the state of the finances, the probable expenses for all objects other than the public debt, were estimated at fifteen millions. This is still believed to be a fair estimate; and, if so, there will be an annual surplus of six millions of dollars.

"Still firmly convinced of the truth of the reasons then presented for a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, I am again urged by a sense of duty to suggest that a further reduction of six millions of dollars be made, to take effect after the year 1833. Whether that shall consist altogether of a diminution of the duties on imports, or partly of a relinquishment of the public lands as a source of revenue, as then suggested, it will be for the wisdom of Congress to determine.

"Without adverting, in unnecessary details, to the considerations in favor of lessening the existing duties, which I had the honor to present, as well in the last annual report, as in that called for by special resolutions of the House of Representatives, I deem it proper to observe, that in my own mind these considerations have lost none of their force, but have derived new weight from subsequent reflection.

"The purity and simplicity of the institutions under which it has pleased Providence to make us a great and prosperous nation; the few objects—and those of a general nature—to which the powers of the Federal Government can be appropriately applied; and the great diversity of interests, which, from their local and geographical position, prevail in the several States comprising the Union, imperiously require that the amount of the public expenditure should be regulated by a prudent economy, and that no greater amount of revenue should be collected from the people than may be necessary for such a scale of expenditure."

have been entitled to claim its benefits could not have received them without the fuller legislation of Congress.

The principle which this bill authorizes, varies not only from the practice uniformly adopted by many of the accounting officers in the case of individual accounts, and in those of the States finally settled and closed previously to your last session, but also from that pursued under the act of your last session for the adjustment and settlement of the claims of the State of South Carolina. This last act prescribed no particular mode for the allowance of interest, which, therefore, in conformity with the directions of Congress in previous cases, and with the uniform practice of the Auditor by whom the account was settled, was computed on the sums expended by the State of South Carolina for the use and benefit of the United States, and which had been repaid to the State, and the payments made by the United States were deducted from the principal sums, exclusive of the interest, thereby stopping future interest on so much of the principal as had been reimbursed by the payment.

I deem it proper, moreover, to observe, that both under the act of the 5th of August, 1790, and that of the 12th of February, 1793, authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, arising out of the war of the Revolution, the interest on these accounts was computed in conformity with the practice already adverted to, and from which the bill now returned is a departure.

With these reasons and considerations, I return the bill to the Senate.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Message was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TUESDAY, December 11.

French Spoliations.

Mr. WILKINS, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens for spoliations committed by France on their commerce, prior to the 30th September, 1800.

The bill was read twice, and on motion of Mr. WILKINS, ordered to be referred to a Select Committee of five members.

Mr. WILKINS said that, previous to the balloting for the committee, he wished to remark that, as it was probable the usual courtesy of the Senate in appointing the mover to be on the committee, might be extended to him in this case, he wished it to be understood that he did not desire to be on the committee. He would rather that, in his room, some gentleman might be appointed who was more conversant with commercial business. He desired, however, that it might be understood that he had in no way changed his original opinions on the subject of these claims.

The PRESIDENT replied that he believed it was the duty of the Chair to appoint the committee.

Mr. WILKINS. Then I wish the Chair to consider my remarks as addressed to himself.

Mr. SMITH. I do not think it very proper to appoint commercial gentlemen on this committee. They might be interested in the result.

[The following members were appointed by the Chair to compose the committee: Messrs. WEBSTER, CHAMBERS, DUDLEY, BROWN, TYLER.]

Election of Chaplain.

The Senate then proceeded to the election of a Chaplain; and the Rev. Mr. FINE was declared to be elected.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the United States, and for granting lands to certain States.

The bill having been read twice, and being before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole,

Mr. CLAY said that this bill had been before two committees of the Senate, and that it had been passed at the last session by a considerable majority. He thought, therefore, that there would be no necessity for its reference to any committee at this session. The bill was precisely the same as the one which had passed the Senate last year, with the exception of the necessary change in the time when the bill would take effect. If, however, it was the wish of any Senator that the bill should be referred he had no objection. He would prefer to have the bill made the order for some convenient but not very distant day, when it might be taken up and discussed. If agreeable to the Senate, he would say the fourth Monday in this month, or the first Monday in January. He did not see that it was necessary to send the bill to a committee, but if any gentleman wished that course to be taken, he repeated, he should not object to it.

Mr. KANE said that it would be recollected that this subject had recently been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, by the reference to that committee of so much of the President's Message as relates to the public lands. An important proposition, indeed a new one, had come from the Executive on the subject of the public lands generally. That proposition was now before the committee; and he hoped that the gentleman from Kentucky would consent to a reference of his bill to the same committee. Mr. K. concluded by moving this reference.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THURSDAY, December 13.

Reduction of Duties.

Mr. SMITH, instructed by the Committee on Finance, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as may be, to furnish the Senate with the project of a bill for reducing the duties levied upon imports, in conformity with the suggestions made by him in his annual report.

MONDAY, December 17.

Reduction of Duties.

Mr. POINDEKSTER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, with as little delay as practicable, a detailed statement of the articles of foreign growth or manufacture, on which, in his opinion, the present rate of duties ought to be reduced, specifying particularly the amount of reduction on each article separately, so as to produce the result of an aggregate reduction of the revenue six millions of dollars, on such manufactures as are classed under the general denomination of protected articles; and that he also append to such report an enumeration of articles deemed to be "essential to our national independence in time of war," and which therefore ought, in his opinion, to be exempted from the operation of the proposed reduction of duties.

On motion of Mr. POINDEKSTER, the resolution was ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, January 7, 1833.

Public Lands.

The Senate proceeded to the special order of the day, being Mr. CLAY's bill for appropriating the proceeds of the public lands for a limited term, &c.

The question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which substitutes a new bill, reducing the price of public lands,

[Mr. KANE, of Illinois, spoke at length against the bill, and Mr. CLAY in its favor, when it was laid on the table for the present.]

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 11.

South Carolina Resolutions: the Doctrine of Nullification, and the Right of Secession Declared.

Mr. MILLER presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, in reply to the proclamation of the President, viz:

Resolved, That the power vested by the constitution and laws in the President of the United States to issue his proclamation, does not authorize him in that mode to interfere, whenever he may think fit, in the affairs of the respective States, or that he should use it as a means of promulgating Executive exposition of the constitution, with the sanction of force; thus superseding the action of the other departments of the General Government.

Resolved, That it is not competent to the President of the United States to order, by proclamation, the constituted authorities of a State to repeal their legislation; and that the late attempt of the President to do so is unconstitutional, and manifests a disposition to arrogate and exercise a power utterly destructive of liberty.

Resolved, That the opinions of the President in regard to the rights of the States are erroneous and dangerous, leading not only to the establishment of a consolidated Government in the stead of our free confederacy, but the concentration of all power in the chief Executive.

Resolved, That each State of this Union has the right, whenever it may deem such course necessary for the preservation of its liberty, or vital interest, to secede peaceably from the Union; and that there is no constitutional power in the General Government, much less in the Executive Department of that Government, to retain by force such State in the Union.

Resolved, That the primary and paramount allegiance of the citizens of this State, native or adopted, is of right due to this State.

Resolved, That the declaration of the President of the United States, in his said proclamation, of his personal feelings and retaliations towards the State of South Carolina, is rather an appeal to the loyalty of subjects than to the patriotism of citizens; and is a blending of official and individual character heretofore unknown in our State papers, and revolting to our conceptions of political propriety.

Resolved, That the undisguised indulgence of personal hostility in the said proclamation would be unworthy the animadversions of this Legislature, but for the solemn and official form of the instrument which is made its vehicle.

Resolved, That the principal doctrines and purposes contained in the said proclamation are inconsistent with any just idea of a limited Government, and subversive of the rights of the States and the liberties of the people; and, if submitted to in silence, would lay a broad foundation for the establishment of monarchy.

Resolved, That while this Legislature has witnessed with sorrow such a relaxation of the spirit of our institutions, that a President of the United States dares venture upon this high-handed measure, it regards with indignation the menaces which are directed against it, and the concentration of a standing army on our borders; that the State will repel force by force, and, relying on the blessing of God, will maintain its liberty at all hazards.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to our members of Congress, to be laid before that body.

The resolutions were read and laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SATURDAY, January 12.

Public Lands.

The Senate passed to the consideration of the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c. The question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, Mr. BUCKNER, of Missouri, spoke at length against the bill.

MONDAY, January 14.

French Spoliations.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to indemnify certain citizens of the United States for spoliations committed on their commerce by the French prior to 1800, which was agreed to.

The bill being then before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole,

Mr. WEBSTER, in a speech of about two hours, developed the principles of the bill, and the grounds on which it was reported by the committee, and on which he should advocate its passage.

Mr. TYLER explained the difficulty he felt in bringing his mind to embrace this important subject, after so long an interval had transpired since he had looked into the subject; and moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER acquiesced in the motion, which was carried.

Proclamation against South Carolina Ordinance.

Mr. CALHOUN laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the Senate a copy of his proclamation of the 10th of December last; and also the authenticated copies of the ordinance of the people of the State of South Carolina, with the documents accompanying the same; and of the proclamation of the Governor of the State of South Carolina of the 20th of December last, which was transmitted to him by the Executive of that State, with the request that he should lay them before Congress.

WEDNESDAY, January 16.

South Carolina—Nullification—Secession—Ordinance—Proclamation of President Jackson.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of the proclamation and other documents relating to South Carolina, her ordinance, &c.

The Message and Proclamation were read. The Message was as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In my annual Message, at the commencement of your present session, I adverted to the opposition to the revenue laws in a particular quarter of the United States, which threatened not merely to thwart their execution, but to endanger the integrity of the Union. And although I then expressed my reliance that it might be overcome by the prudence of the officers of the United States and the patriotism of the people, I stated that, should the emergency arise rendering the execution of the existing laws impracticable from any cause whatever, prompt notice should be given to Congress, with the suggestion of such views and measures as might be necessary to meet it.

Events which have occurred in the quarter then alluded to, or which have come to my knowledge subsequently, present this emergency.

Since the date of my last annual Message, I have had officially transmitted to me by the Governor of South Carolina, which I now communicate to Congress, a copy of the ordinance passed by the convention which assembled at Columbia, in the State of South Carolina, in November last, declaring certain acts of Congress therein mentioned, within the limits of that State, to be absolutely null and void, and making it the duty of the Legislature to pass such laws as would be necessary to carry the same into effect from and after the 1st of February next.

The consequences to which this extraordinary defiance of the just authority of the Government might too surely lead, were clearly foreseen, and it was impossible for me to hesitate as to my own duty in such an emergency.

The ordinance had been passed, however, without any certain knowledge of the recommendation which, from a view of the interests of the nation at large, the Executive had determined to submit to Congress; and a hope was indulged that, by frankly explaining his sentiments, and the nature of those duties which the crisis would devolve upon him, the authorities of South Carolina might be induced to retrace their steps. In this hope, I determined to issue my proclamation of the 10th of December last, a copy of which I now lay before Congress.

I regret to inform you that these reasonable expectations have not been realized, and that the several acts of the Legislature of South Carolina, which I now lay before you, and which have, all and each of them, finally passed, after a knowledge of the desire of the Administration to modify the laws complained of, are too well calculated, both in their positive enactments, and in the spirit of opposition which they obviously encourage, wholly to obstruct the collection of the revenue within the limits of that State.

Up to this period, neither the recommendation of the Executive in regard to our financial policy and impost system, nor the disposition manifested by Congress promptly to act upon that subject, nor the unequivocal expression of the public will, in all parts of the Union, appears to have produced any relaxation in the measures of opposition adopted by the State of South Carolina; nor is there any reason to hope that the ordinance and laws will be abandoned.

I have no knowledge that an attempt has been made, or that it is in contemplation, to reassemble either the convention or the Legislature; and it will be perceived that the interval before the 1st of February is too short to admit of the preliminary steps necessary for that purpose. It appears, moreover, that the State authorities are actively organizing their military resources, and providing the means, and giving the most solemn assurances of protection and support to all who shall enlist in opposition to the revenue laws.

A recent proclamation of the present Governor of South Carolina has openly defied the authority of the Executive of the Union, and general orders from the headquarters of the State announced his determination to accept the services of volunteers, and his belief that, should their country need their services, they will be found at the post of honor and duty, ready to lay down their lives in her defence. Under these orders, the forces referred to are directed to "hold themselves in readiness to take the field at a moment's warning;" and in the city of Charleston, within a collection district and a port of entry, a rendezvous has been opened for the purpose of enlisting men for the magazine and municipal guard. Thus, South Carolina presents herself in the attitude of hostile preparation, and ready even for military violence, if need be, to enforce her laws for preventing the collection of the duties within her limits.

Proceedings thus announced and matured must be distinguished from menaces of unlawful resistance by irregular bodies of people, who, acting under temporary delusion, may be restrained by reflection, and the influence of public opinion, from the commission of actual outrage. In the present instance, aggression may be regarded as committed when it is officially authorized, and the means of enforcing it fully provided.

Under these circumstances, there can be no doubt that it is the determination of the authorities of South Carolina fully to carry into effect their ordinance and laws after the 1st of February. It therefore becomes my duty to bring the subject to the serious consideration of Congress, in order that such measures as they, in their wisdom, may deem fit, shall be seasonably provided; and that it may be thereby understood that, while the Government is disposed to remove all just cause of complaint, as far as may be practicable consistently with a proper regard to the interests of the community at large, it is, nevertheless, determined that the supremacy of the laws shall be maintained.

In making this communication, it appears to me to be proper not only that I should lay before you the acts and proceedings of South Carolina, but that I should also fully acquaint you with those steps which I have already caused to be taken for the due collection of the revenue, and with my views of the subject generally, that the suggestions which the constitution requires me to make, in regard to your future legislation, may be better understood.

This subject having early attracted the anxious attention of the Executive, as soon as it was probable that the authorities of South Carolina seriously meditated resistance to the faithful execution of the revenue laws, it was deemed advisable that the Secretary of the Treasury should particularly instruct the officers of the United States in that part of the Union as to the nature of the duties prescribed by the existing laws.

Instructions were accordingly issued on the 6th of November to the collectors in that State, pointing out their respective duties, and enjoining upon each a firm and vigilant, but discreet performance of them in the emergency then apprehended.

I herewith transmit copies of these instructions, and of the letter addressed to the district attorney requesting his co-operation. These instructions were dictated in the hope that, as the opposition to the laws by the anomalous proceeding of nullification was represented to be of a pacific nature, to be pursued, substantially, according to the forms of the constitution, and without resorting, in any event, to force or violence, the measures of its advocates would be taken in conformity with that profession; and, on such supposition, the means afforded by the existing laws would have been adequate to meet any emergency likely to arise.

JANUARY, 1838.]

It was, however, not possible altogether to suppress apprehension of the excesses to which the excitement prevailing in that quarter might lead; but it certainly was not foreseen that the meditated obstruction to the laws would so soon openly assume its present character.

Subsequently to the date of those instructions, however, the ordinance of the convention was passed, which, if complied with by the people of that State, must effectually render inoperative the present revenue laws within her limits.

That ordinance declares and ordains, "that the several acts and parts of acts of the Congress of the United States, purporting to be laws for the imposing of duties and imposts on the importation of foreign commodities, and now having operation and effect within the United States; and, more especially, 'An act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports,' approved on the 19th of May, 1828; and also an act entitled 'An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports,' approved on the 14th July, 1832, are unauthorized by the Constitution of the United States, and violate the true intent and meaning thereof, and are null and void, and no law, nor binding upon the State of South Carolina, its officers, and citizens; and all promises, contracts, and obligations made or entered into, or to be made or entered into, with purpose to secure the duties imposed by the said acts, and all judicial proceedings which shall be hereafter had in affirmance thereof, are and shall be held utterly null and void."

It also ordains, "that it shall not be lawful for any of the constituted authorities, whether of the State of South Carolina or of the United States, to enforce the payment of duties imposed by the said acts within the limits of the State, but that it shall be the duty of the Legislature to adopt such measures, and pass such acts as may be necessary to give full effect to this ordinance, and to prevent the enforcement and arrest the operation of the said acts and parts of acts of the Congress of the United States, within the limits of the State, from and after the 1st of February next; and it shall be the duty of all other constituted authorities, and of all other persons residing or being within the limits of the State, and they are hereby required and enjoined to obey and give effect to this ordinance, and such acts and measures of the Legislature as may be passed or adopted in obedience thereto."

It further ordains, "that in no case of law or equity decided in the courts of the State, wherein shall be drawn in question the authority of this ordinance, or the validity of such act or acts of the Legislature as may be passed for the purpose of giving effect thereto, or the validity of the aforesaid acts of Congress imposing duties, shall any appeal be taken or allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, nor shall any copy of the record be permitted or allowed for that purpose; and the person or persons attempting to take such appeal, may be dealt with as for a contempt of court."

It likewise ordains, "that all persons holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, civil or military, under the State, shall, within such time, and in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe, take an oath well and truly to obey, execute, and enforce this ordinance, and such act or acts of the Legislature as may be passed in pursuance thereof, according to the true intent and meaning of the same; and on the neglect or omission of any such person or persons so to do, his or their office or offices shall be forthwith vacated, and shall be filled up as if such person or persons were dead, or had resigned; and no person hereafter elected to any office of honor, profit, or trust, civil or military, shall, until the Legislature shall otherwise provide and direct, enter on the execution of his office, or be in any respect competent to discharge the duties thereof, until he shall in like manner have taken a similar oath; and no juror shall be empanelled in any of the courts of the State, in any cause in which shall be drawn in question this ordinance, or any act of the Legislature passed in pursuance thereof, unless he shall first, in addition to the usual oath, have taken an oath that he will well and truly obey, execute, and enforce this ordinance, and such act or acts of the Legislature as may be passed to carry the same into operation and effect, according to the true intent and meaning thereof."

The ordinance concludes: "And we, the people of South Carolina, to the end that it may be fully understood by the government of the United States, and the people of the co-States, that we are determined to maintain this ordinance and declaration at every hazard, do further declare that we will not submit to the application of force on the part of the Federal Government to reduce this State to obedience; but that we will consider the passage by Congress of any act authorizing the employment of a military or naval force against the State of South Carolina, her constituted authorities, or citizens; or any act abolishing or closing the ports of this State, or any of them, or otherwise obstructing the free ingress and egress of vessels to and from the said ports; or any other act on the part of the Federal Government to coerce the State, shut up her ports, destroy or harass her commerce, or to enforce the acts hereby declared to be null and void, otherwise than through the civil tribunals of the country, as inconsistent with the longer continuance of South Carolina in the Union; and that the people of this State will thenceforth hold themselves absolved from all further obligation to maintain or preserve their political connection with the people of the other States, and will forthwith proceed to organize a separate Government, and to do all other acts and things which sovereign and independent States may of right do."

This solemn denunciation of the laws and authority of the United States has been followed up by a series of acts on the part of the authorities of that State, which manifest a determination to render inevitable a resort to those measures of self-defence which the paramount duty of the Federal Government requires; but, upon the adoption of which, that State will proceed to execute the purpose it has avowed in this ordinance, of withdrawing from the Union.

On the 27th of November the Legislature assembled at Columbia; and on their meeting, the Governor laid before them the ordinance of the convention. In his message on that occasion, he acquaints them that "this ordinance has thus become a part of the fundamental law of South Carolina;" that "the die has been at last cast, and South Carolina has at length appealed to her ulterior sovereignty as a member of this confederacy, and has planted herself on her reserved rights. The rightful exercise of this power is not a question which we shall any longer argue. It is sufficient that she has willed it, and that the act is done; nor is its strict compatibility with our constitutional obligation to all laws passed by the General Government, within the authorized grants of power, to be drawn in question, when this interposition is exerted in a case in which the compact has been palpably, deliberately, and dangerously violated. That it brings up a conjuncture of deep and momentous interest, is neither to be concealed nor denied. This crisis presents a class of duties which is referable to yourselves. You have been commanded by the people in their highest sovereignty, to take care that within the limits of this State their will shall be obeyed." "The measure of legislation," he says, "which you have to employ at this crisis, is the precise amount of such enactments as may be necessary to render it utterly impossible to collect, within our limits, the duties imposed by the protective tariffs thus nullified." He proceeds: "that you should arm every citizen with a civil process, by which he may claim, if he pleases, a restitution of his goods, seized under the existing imposts, on his giving security to abide the issue of a suit at law, and at the same time define what shall constitute treason against the State, and by a bill of pains and penalties compel obedience, and punish disobedience to your own laws, are points too obvious to require any discussion. In one word, you must survey the whole ground. You must look to and provide for all possible contingencies. In your own limits, your own courts of judicature must not only be supreme, but you must look to the ultimate issue of any conflict of jurisdiction and power between them and the courts of the United States."

The Governor also asks for power to grant clearances, in violation of the laws of the Union; and, to prepare for the alternative which must happen unless the United States shall passively surrender their authority, and the Executive, disregarding his oath, refrain from executing the laws of the Union, he recommends a thorough revision of the militia system, and that the Governor "be authorized to accept, for the defence of Charleston and its dependencies, the services of two thousand volunteers, either by companies or files;" and that they be formed into a legionary brigade, consisting of infantry, riflemen, cavalry, field and heavy artillery; and that they be "armed and equipped from the public arsenals, completely for the field; and that appropriations be made for supplying all deficiencies in our munitions of war." In addition to these volunteer draughts, he recommends that the Governor be authorized "to accept the services of ten thousand volunteers from the other divisions of the State, to be organized and arranged in regiments and brigades; the officers to be selected by the commander-in-chief; and that this whole force be called the State Guard."

A request has been regularly made of the Secretary of State of South Carolina for authentic copies of the acts which have been passed for the purpose of enforcing the ordinance; but, up to the date of the latest advices, that request had not been complied with; and, on the present occasion, therefore, reference can only be made to those acts as published in the newspapers of the State.

The acts to which it is deemed proper to invite the particular attention of Congress, are:—

1st. "An act to carry into effect, in part, an ordinance to nullify certain acts of the Congress of the United States, purporting to be laws laying duties on the importation of foreign commodities," passed in convention of this State, at Columbia, on the 24th November, 1832.

This act provides that any goods seized or detained, under pretence of securing the duties, or for the non-payment of duties, or under any process, order, or decree, or other pretext, contrary to the intent and meaning of the ordinance, may be recovered by the owner or consignee by "an act of replevin." That, in case of refusing to deliver them, or removing them so that the replevin cannot be executed, the sheriff may seize the personal estate of the offender to double the amount of the goods; and if any attempt shall be made to retake or seize them, it is the duty of the sheriff to recapture them. And that any person who shall disobey the process, or remove the goods, or any one who shall attempt to retake or seize the goods under pretence of securing the duties, or for non-payment of duties, or under any process or decree contrary to the intent of the ordinance, shall be fined and imprisoned, besides being liable for any other offence involved in the act.

It also provides that any person arrested or imprisoned on any judgment or decree obtained in any federal court for duties, shall be entitled to the benefit secured by the habeas corpus act of the State in cases of unlawful arrest, and may maintain an action for damages; and that, if any estate shall be sold under such judgment or decree, the sale shall be held illegal. It also provides that any jailer who receives a person committed on any process or other judicial proceedings, to enforce the payment of duties, and any one who hires his house as a jail to receive such persons, shall be fined and imprisoned. And, finally, it provides that persons paying duties may recover them back with interest.

The next is called "An act to provide for the security and protection of the people of the State of South Carolina."

This act provides, that, if the Government of the United States, or any officer thereof, shall, by the employment of naval or military force, attempt to coerce the State of South Carolina into submission to the acts of Congress declared by the ordinance null and void, or to resist the enforcement of the ordinance, or of the laws passed in pursuance thereof, or in case of any armed or forcible resistance thereto, the Governor is authorized to resist the same, and to order into service the whole, or so much of the military force of the State as he may deem necessary; and that in case of any overt act of coercion, or intention to commit the same, manifested by an unusual assemblage of naval or military forces in or near the State, or the occurrence of any circumstances indicating that armed force is about to be employed against the State, or in resistance to its laws, the Governor is authorized to accept the services of such volunteers, and call into service such portions of the militia as may be required to meet the emergency.

The act also provides for accepting the service of the volunteers, and organizing the militia, embracing all free white males between the ages of sixteen and sixty, and for the purchase of arms, ordnance and ammunition. It also declares that the power conferred on the Governor shall be applicable to all cases of insurrection or invasion, or imminent danger thereof, and to cases where the laws of the State shall be opposed, and the execution thereof forcibly resisted by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the power vested in the sheriffs and other civil officers; and declares it to be the duty of the Governor in every such case to call forth such portions of militia and volunteers as may be necessary promptly to suppress such combinations, and cause the laws of the State to be executed.

No. 9 is "An act concerning the oath required by the ordinance passed in convention at Columbia, on the 24th of November, 1832." This act prescribes the form of the oath, which is, to obey and execute the ordinance, and all acts passed by the Legislature in pursuance thereof; and directs the time and manner of taking it by the officers of the State, civil, judiciary, and military.

It is believed that other acts have been passed, embracing provisions for enforcing the ordinance, but I have not yet been able to procure them.

I transmit, however, a copy of Governor Hamilton's message to the Legislature of South Carolina, of Governor Hayne's inaugural address to the same body, as also of his proclamation, and a general order of the Governor and commander-in-chief, dated the 20th of December, giving public notice that the services of volunteers will be accepted under the act already referred to.

If these measures cannot be defeated and overcome by the power conferred by the constitution on the Federal Government, the constitution must be considered as incompetent to its own defence, the supremacy of the laws is at an end, and the rights and liberties of the citizens can no longer receive protection from the Government of the Union. They not only abrogate the acts of Congress, commonly called the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832, but they prostrate and sweep away at once, and without exception, every act, and every part of every act, imposing any amount whatever of duty on any foreign merchandise; and, virtually, every existing act which has ever been passed authorizing the collection of the revenue, including the act of 1816, and also, the collection law of 1799, the constitutionality of which has never been questioned. It is not only those duties which are charged to have been imposed for the protection of manufactures that are thereby repealed, but all others, though laid for the purpose of revenue merely, and upon articles in no degree suspected of being objects of protection. The whole revenue system of the United States in South Carolina is obstructed and overthrown; and the Government is absolutely prohibited from collecting any part of the public revenue within the limits of that State. Henceforth, not only the citizens of South Carolina and of the United States, but the subjects of foreign States, may import any description or quantity of merchandise into the ports of South Carolina, without the payment of any duty whatsoever. That State is thus relieved from the payment of any part of the public burdens, and duties and imposts are not only rendered not uniform throughout the United States, but a direct and ruinous preference is given to the ports of that State over those of all the other States of the Union, in manifest violation of the positive provisions of the constitution.

In point of duration, also, those aggressions upon the authority of Congress, which, by the ordinance, are made part of the fundamental law of South Carolina, are absolute, indefinite, and without limitation. They neither prescribe the period when they shall cease, nor indicate any conditions upon which those who have thus undertaken to arrest the operation of the laws are to retrace their steps, and rescind their measures. They offer to the United States no alternative but unconditional submission. If the scope of the ordinance is to be received as the scale of concession, their demands can be satisfied only by a repeal of the whole system of revenue laws, and by abstaining from the collection of any duties and imposts whatsoever.

It is true, that in the address to the people of the United States by the Convention of South Carolina, after announcing "the fixed and final determination of the State in relation to the protecting system," they say "that it remains for us to submit a plan of taxation, in which we would be willing to acquiesce, in a liberal spirit of concession, provided we are met in due time, and in a becoming spirit, by the States interested in manufactures." In the opinion of the convention, an equitable plan would be, that "the whole list of protected articles should be imported free of all duty, and that the revenue derived from import duties should be raised exclusively from the unprotected articles, or that whenever a duty is imposed upon protected articles imported, an excise duty of the same rate shall be imposed upon all similar articles manufactured in the United States." The address proceeds to state, however, that "they are willing to make a large offering to preserve the Union, and with a distinct declaration that it is a concession on our part, we will consent that the same rate of duty may be imposed upon the protected articles that shall be imposed upon the unprotected, provided that no more revenue be raised than is necessary to meet the demands of the Government for constitutional purposes, and provided also that a duty substantially uniform be imposed upon all foreign imports."

It is also true, that, in his message to the Legislature, when urging the necessity of providing "means of securing their safety by ample resources for repelling force by force," the Governor of South Carolina observes that he "cannot but think that, on a calm and dispassionate review by Congress, and the functionaries of the General Government, of the true merits of this controversy, the arbitration, by a call of a convention of all the States, which we sincerely and anxiously seek and desire, will be accorded to us."

From the diversity of terms indicated in these two important documents, taken in connection with the progress of recent events in that quarter, there is too much reason to apprehend, without in any manner doubting the intentions of those public functionaries, that neither the terms proposed in the address of the convention, nor those alluded to in the message of the Governor, would appease the excitement which has led to the present excesses. It is obvious, however, that, should the latter be insisted on, they present an alternative which the General Government of itself can by no possibility grant, since, by an express provision of the constitution, Congress can call a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments only "on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States." And it is not perceived that the terms presented in the address are more practicable than those referred to in the message.

It will not escape attention that the conditions on which it is said, in the address of the convention, they "would be willing to acquiesce," form no part of the ordinance. While this ordinance bears all the solemnity of a fundamental law, is to be authoritative upon all within the limits of South Carolina, and is absolute and unconditional in its terms, the address conveys only the sentiments of the convention in no binding or practical form; one is the act of the State, the other only the expression of the opinions of the members of the convention. To limit the effect of that solemn act by any terms or conditions whatever, they should have been embodied in it, and made of import no less authoritative than the act itself. By the positive enactments of the ordinance, the execution of the laws of the Union is absolutely prohibited; and the address offers no other prospect of their being again restored, even in the modified form proposed, than what depends upon the improbable contingency, that, amid changing events and increasing excitement, the sentiments of the present members of the convention, and of their successors, will remain the same.

It is to be regretted, however, that these conditions, even if they had been offered in the same binding form, are so undefined, depend upon so many contingencies, and are so directly opposed to the known opinions and interests of the great body of the American people, as to be almost hopeless of attainment. The majority of the States and of the people will certainly not consent that the protecting duties shall be wholly abrogated, never to be re-enacted at any future time, or in any possible contingency. As little practicable is it to provide that "the same rate of duty shall be imposed upon the protected articles that shall be imposed upon the unprotected;" which, moreover, would be severely oppressive to the poor, and, in time of war, would add greatly to its rigors. And though there can be no objection to the principle, properly understood, that no more revenue shall be raised than is necessary for the constitutional purposes of the Government, which principle has been already recommended by the Executive as the true basis of taxation, yet it is very certain that South Carolina alone cannot be permitted to decide what these constitutional purposes are.

The period which constitutes the due time in which the terms proposed in the address are to be accepted, would seem to present scarcely less difficulty than the terms themselves. Though the revenue laws are already declared to be void in South Carolina, as well as the bonds taken under them, and the judicial proceedings for carrying them into effect, yet, as the full action and operation of the ordinance are to be suspended until the 1st of February, the interval may be assumed as the time within which it is expected that the most complicated portion of the national legislation, a system of long standing, and affecting great interests in the community, is to be rescinded and abolished. If this be required, it is clear that a compliance is impossible.

In the uncertainty, then, that exists as to the duration of the ordinance, and of the enactments for enforcing it, it becomes imperiously the duty of the Executive of the United States, acting with a proper regard to all the great interests committed to his care, to treat those acts as absolute and unlimited. They are so, as far as his agency is concerned. He cannot either embrace or lead to the performance of the conditions. He has already discharged the only part in his power, by the recommendation in his annual Message. The rest is with Congress and the people; and until they have acted, his duty will require him to look to the existing state of things, and act under them, according to his high obligations.

By these various proceedings, therefore, the State of South Carolina has forced the General Government, unavoidably, to decide the new and dangerous alternative of permitting a State to obstruct the execution of the laws within its limits, or seeing it attempt to execute a threat of withdrawing from the Union. That portion of the people at present exercising the authority of the State, solemnly assert their right to do either, and as solemnly announce their determination to do one or the other.

In my opinion, both purposes are to be regarded as revolutionary in their character and tendency, and subversive of the supremacy of the laws and of the integrity of the Union. The result of each is the same; since a State in which, by a usurpation of power, the constitutional authority of the Federal Government is openly defied and set aside, wants only the form to be independent of the Union.

The right of a people of a single State to absolve themselves at will, and without the consent of the other States, from their most solemn obligations, and hazard the liberties and happiness of the millions composing this Union, cannot be acknowledged. Such authority is believed to be utterly repugnant both to the principles upon which the General Government is constituted, and to the objects which it is expressly formed to attain.

Against all acts which may be alleged to transcend the constitutional power of the Government, or which may be inconvenient or oppressive in their operation, the constitution itself has prescribed the modes of redress. It is the acknowledged attribute of free institutions, that, under them, the empire of reason and law is substituted for the power of the sword. To no other source can appeals for supposed wrongs be made, consistently with the obligations of South Carolina; to no other can such appeals be made with safety at any time; and to their decisions, when constitutionally pronounced, it becomes the duty, no less of the public authorities than of the people, in every case to yield a patriotic submission.

That a State, or any other great portion of the people, suffering under long and intolerable oppression, and having tried all constitutional remedies without the hope of redress, may have a natural right, when their happiness can be no otherwise secured, and when they can do so without greater injury to others, to absolve themselves from their obligations to the Government, and appeal to the last resort, needs not, on the present occasion, be denied.

The existence of this right, however, must depend upon the causes which may justify its exercise. It is the ultima ratio, which presupposes that the proper appeals to all other means of redress have been made in good faith, and which can never be rightfully resorted to unless it be unavoidable. It is not the right of the State, but of the individual, and of all the individuals in the State. It is the right of mankind generally to secure, by all means in their power, the blessings of liberty and happiness; but when, for these purposes, any body of men have voluntarily associated themselves under a particular form of Government, no portion of them can dissolve the association without acknowledging the correlative right in the remainder to decide whether that dissolution can be permitted consistently with the general happiness. In this view, it is a right dependent upon the power to enforce it. Such a right, though it may be admitted to pre-exist, and cannot be wholly surrendered, is necessarily subjected to limitations in all free Governments, and in compacts of all kinds, freely and voluntarily entered into, and in which the interest and welfare of the individual become identified with those of the community of which he is a member. In compacts between individuals, however deeply they may affect their relations, these principles are acknowledged to create a sacred obligation; and in compacts of civil Government, involving the liberties and happiness of millions of mankind, the obligation cannot be less.

Without adverting to the particular theories to which the Federal compact has given rise, both as to its formation and the parties to it, and without inquiring whether it be merely federal, or social, or national, it is sufficient that it must be admitted to be a compact, and to possess the obligations incident to a compact; to be "a compact by which power is created on the one hand, and obedience exacted on the other; a compact freely, voluntarily, and solemnly entered into by the several States, and ratified by the people thereof, respectively; a compact by which the several States, and the people thereof, respectively, have bound themselves to each other, and to the Federal Government, and by which the Federal Government is bound to the several States, and to every citizen of the United States." To this compact, in whatever mode it may have been done, the people of South Carolina have freely and voluntarily given their assent; and to the whole and every part of it, they are, upon every principle of good faith, inviolably bound. Under this obligation they are bound, and should be required to contribute their portion of the public expense, and to submit to all laws made by the common consent, in pursuance of the constitution, for the common defence and general welfare, until they can be changed in the mode which the compact has provided for the attainment of those great ends of the Government and the Union. Nothing less than causes which would justify revolutionary remedy, can absolve the people from this obligation; and for nothing less can the Government permit it to be done without violating its own obligations, by which, under the compact, it is bound to the other States, and to every citizen of the United States.

These deductions plainly flow from the nature of the federal compact, which is one of limitations, not only upon the powers originally possessed by the parties thereto, but also upon those conferred on the Government, and every department thereof. It will be freely conceded that, by the principles of our system, all power is vested in the people; but to be exercised in the mode, and subject to the checks which the people themselves have prescribed. These checks are, undoubtedly, only different modifications of the same great popular principle which lies at the foundation of the whole, but are not, on that account, to be less regarded or less obligatory.

Upon the power of Congress, the veto of the Executive, and the authority of the Judiciary, which is to extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, are the obvious checks; and the sound action of public opinion, with the ultimate power of amendment, is the salutary and only limitation upon the powers of the whole.

However it may be alleged that a violation of the compact, by the measures of the Government, can affect the obligations of the parties, it cannot even be pretended that such violation can be predicated of those measures until all the constitutional remedies shall have been fully tried. If the Federal Government exercise powers not warranted by the constitution, and immediately affecting individuals, it will scarcely be denied that the proper remedy is a recourse to the judiciary. Such, undoubtedly, is the remedy for those who deem the acts of Congress laying duties and imposts, and providing for their collection, to be unconstitutional. The whole operation of such laws is upon the individuals importing the merchandise. A State is absolutely prohibited from laying imposts or duties on imports or exports, without the consent of Congress, and cannot become a party, under these laws, without importing in her own name, or wrongfully interposing her authority against them. By thus interposing, however, she cannot rightfully obstruct the operation of the laws upon individuals. For their disobedience to, or violation of, the laws, the ordinary remedies through the judicial tribunals would remain. And in a case where an individual should be prosecuted for any offence against the laws, he could not set up, in justification of his act, a law of the State, which, being unconstitutional, would therefore be regarded as null and void. The law of a State cannot authorize the commission of a crime against the United States, or any other act which, according to the supreme law of the Union, would be otherwise unlawful. And it is equally clear, that, if there be any case in which a State, as such, is affected by the law beyond the scope of judicial power, the remedy consists in appeals to the people, either to effect a change in the representation, or to procure relief by an amendment of the constitution. But the measures of the Government are to be recognized as valid, and, consequently, supreme, until these remedies shall have been effectually tried; and any attempt to subvert those measures, or to render the laws subordinate to State authority, and, afterwards, to resort to constitutional redress, is worse than evasive. It would not be a proper resistance to "a Government of unlimited powers," as has been sometimes pretended, but unlawful opposition to the very limitations on which the harmonious action of the Government, and all its parts, absolutely depends.

South Carolina has appealed to none of these remedies, but, in effect, has defied them all. While threatening to separate from the Union, if any attempt be made to enforce the revenue laws otherwise than through the civil tribunals of the country, she has not only not appealed in her own name to those tribunals which the constitution has provided for all cases in law or equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, but has endeavored to frustrate the proper action on her citizens, by drawing the cognizance of cases under the revenue laws to her own tribunals, specially prepared and fitted for the purpose of enforcing the acts passed by the State to obstruct those laws, and both the judges and jurors of which will be bound, by the import of oaths previously taken, to treat the Constitution and laws of the United States in this respect as a nullity. Nor has the State made the proper appeal to public opinion, and to the remedy of amendment. For, without waiting to learn whether the other States will consent to a convention, or, if they do, will construe or amend the constitution to suit her views, she has, of her own authority, altered the import of that instrument, and given immediate effect to the change. In fine, she has set her own will and authority above the laws, has made herself arbiter in her own cause, and has passed at once over all intermediate steps to measures of avowed resistance, which, unless they be submitted to, can be enforced only by the sword.

In deciding upon the course which a high sense of duty to all the people of the United States imposes upon the authorities of the Union, in this emergency, it cannot be overlooked that there is no sufficient cause for the acts of South Carolina, or for her thus placing in jeopardy the happiness of so many millions of people. Misrule and oppression, to warrant the disruption of the free institutions of the Union of these States, should be great and lasting, defying all other remedy. For causes of minor character, the Government could not submit to such a catastrophe without a violation of its most sacred obligations to the other States of the Union who have submitted their destiny to its hands.

There is, in the present instance, no such cause, either in the degree of misrule or oppression complained of, or in the hopelessness of redress by constitutional means. The long sanction they have received from the proper authorities, and from the people, not less than the unexampled growth and increasing prosperity of so many millions of freemen, attest that no such oppression as would justify or even palliate such a resort, can be justly imputed either to the present policy or past measures of the Federal Government. The same mode of collecting duties, and for the same general objects, which began with the foundation of the Government, and which has conducted the country, through its subsequent steps, to its present enviable condition of happiness and renown, has not been changed. Taxation and representation, the great principle of the American revolution, have continually gone hand in hand; and at all times, and in every instance, no tax, of any kind, has been imposed without their participation; and in some instances, which have been complained of, with the express assent of a part of the Representatives of South Carolina in the councils of the Government. Up to the present period, no revenue has been raised beyond the necessary wants of the country and the authorized expenditures of the Government. And as soon as the burden of the public debt is removed, those charged with the administration have promptly recommended a corresponding reduction of revenue.

That this system, thus pursued, has resulted in no such oppression upon South Carolina, needs no other proof than the solemn and official declaration of the late Chief Magistrate of that State, in his address to the Legislature. In that he says, that "the occurrences of the past year, in connection with our domestic concerns, are to be reviewed with a sentiment of fervent gratitude to the Great Disposer of human events; that tributes of grateful acknowledgment are due for the various and multiplied blessings he has been pleased to bestow on our people; that abundant harvests, in every quarter of the State, have crowned the exertions of agricultural labor; that health, almost beyond former precedent, has blessed our homes; and that there is not less reason for thankfulness in surveying our social condition." It would, indeed, be difficult to imagine oppression where, in the social condition of a people, there was equal cause of thankfulness as for abundant harvests, and varied and multiplied blessings with which a kind Providence had favored them.

Independently of these considerations, it will not escape observation that South Carolina still claims to be a component part of the Union; to participate in the national councils, and to share in the public benefits, without contributing to the public burdens; thus asserting the dangerous anomaly of continuing in an association without acknowledging any other obligation to its laws than what depends upon her own will.

In this posture of affairs, the duty of the Government seems to be plain. It inculcates a recognition of that State as a member of the Union, and subject to its authority; a vindication of the just power of the constitution; the preservation of the integrity of the Union; and the execution of the laws by all constitutional means.

The constitution, which his oath of office obliges him to support, declares that the Executive "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and, in providing that he shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient, imposes the additional obligation of recommending to Congress such more efficient provision for executing the laws as may, from time to time, be found requisite.

The same instrument confers on Congress the power not merely to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare, but "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof;" and also to provide for calling forth the militia for executing the laws of the Union. In all cases similar to the present, the duties of the Government become the measure of its powers; and whenever it fails to exercise a power necessary and proper to the discharge of the duty prescribed by the constitution, it violates the public trusts not less than it would in transcending its proper limits. To refrain, therefore, from the high and solemn duties thus enjoined, however painful the performance may be, and thereby tacitly permit the rightful authority of the Government to be contemned, and its laws obstructed by a single State, would neither comport with its own safety, nor the rights of the great body of the American people.

It being thus shown to be the duty of the Executive to execute the laws by all constitutional means, it remains to consider the extent of those already at his disposal, and what it may be proper further to provide.

In the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury to the collectors in South Carolina, the provisions and regulations made by the act of 1799, and also the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, for their enforcement, are particularly detailed and explained. It may be well apprehended, however, that these provisions may prove inadequate to meet such an open, powerful, organized opposition, as is to be commenced after the 1st of February next.

Subsequently to the date of these instructions, and to the passage of the ordinance, information has been received, from sources entitled to be relied on, that, owing to the popular excitement in the State, and the effect of the ordinance declaring the execution of the revenue laws unlawful, a sufficient number of persons, in whom confidence might be placed, could not be induced to accept the office of inspector, to oppose with any probability of success, the force which will, no doubt, be used when an attempt is made to remove vessels and their cargoes from the custody of the officers of the customs; and, indeed, that it would be impracticable for the collector, with the aid of any number of inspectors whom he may be authorized to employ, to preserve the custody against such an attempt.

The removal of the custom-house from Charleston to Castle Pinckney was deemed a measure of necessary precaution; and though the authority to give that direction is not questioned, it is nevertheless apparent that a similar precaution cannot be observed in regard to the ports of Georgetown and Beaufort, each of which, under the present laws, remains a port of entry, and exposed to the obstructions meditated in that quarter.

In considering the best means of avoiding or of preventing the apprehended obstruction to the collection of the revenue, and the consequences which may ensue, it would appear to be proper and necessary, to enable the officers of the customs to preserve the custody of vessels and their cargoes, which, by the existing laws, they are required to take, until the duties to which they are liable shall be paid or secured. The mode by which it is contemplated to deprive them of that custody, is the process of replevin, and that of capias in withernam, in the nature of a distress from the state tribunals organized by the ordinance.

Against the proceeding in the nature of a distress, it is not perceived that the collector can interpose any resistance whatever; and against the process of replevin authorized by the law of the State, he, having no common law power, can only oppose such inspectors as he is by statute authorized, and may find it practicable to employ; and these, from the information already adverted to, are shown to be wholly inadequate.

The respect which that process deserves must, therefore, be considered.

If the authorities of South Carolina had not obstructed the legitimate action of the courts of the United States, or if they had permitted the State tribunals to administer the law according to their oath under the constitution, and the regulations of the laws of the Union, the General Government might have been content to look to them for maintaining the custody, and to encounter the other inconveniences arising out of the recent proceedings. Even in that case, however, the process of replevin from the courts of the State would be irregular and unauthorized. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that the courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction of all seizures made on land or water for a breach of the laws of the United States, and any intervention of a State authority, which, by taking the thing seized out of the hands of the United States officer, might obstruct the exercise of this jurisdiction, is unlawful; that, in such case, the court of the United States having cognizance of the seizure, may enforce a re-delivery of the thing by attachment or other summary process: that the question under such a seizure, whether a forfeiture has been actually incurred, belongs exclusively to the courts of the United States, and it depends on the final decree whether the seizure is to be deemed rightful or tortuous; and that not until the seizure be finally judged wrongful, and without probable cause, by the courts of the United States, can the party proceed at common law for damages in the State courts.

But by making it "unlawful for any of the constituted authorities, whether of the United States or of the State, to enforce the laws for the payment of duties, and declaring that all judicial proceedings which shall be hereafter had in affirmance of the contracts made with purpose to secure the duties imposed by the said acts, are, and shall be, held utterly null and void," she has, in effect, abrogated the judicial tribunals within her limits in this respect—has virtually denied the United States access to the courts established by their own laws, and declared it unlawful for the judges to discharge those duties which they are sworn to perform. In lieu of these, she has substituted those State tribunals already adverted to, the judges whereof are not merely forbidden to allow an appeal, or permit a copy of their record, but are previously sworn to disregard the laws of the Union, and enforce those only of South Carolina; and thus deprived of the function essential to the judicial character, of inquiring into the validity of the law, and the right of the matter, become merely ministerial instruments in aid of the concerted obstruction of the laws of the Union.

Neither the process nor authority of these tribunals, thus constituted, can be respected, consistently with the supremacy of the laws, or the rights and security of the citizen. If they be submitted to, the protection due from the Government to its officers and citizens is withheld, and there is, at once, an end, not only to the laws, but to the Union itself.

Against such a force as the sheriff may, and which, by the replevin law of South Carolina, it is his duty to exercise, it cannot be expected that a collector can retain his custody with the aid of the inspectors. In such case, it is true, it would be competent to institute suits in the United States courts against those engaged in the unlawful proceeding: or the property might be seized for a violation of the revenue laws, and, being libelled in the proper courts, an order might be made for its redelivery, which would be committed to the marshal for execution. But, in that case, the fourth section of the act, in broad and unqualified terms, makes it the duty of the sheriff "to prevent such recapture or seizure, or to redeliver the goods, as the case may be," "even under any process, order or decrees, or other pretext, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the ordinance aforesaid." It is thus made the duty of the sheriff to oppose the process of the courts of the United States; and, for that purpose, if need be, to employ the whole power of the county; and the act expressly reserves to him all power which, independently of its provisions, he could have used. In this reservation, it obviously contemplates a resort to other means than those particularly mentioned.

It is not to be disguised that the power which it is thus enjoined upon the sheriff to employ, is nothing less than the posse comitatus, in all the rigor of the ancient common law. This power, though it may be used against unlawful resistance to judicial process, is, in its character, forcible, and analogous to that conferred upon the marshals by the act of 1795. It is, in fact, the embodying of the whole mass of the population, under the command of the sheriffs of England to enable them to defend their country against any of the King's enemies when they came into the land, as well as for the purpose of executing process. In early and less civilized times, it was intended to include "the aid and attendance of all knights and others who were bound to have harness." It includes the right of going with arms and military equipment, and embraces larger classes and greater masses of population than can be compelled by the laws of most of the States to perform militia duty. If the principles of the common law are recognized in South Carolina, (and from this act it would seem they are,) the power of summoning the posse comitatus will compel, under the penalty of fine and imprisonment, every man over the age of fifteen, and able to travel, to turn out, at the call of the sheriff, and with such weapons as may be necessary; and it may justify beating, and even killing, such as may resist. The use of the posse comitatus is, therefore, a direct application of force, and cannot be otherwise regarded than as the employment of the whole militia force of the country, and in an equally efficient form under a different name. No proceeding which resorts to this power, to the extent contemplated by the act, can be properly denominated peaceable.

The act of South Carolina, however, does not rely altogether upon this formidable remedy. For even attempting to resist or obey—though by the aid only of the ordinary officers of the customs—the process of replevin, the collector and all concerned are subjected to a further proceeding, in the nature of a distress of their personal effects; and are, moreover, made guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to be punished by a fine of not less than one thousand, nor more than five thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years, and not less than six months; and for even attempting to execute the order of the court for retaking the property, the marshal, and all assisting, would be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to a fine of not less than three thousand dollars, nor more than ten thousand, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years, nor less than one; and, in case the goods should be retaken under such process, it is made the absolute duty of the sheriff to retake them.

It is not to be supposed that, in the face of these penalties, aided by the powerful force of the county, which would doubtless be brought to sustain the State officers, either that the collector would retain the custody in the first instance, or that the marshal could summon sufficient aid to retake the property, pursuant to the order or other process of the court.

It is, moreover, obvious that in this conflict between the powers of the officers of the United States and of the State, (unless the latter be passively submitted to,) the destruction to which the property of the officers of the customs would be exposed, the commission of actual violence, and the loss of lives, would be scarcely avoidable.

Under these circumstances, and the provisions of the act of South Carolina, the execution of the laws is rendered impracticable even through the ordinary judicial tribunals of the United States. There would certainly be fewer difficulties, and less opportunity of actual collision between the officers of the United States and of the State, and the collection of the revenue would be more effectually secured—if indeed it can be done in any other way—by placing the custom-house beyond the immediate power of the county.

For this purpose, it might be proper to provide that whenever, by any unlawful combination or obstruction in any State, or in any port, it should become impracticable faithfully to collect the duties, the President of the United States should be authorized to alter and abolish such of the districts and ports of entry as should be necessary, and to establish the custom-house at some secure place within some port or harbor of such State; and, in such cases, it should be the duty of the collector to reside at such place, and to detain all vessels and cargoes until the duties imposed by law should be properly secured or paid in cash, deducting interest; that, in such cases, it should be unlawful to take the vessel and cargo from the custody of the proper officer of the customs, unless by process from the ordinary judicial tribunals of the United States; and that, in case of an attempt otherwise to take the property by a force too great to be overcome by the officers of the customs, it should be lawful to protect the possession of the officers by the employment of the land and naval forces, and militia, under provisions similar to those authorized by the 11th section of the act of the 9th of January, 1809.

This provision, however, would not shield the officers and citizens of the United States, acting under the laws, from suits and prosecutions, in the tribunals of the State, which might thereafter be brought against them; nor would it protect their property from the proceeding by distress; and it may well be apprehended that it would be insufficient to insure a proper respect to the process of the constitutional tribunals in prosecutions for offences against the United States, and to protect the authorities of the United States, whether judicial or ministerial, in the performance of their duties. It would, moreover, be inadequate to extend the protection due from the Government to that portion of the people of South Carolina, against outrage and oppression of any kind, who may manifest their attachment, and yield obedience to the laws of the Union.

It may, therefore, be desirable to review, with some modifications better adapted to the occasion, the 6th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1815, which expired on the 4th of March, 1817, by the limitation of that of the 27th of April, 1816; and to provide that, in any case, where suit shall be brought against any individual in the courts of the State, for any act done under the laws of the United States, he should be authorized to remove the said cause, by petition, into the circuit court of the United States, without any copy of the record, and that the courts should proceed to hear and determine the same as if it had been originally instituted therein. And that in all cases of injuries to the persons or property of individuals for disobedience to the ordinance, and laws of South Carolina in pursuance thereof, redress may be sought in the courts of the United States. It may be expedient, also, by modifying the resolution of the 3d of March, 1791, to authorize the marshals to make the necessary provision for the safe keeping of prisoners committed under the authority of the United States.

Provisions less than these, consisting, as they do, for the most part, rather of a revival of the policy of former acts called for by the existing emergency, than of the introduction of any unusual or rigorous enactments, would not cause the laws of the Union to be properly respected or enforced. It is believed these would prove inadequate, unless the military forces of the State of South Carolina, authorized by the late act of the Legislature, should be actually embodied and called out in aid of their proceedings, and of the provisions of the ordinance generally. Even in that case, however, it is believed that no more will be necessary than a few modifications of its terms, to adapt the act of 1795 to the present emergency, as, by that act, the provisions of the law of 1792 were accommodated to the crisis then existing; and by conferring authority upon the President to give it operation during the session of Congress, and without the ceremony of a proclamation, whenever it shall be officially made known to him by the authority of any State, or by the courts of the United States, that, within the limits of such State, the laws of the United States will be openly opposed, and their execution obstructed, by the actual employment of military force, or by any unlawful means whatsoever, too great to be otherwise overcome.

In closing this communication, I should do injustice to my own feelings not to express my confident reliance upon the disposition of each department of the Government to perform its duty, and to co-operate in all measures necessary in the present emergency.

The crisis undoubtedly invokes the fidelity of the patriot and the sagacity of the statesman, not more in removing such portion of the public burden as may be necessary, than in preserving the good order of society, and in the maintenance of well-regulated liberty.

While a forbearing spirit may, and I trust will, be exercised towards the errors of our brethren in a particular quarter, duty to the rest of the Union demands that open and organized resistance to the laws should not be executed with impunity.

The rich inheritance bequeathed by our fathers has devolved upon us the sacred obligation of preserving it by the same virtues which conducted them through the eventful scenes of the revolution, and ultimately crowned their struggles with the noblest model of civil institutions. They bequeathed to us a Government of laws, and a Federal Union founded upon the great principle of popular representation. After a successful experiment of forty four years, at a moment when the Government and the Union are the objects of the hopes of the friends of civil liberty throughout the world, and in the midst of public and individual prosperity unexampled in history, we are called to decide whether these laws possess any force, and that Union the means of self-preservation. The decision of this question by an enlightened and patriotic people cannot be doubtful. For myself, fellow-citizens, devoutly relying upon that kind Providence which has hitherto watched over our destinies, and actuated by a profound reverence for those institutions I have so much cause to love, and for the American people, whose partiality honored me with their highest trust, I have determined to spare no effort to discharge the duty which, in this conjuncture, is devolved upon me. That a similar spirit will actuate the representatives of the American people, is not to be questioned; and I fervently pray that the Great Ruler of nations may so guide your deliberations, and our joint measures, as that they may prove salutary examples, not only to the present, but to future times; and solemnly proclaim that the constitution and the laws are supreme, and the Union indissoluble.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January, 1833.

TUESDAY, January 22.

Powers of the Government—Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN submitted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the people of the several States composing these United States are united as parties to a constitutional compact, to which the people of each State acceded as a separate sovereign community, each binding itself by its own particular ratification; and that the Union, of which the said compact is the bond, is a union between the States ratifying the same.

"Resolved, That the people of the several States, thus united by the constitutional compact, in forming that instrument, and in creating a General Government to carry into effect the objects for which they were formed, delegated to that Government for that purpose, certain definite powers, to be exercised jointly, reserving at the same time, each State to itself, the residuary mass of powers, to be exercised by its own separate Government; and that whenever the General Government assumes the exercise of powers not delegated by the compact, its acts are unauthorized, and are of no effect; and that the same Government is not made the final judge of the powers delegated to it, since that would make its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among sovereign parties, without any common judge, each has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of the infraction as of the mode and measure of redress.

"Resolved, That the assertions that the people of these United States, taken collectively as individuals, are now, or ever have been, united on the principle of the social compact, and as such are now formed into one nation or people, or that they have ever been so united in any one stage of their political existence; that the people of the several States composing the Union have not, as members thereof, retained their sovereignty; that the allegiance of their citizens have been transferred to the General Government; that they have parted with the right of punishing treason through their respective State Governments; and that they have not the right of judging in the last resort as to the extent of the powers reserved, and, of consequence, of those delegated; are not only without foundation in truth, but are contrary to the most certain and plain historical facts, and the clearest deductions of reason; and all exercise of power on the part of the General Government, or any of its departments, claiming authority from so erroneous assumptions, must of necessity be unconstitutional, must tend directly and inevitably to subvert the sovereignty of the States, to destroy the federal character of the Union, and to rear on its ruins a consolidated Government, without constitutional check or limitation, and which must necessarily terminate in the loss of liberty itself."

The resolutions were ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, January 23.

Powers of the Government—Mr. Grundy's Resolutions.

MR. GRUNDY moved the following as a substitute for the original [Mr. CALHOUN's] resolutions.

"Resolved, That, by the Constitution of the United States, certain powers are delegated to the General Government, and those not delegated nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

"2. Resolved, That one of the powers expressly granted by the constitution to the General Government, and prohibited to the States, is that of laying duties on imports.

"3. Resolved, That the power to lay imposts is by the constitution wholly transferred from the State authorities to the General Government, without any reservation of power or right on the part of the State.

"4. Resolved, That the tariff laws of 1828 and 1832 are exercises of the constitutional power possessed by the Congress of the United States, whatever various opinions may exist as to their policy and justice.

"5. Resolved, That an attempt on the part of a State to annul an act of Congress passed upon any subject exclusively confided by the constitution to Congress, is an encroachment on the rights of the General Government.

"6. Resolved, That attempts to obstruct or prevent the execution of the several acts of Congress imposing duties on imports, whether by ordinances of conventions or legislative enactments, are not warranted by the constitution, and are dangerous to the political institutions of the country."

Public Lands—Distribution.

The Senate again proceeded to the consideration of the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c.

MR. BENTON rose in opposition to the bill. Sir, said Mr. B., the primary conception of this bill—its distributive principle—is unconstitutional; its specific enactments, and selection of objects for the application of the distribution, are so many separate, distinct, and accumulated instances of constitutional violation. The assumption of State debts was a new and portentous attack upon the sanctity of that instrument; the more dangerous, because it carried a corrupt temptation along with it. States in debt could only consult their necessities, not the constitution, when the means of paying their debts were exhibited to them from the federal treasury. The practice once begun, it would be immaterial for what purpose the debt was created. The present assumption is for a class of debts which the wildest latitudinarian never pretended could come under the federal expenditure. It is internal improvement, not national, but local, to the State in which they were made; such as a State legislature directs for the benefit of counties, parishes, and sectional divisions of its territory. The appropriation for general education was a new attempt to violate the constitution at a point at which it had been successfully defended for forty years. The application of the federal funds for the support of a free negro colony on the coast of Africa was now for the first time seriously attempted. It implied the right of Congress to apply those funds in the emancipation of slaves; for the right to remove, and provide for the free blacks, could only be appurtenant to the right to make them free. It implied the right to stretch the Constitution of the United States over the continent of Africa; to make it cover two continents, and two distinct races of people; to make it what the enchanted tent was in the Arabian Nights—a thing so small that it might be held in the palm of the hand, and yet so expansible that it might be stretched over the court and army of the Great Mogul.

Passing from these constitutional objections, which he barely enumerated, Mr. B. went on to dilate upon those which applied to its policy and expediency. At the head of this list he placed the peculiar character, or composition, of the bill itself. It was a compound of ingredients, containing something to suit every palate. Lands and money, roads and canals, free schools and high schools, relief to debtors, emancipation and colonization of slaves! Such was the cargo with which it was freighted! It came into the Senate chamber, with money in every clause, to pay its way through, as the souls of the damned arrived on the banks of the river Styx, with money in hand to pay their passage into hell. The surly Charon never refused a soul that had the money; in this polite assembly, so munificent a bill cannot be turned out of doors. Gentlemen might turn themselves out of doors if they did. A hue and cry might be raised against them if they deprived their constituents of such large doucours. It was easy to see how such a bill must operate upon the imagination of members; seduction on one hand, terror on the other. To accept the allotted portion might be to pierce the constitution, like the robe of Cæsar, with the stabs of twenty daggers; to reject it, might be to jeopard the occupation of these curule chairs, so dear to the possessors, and so hardly regained when one time lost. It was wrong to put members to choose between such alternatives. It was legislative duress. Morality condemned it; purity recoiled from it; Senatorial dignity should repel it.

Mr. B. next proceeded to lay open the true character of the bill, which, he said, had been smuggled into the Senate under a false name, and covered with a veil—a veil too thin to hide its woolly head and iron heart. It was a tariff bill! calculated to keep up the scale of high duties, and to inflame the discontents of the country. Its high tariff character was proved by its origin, for it emanated from the Committee on Manufactures; it was proved by its supporters, for every high tariff Senator was for it; it was proved by its effects, for its passage would put an end to the bill for the reduction of duties. Far and wide, in Congress and out of Congress, it is hailed as a high tariff measure, as a part of the American system! and to be defended and supported by all the advocates of that system. All the high tariff States are for it. Their legislatures have adopted it. Their memorials to Congress enforce and demand it.

Mr. B. next objected to the distribution itself, as a fallacy, an illusion, and a deception. It was to divide out certain parcels of money with one hand, and to gather back still larger parcels with the other. Fifty or one hundred thousand dollars were to be distributed to a State from the land fund, and twice or thrice that amount to be taken from that same State in taxes upon salt, iron, blankets, flannels, cotton, and woollens, and all the comforts and necessities of life. Two millions were to be distributed from the land fund, and three millions, by the admission of the high tariff party, to be retained in its place, in duties upon imports. A retention of three millions of duties is admitted, but everybody knows that a pretext will be found in this retention to keep up the whole surplus revenue. To the high tariff States, then, this distribution is a double bounty; first, in giving them the proceeds of the lands; and, secondly, in giving them six or eight millions of additional bounties in manufactures. To the anti-tariff States it is delusive bait—insidious cheat—to beguile them with farthings while plundering them of pounds.

Mr. B. remarked upon the preliminary distribution of 12½ per cent. to the new States, as a falsification of the whole argument on which the bill rested. That argument was, that the lands belonged to all the States; that all were equally interested in them; that this was a broad-bottomed, equal, comprehensive, universal system of exact justice to every one, in opposition to partial and interested legislation in favor of a few; and immense credit was arrogated to themselves, by the authors of the bill, for the impartiality of their conduct in this heroic vindication of universal rights. This was the argument; and what is the fact? Why, a preliminary distribution of 12½ per centum to a few States, and then an equal distribution of the remainder, making, as these very champions of exact and universal justice themselves declared on this floor, a division of one-third of the whole amount to the seven new States! Thus the argument is falsified; and from under this falsification the truth peeps out, that this preliminary distribution is a bribe to the new States to induce them to take the bill—a bribe with their own money, to induce them to submit to the pillage and devastation of the high tariff States!

Mr. B. denounced the bill as unfair, partial, and unjust, in several particulars. First, in not admitting Georgia and Virginia, the two great donors of land to the Federal Government, to the preliminary division of 12½ per cent. on the sales made of the lands which they had bestowed upon the Federal Government. Secondly, in admitting Maine, Massachusetts, and Connecticut to come in for an equal share with other States, without accounting for the proceeds of the lands which they had retained, and were now selling for their own benefit—lands from which Maine and Massachusetts were now deriving at the rate of three hundred thousand dollars per annum; and the Western Reserve in Ohio, from which Connecticut created her school fund of near two millions of dollars. Thirdly, in putting all the States upon an equality with respect to internal improvement, when it was well known that a few favored States had received millions for that object, and others nothing; and when the plainest principles of justice required the deficiency to be made up to the neglected States before the general distribution should commence. This bill, so far from making up the deficiencies, in fact, goes on to increase the inequality, by giving the most to those which have had most; stuffing and cramming the States which have been gorged, and dribbling crumbs to those which have been famished.

Mr. B. condemned the rule of distribution—that of population—as false and unjust in its application to a system of internal improvement. The extent of the roads and canals, and not the number of people in the State, was the true rule of distribution in such a case. A large State would require long roads, although it might have but a thin population; a small State would require but a short road, be its population ever so great. Population he admitted to be the true rule of distribution where money was to be divided for individual benefit, and each person was to have his own share for his own purposes; but in the case of roads and canals, the number of people was not only not the true rule, but was the reverse of the true one; for dense population implied a rich level country, where artificial roads were least wanted, and easiest made; thin population, a poor, mountainous country, where such roads are most wanted, and least means for making them. Again: roads and canals will last forever; they are not limited in their use to people of this day; they are for distant ages and remote posterity. If we looked to population at all, it should be to the future, and not to the present; it should be to the States as they would be when their limits were full. This would give the size of the State as the rule of distribution, and would substitute territorial extent for population—a rule which would work peculiarly right in this case, because it would give most to the States which had the best right to receive most, and the greatest need for it, namely, Virginia and Georgia, which gave five of the new States to the Federal Government, and to the new States themselves, which would be so cruelly exhausted to raise the money for the rest.

Mr. B. argued against the sufficiency of the twelve and a half per cent. allowed to the new States. It was an allowance for the damage they were about to suffer from the operation of the bill, and was a most inadequate and insufficient compensation even for the pecuniary damage they would suffer. Counting the pecuniary damage alone, it would require fifty per cent. to make it good. There was fifty per cent., in a moneyed point of view, between the bill and the amendment which was proposed to it; which amendment passed the Senate three years ago, and would pass Congress at this time without the least difficulty, had it not been for this bill. The bill keeps up the price of the land to one dollar and twenty-five cents; the amendment reduces the price to one dollar per acre to general purchasers, and fifty cents per acre to actual settlers. Now, observe the practical operation of the two plans. By the bill, a State will receive twelve and a half cents in the dollar upon the sales within her limits; by the bill she will save twenty-five cents per acre on all the sales to general purchasers, and seventy-five cents per acre on all the sales to actual settlers. Upon a sum of $100,000 the State would receive $12,500; under the amendment, she would save about $50,000. Mr. B. was astonished that Senators from the new States, who voted for this bill, and without whose votes it could never pass, should make such bad bargains for their States. They were entitled to fifty per cent., and could easily get it if they held back for that amount. The high tariff party would take the other fifty with thanks, if they could get no more. They would take what they could get, if it was but five per cent.; for it was all clear gain to them. They would take one per cent. before they would miss the chance. They wanted a finger in the pie; and that finger once in, they knew that they would quickly have the whole pie, dish and all, and the pot in which it was cooked. If these Senators really thought they could make no better bargain, yet there was one thing they could do; they could put off the bargain until the new States were fully represented under the new census, and when they could have a fair chance for their own money.

But Mr. B. utterly denied that the damage to the new States, from the operation of this bill, could be estimated in money. They were to receive injuries from it of a kind which no pecuniary damages could compensate. At the head of these mischiefs stood the acknowledged fact that the passage of the bill would put an end to all hope for any reduction in the price of the public land. Its bare introduction had entirely changed the temper of Congress, and converted many members, who were the advocates of reduced prices for years past, into decided enemies of that measure, and open advocates for the distribution system. So far from reduction, an increase of the price was certain and inevitable. The clause put into the bill to restrain future Congresses from raising the price of the lands, was an acknowledgment of the danger, and a proof of the futility of the remedy. It was adding insult to injury. It implied that the people of the new States were silly enough to believe that this Congress could bind future Congresses by its laws; that this Congress could tie the hands of its successors, and prevent them from altering the price of the public lands. This cunning clause was put in to delude the Western people, and blind them to their danger; but it will have the contrary effect. It will blind no man; on the contrary, it will open his eyes. He will see that there is such a violent disposition just broke out to raise the price of the lands, that Congress, for the first time in the history of the Government, found it necessary to stipulate against it; and he will know that the stipulation is void; that any subsequent Congress may repeal any part of the act it pleases, and substitute any new enactment that it thinks proper. That the price of the lands would be raised, was certain and inevitable. It might not be done by an act of Congress, but it would be done by an act of the new lords and masters of the West, by sending out agents to bid at every sale, to run up the price of every tract, to sue every farmer that took a stick or a stone from public land, to impound the cattle and hogs that eat the public grass and acorns, and to pursue the women and children who gather up the rotten wood. That all this would take place, Mr. B. said, could well be known from looking to the laws passed by Maine and Massachusetts for selling grass and rotten timber, and prosecuting trespassers on their public lands. He had once read these acts in the Senate, and had lately seen in the newspapers an instance of the rigorous manner in which they were executed, in the prosecution of a man for two acorns! It could not be supposed that Massachusetts and Maine, when they became joint owners of the federal lands, would be more lenient to the remote settlers of the West than to their own citizens; and thus the price of land might be raised double as high as it was at present, without the formality of an act of Congress.

Mr. B. made an animated appeal to the Senate against the corrupting tendencies of the distributive system. He rapidly traced its ruinous effect upon the Roman elections, from the small beginning when candidates for the consulship would procure distribution of the public corn to the poorer class of voters, down to the time when the aspirants to the imperial diadem openly bid against each other for the support of the prætorian cohorts, and promised each soldier so many pounds of gold out of the public treasury for his vote. He warned the Senate not to commence such a system in this America. Its inevitable tendency was to run into the gulf of corruption, and to put up the highest office of the republic at auction sale. If the voters once condescended to receive distributions, whether from a public or private fund, the next step would inevitably be to look out for the hand that could, and would, distribute most. Private fortunes, in this country, could not furnish the means of lavishing benefactions on millions of voters; the public funds could alone do it; and he called upon all considerate men to say where the practice would stop, if it once began?

The bill being reported as amended, and the amendments concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 25.

Powers of the Government—Mr. John M. Clayton's Resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the power to annul the several acts of Congress imposing duties on imports, or any other law of the United States, when assumed by a single State, is "incompatible with the existence of the Union, contradicted expressly by the letter of the constitution, unauthorized by its spirit, inconsistent with every principle on which it was founded, and destructive of the great object for which it was formed;" that the people of these United States are, for the purposes enumerated in their constitution, one people and a single nation, having delegated full power to their common agents to preserve and defend their national interests for the purpose of attaining the great end of all government—the safety and happiness of the governed; that while the constitution does provide for the interest and safety of all the States, it does not secure all the rights of independent sovereignty to any; that the allegiance of the people is rightfully due, as it has been freely given, to the General Government, to the extent of all the sovereign power expressly ceded to that Government by the constitution; that the Supreme Court of the United States is the proper and only tribunal in the last resort for the decision of all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority; that resistance to the laws, founded on the inherent and inalienable right of all men to resist oppression, is in its nature revolutionary and extra-constitutional; and that, entertaining these views, the Senate of the United States, while willing to concede every thing to an honest difference of opinion which can be yielded consistently with the honor and interest of the nation, will not fail, in the faithful discharge of its most solemn duty, to support the Executive in the just administration of the Government, and clothe it with all constitutional power necessary to the faithful execution of the laws and the preservation of the Union.

Public Lands—Colonisation.

The bill appropriating, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c., was read a third time.

Mr. WILKINS stated, that last evening, when some of the amendments proposed in the public lands bill were under consideration, several of the Senators were absent. He was willing that in reference to one of these questions, a fuller expression of the sense of the Senate should be taken; but he was desirous that the motion he was about to make should not be received as indicating any change of opinion on his part. He then moved to reconsider the vote of last evening, by which the Senate refused to strike out the words "colonization of free persons of color."

Some conversation took place on the point of order, and then on the propriety of the motion; and the question being finally taken, the motion was decided by—yeas 18, nays 27.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to reconsider the bill, with instructions to strike out the words "colonization of free people of color." In support of his motion, he said many of the managers of the Colonization Society are well known and distinguished. At their annual meeting there had been an evident wish manifested to turn the attention of the public to the society, and enlist the Government in its behalf. Two of our most distinguished citizens, President Madison and Chief Justice Marshall, had expressed their views in relation to the society. The committee had suggested an appropriation of the public lands to the objects of the society; but he also had doubted the power of Congress to make it, and had proposed that the constitution should be so altered as to confer the power. Mr. Marshall was both in favor of the appropriations, and deemed it now constitutional. But Mr. F. thought there was a general impression on the minds of Congress that the Government does not possess the power. He said the object of the bill was to do indirectly what Congress felt it had not the power to do directly. If the bill pass, what will follow? The Colonization Society has no official or political weight or importance; and what will be the consequences of their sending out fifteen hundred or two thousand colonists to the coast of Africa? Every one may do as he pleases with regard to it in his individual capacity, but I desire that it may not be connected with the Government.

The Senator from Kentucky thinks it will perform wonders. The original object was to get rid of the free people of color; but that can be done without the aid of the Government. Now, sir, there is another project, and a very great one; one that is to command the approval of all—the civilization of Africa. It is thought that this can best be done by means of colonies. But, look, sir, at Liberia. Here I have a map of the territorial property, of the sovereign jurisdiction of the Colonization Society of the city of Washington, by the Rev. J. Ashmun, [Here he read some remarks from the map, on the territorial jurisdiction of the society.] Sir, this society goes beyond the European notion of acquiring jurisdiction. European sovereignties obtained it by discovery and purchase; the society by purchase alone; and on this sole ground of sovereignty they were actually exerting their authority over twenty thousand people, and expect soon to exert it over one hundred and fifty thousand—the inhabitants of the territory which they hold, two hundred and eighty miles by thirty, over which their jurisdiction extends. Wars have been waged, and blood has been shed. In the early time of the colony it was attacked by the natives, and three hundred were killed. The agent of the society has waged war; tribes and towns have been conquered; and the spoils divided among the victors. Sir, in most cases of this kind, a claim would have been made on this Government for damages. If the colony were now attacked and destroyed by the resentment which it has provoked, no constitutional power of this Government could hinder its destruction. But if this bill pass, the Government will be involved in its defence. Europe will not allow a colony in Africa thus to grow up and extend, unmolested, while under so feeble prohibition. They will wrest it from the society, unless Government interposes. This bill is a commitment of the Government to protect the colony against all the world. The powers of Government were granted for no such purpose. Mr. F. concluded by saying, that he would dwell no longer on the subject, and that he would not believe that it was the wish of Government to do indirectly what it could not do directly.

Mr. TYLER remarked that there were two other propositions quite as obnoxious to the constitution as the one which had been noticed. Conferring on States the power and the means of internal improvement, and an appropriation, through States, to education, he considered as equally unconstitutional. If one was stricken out, he was in favor of erasing the whole. He preferred that discretionary power of appropriation should remain in the States. He moved to strike out the words designating the three specific objects of appropriation.

Mr. FORSYTH withdrew his motion.

Mr. CLAY asked a division of the question, so as first to consider the general question of recommitting at all.

On the question of recommitment, there were yeas 20, nays 23.

On the question of postponement—yeas 21, nays 24.

The bill was then passed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Poin-dexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Wilkins—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buckner, Calhoun, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Rives, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, Tyler, White, Wright—20.

MONDAY, January 28.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

The Senate then took up the following bill, reported by Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, on the 21st instant.

[The bill is omitted, its provisions being sufficiently stated in the debate.]

Mr. WILKINS rose in support of the bill. The position, said he, in which you, Mr. President, have placed me in relation to this body, imposes on me the duty of introducing the present bill to the Senate, and of explaining its provisions. In my mode of discharging this duty I do not consider myself as the representative of other gentlemen on the committee; those gentlemen possess a competence, far beyond mine, to explain and defend the power of the General Government to carry into effect its constitutional laws. The bill is founded upon a Message from the President, communicated on the 16th instant, and proposes to sustain the constitutionality of the doctrines laid down in that admired state paper. In the outset of the discussion, it is admitted that the bill points to an afflicting state of things existing in a Southern State of the Union; it is not to be disguised that it points to the State of South Carolina. It is not in the contemplation of the committee who reported this bill, to make it assume, in any way, an invidious character. When the gentleman from South Carolina threw out the suggestion that the bill was invidious, he certainly did not intend to impute to the committee a design to give it such a character. So far from being invidious, the bill was made general and sweeping, in its terms and application, for the reason that this course was thought to be more delicate in regard to the State concerned. The provisions of the bill were made general, for the purpose of enforcing everywhere the collection laws of the Union.

JANUARY, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

The bill presents three very important and momentous considerations: Is there any thing in the circumstances of the country calling for legislation on the subject of the revenue laws? Is the due administration of those laws threatened with impediments? and is this bill suited to such an emergency? He proposed to consider those points, but in a desultory manner. He never shrunk from any moral or political responsibility, but he had no disposition (to use the words of the Senator from North Carolina) to "drum on public sensibility." Neither he nor the State which he represented had any influence in bringing up these questions, but he was prepared to meet the crisis by his vote.

It is time (continued Mr. W.) that the principles on which the Union depends were discussed. It is time that Congress expressed an opinion upon them. It is time that the people should bring their judgment to bear on this subject, and settle it forever. The authority of Congress and of the people must settle this question one day or other. There were many enlightened men in the country, men whose integrity and patriotism nobody doubts, who had arrived at opinions in this matter very different from his own. The Senator from South Carolina knows (said Mr. W.) the respect in which I hold him; but I am unwilling to take his judgment on this question as the guide of mine; and I will not agree that the Union depends on the principles which he has advanced. He has offered a document as a plea in bar; if it be established, then a bar is interposed between the powers of the Government and the acts of South Carolina.

The bill is of great importance, not on account of its particular provisions, but of their application to a rapidly approaching crisis, which they were intended to meet. That crisis was in the control of this body, not of any branch of the Government. He would ask the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. POINDEXTER) what authority he had to say that the passage of any bill reducing the tariff would avert the enforcement of the ordinance of South Carolina? He was unwilling to consider that Senator as the representative of the unlimited authority and sovereignty claimed by the State of South Carolina. He would now present to the Senate a view of the position in which South Carolina had placed herself, in order to justify the committee in reporting the bill under consideration. It was not, sir, for the purpose of establishing a military despotism, nor of creating an armed dictator, nor of sending into South Carolina military bands to "cut the throats of women and children," that the committee framed the bill. If any thing can ever establish a military despotism in this country, it is the anarchy and confusion which the principles contended for by the Senator from South Carolina will produce. If we keep together, not "ten years," nor tens of thousands of years, will ever bring the country under the dominion of military despotism. But adopt the principles of South Carolina—break the Union into fragments—some chieftain may bring the fragments together, but it will be under a military despotism. He would not say that South Carolina contemplated this result, but he did say that her principles would lead to it. South Carolina, not being able longer to bear the burden of an oppressive law, had determined on resistance.

The excitement raised in the State gave to the party a majority in the Legislature of the State, and a convention was called, under the provision of the State constitution authorizing its amendment. The convention met, and passed what is called the ordinance, establishing new and fundamental principles. Without repeating it, he would call the attention of the Senate to some few of its provisions. It overthrew the whole revenue system. It was not limited to the acts of 1828 or 1832, but ended with a solemn declaration, that, in that State, no taxes should be collected. The addresses of the convention to the people of the United States and of the State of South Carolina used a tone and language not to be misunderstood. They tell you it is necessary for some one State to bring the question to issue—that Carolina will do it—that Carolina had thrown herself into the breach, and would stand foremost in resistance to the laws of the Union; and they solemnly call upon the citizens of the State to stand by the principles of the ordinance, for it is determined that no taxes shall be collected in that State. The ordinance gives the Legislature the power to carry into execution this determination. It contains within itself no seeds of dissolution; it is unlimited as to time; contains no restrictions as to application; provides no means for its amendment, modification, or repeal. In their private, individual capacity, some members of the convention held out the idea which had been advanced by some members of this House, that if the tariff law was made less oppressive, the ordinance would not be enforced.

[Mr. POINDEXTER here remarked, that he said that any new tariff law, even if more oppressive than the law of 1832, were passed, the ordinance would not apply to it.]

If the terms of the ordinance are considered, (continued Mr. W.,) there is no possible mode of arresting it; so sure as time rolls on, and four days pass over our heads, the ordinance, and the laws emanating from it, will lead to the employment of physical force, by the citizens of South Carolina, against the enforcement of the revenue laws. Although many of the most influential citizens of Carolina protested against the idea that any but moral force would be resorted to, yet the excitement and determined spirit of the people would, in his opinion, lead speedily to the employment of physical force. He did not doubt that the Senator from South Carolina abhorred the idea of force; no doubt his excellent heart would bleed at the scene which it would produce;

but he would refer to a passage in the ordinance to prove that it was the intention of its framers to resort to force. Mr. W. here read the third paragraph of the ordinance.

"And it is further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any of the constituted authorities, whether of this State or of the United States, to enforce the payment of duties imposed by the said acts within the limits of this State; but it shall be the duty of the Legislature to adopt such measures and pass such acts as may be necessary to give full effect to this ordinance, and to prevent the enforcement and arrest the operation of the said acts and parts of acts of the Congress of the United States within the limits of this State, from and after the 1st of February next; and the duty of all other constituted authorities, and of persons residing or being within the limits of this State, and they are hereby required and enjoined, to obey and give effect to this ordinance, and such acts and measures of the Legislature as may be passed or adopted in obedience thereto." *

* The following is the entire ordinance:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by various acts, purporting to be acts laying duties and imposts on foreign imports, but in reality intended for the protection of domestic manufactures, and the giving of bounties to classes and individuals engaged in particular employments, at the expense and to the injury and oppression of other classes and individuals, and by wholly exempting from taxation certain foreign commodities, such as are not produced or manufactured in the United States, to afford a pretext for imposing higher and excessive duties on articles similar to those intended to be protected, hath exceeded its just powers under the constitution, which confers on it no authority to afford such protection, and hath violated the true meaning and intent of the constitution, which provides for equality in imposing the burdens of taxation upon the several States and portions of the confederacy: And whereas the said Congress, exceeding its just power to impose taxes and collect revenue for the purpose of effecting and accomplishing the specific objects and purposes which the Constitution of the United States authorizes it to effect and accomplish, hath raised and collected unnecessary revenue for objects unauthorized by the constitution:

We, therefore, the people of the State of South Carolina, in convention assembled, do declare and ordain, and it is hereby declared and ordained, that the several acts and parts of acts of the Congress of the United States, purporting to be laws for the imposing of duties and imposts on the importation of foreign commodities, and now having actual operation and effect within the United States, and, more especially, an act entitled "An act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved on the nineteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, and also an act entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved on the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, are unauthorized by the Constitution of the United States, and violate the true meaning and intent thereof, and are null, void, and no law, nor binding upon this State, its officers or citizens; and all promises, contracts, and obligations, made or entered into, or to be made or entered into, with purpose to secure the duties imposed by the said acts, and all judicial proceedings which shall be hereafter had in affirmance thereof, are and shall be held utterly null and void.

And it is further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any of the constituted authorities, whether of this State or of the United States, to enforce the payment of duties imposed by the said acts within the limits of this State; but it shall be the duty of the Legislature to adopt such measures and pass such acts as may be necessary to give full effect to this ordinance, and to prevent the enforcement and arrest the operation of the said acts and parts of acts of the Congress of the United States within the limits of this State, from and after the 1st day of February next, and the duty of all other constituted authorities, and of all persons residing or being within the limits of this State, and they are hereby required and enjoined to obey and give effect to this ordinance, and such acts and measures of the Legislature as may be passed or adopted in obedience thereto.

Does the shadow follow the sun? Even so surely will force follow the attempt to disobey

And it is further ordained, that in no case of law or equity, decided in the courts of this State, wherein shall be drawn in question the authority of this ordinance, or the validity of such act or acts of the Legislature as may be passed for the purpose of giving effect thereto, or the validity of the aforesaid acts of Congress imposing duties, shall any appeal be taken or allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, nor shall any copy of the record be permitted or allowed for that purpose; and if any such appeal shall be attempted to be taken, the courts of this State shall proceed to execute and enforce their judgments, according to the laws and usages of the State, without reference to such attempted appeal, and the person or persons attempting to take such appeal may be dealt with as for a contempt of the court.

And it is further ordained, that all persons now holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, civil or military, under this State, (members of the Legislature excepted,) shall, within such time, and in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe, take an oath well and truly to obey, execute, and enforce this ordinance, and such act or acts of the Legislature as may be passed in pursuance thereof, according to the true intent and meaning of the same; and on the neglect or omission of any such person or persons so to do, his or their office or offices shall be forthwith vacated, and shall be filled up as if such person or persons were dead or had resigned; and no person hereafter elected to any office of honor, profit, or trust, civil or military (members of the Legislature excepted), shall, until the Legislature shall otherwise provide and direct, enter on the execution of his office, or be in any respect competent to discharge the duties thereof, until he shall, in like manner, have taken a similar oath; and no juror shall be empanelled in any of the courts of this State, in any cause in which shall be in question this ordinance, or any act of the Legislature passed in pursuance thereof, unless he shall first, in addition to the usual oath, have taken an oath that he will well and truly obey, execute, and enforce this ordinance, and such act or acts of the Legislature as may be passed to carry the same into operation and effect, according to the true intent and meaning thereof.

And we, the people of South Carolina, to the end that it may be fully understood by the Government of the United States, and the people of the co-States, that we are determined to maintain this our ordinance and declaration, at every hazard, do further declare that we will not submit to the application of force, on the part of the Federal Government, to reduce this State to obedience, but that we will consider the passage, by Congress, of any act authorizing the employment of a military or naval force against the State of South Carolina, her constituted authorities or citizens; or any act abolishing or closing the ports of this State, or any of them, or otherwise obstructing the free ingress and egress of vessels to and from the said ports, or any other act on the part of the Federal Government, to coerce the State, shut up her ports, destroy or harass her commerce, or to enforce the acts hereby declared to be null and void, otherwise than through the civil tribunals of the country, as inconsistent with the longer continuance of South Carolina in the Union: and that the people of this State will thenceforth hold themselves absolved from all further obligation to maintain or preserve their political connection with the people of the other States, and will forthwith proceed to organize a separate Government, and do all other acts and things which sovereign and independent States may of right do.

Done in convention at Columbia, the twenty-fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and in the fifty-seventh year of the Declaration of the Independence of the United States of America.

[SENATE.]

the laws of South Carolina. In the last paragraph of the ordinance is this passage:

"Determined to support this ordinance at every hazard,"—and this declaration is made by a courageous and chivalrous people—"we do further declare that we will not submit to the application of force, on the part of the Federal Government, to reduce this State to obedience."

This attempt, said Mr. W., is not made by this bill, or by any one.

"But that we will consider the passage, by Congress, of any act authorizing the employment of a military or naval force against the State of South Carolina, her constituted authorities or citizens, or any act abolishing or closing the ports of this State, or any of them, or otherwise obstructing the free ingress and egress of vessels to and from the said ports, or any other act on the part of the Federal Government to coerce the State, shut up her ports, destroy or harass her commerce, or to enforce the acts hereby declared to be null and void, otherwise than through the civil tribunals of the country, as inconsistent with the longer continuance of South Carolina in the Union."

Force must inevitably be used in case any attempt is made by the Federal Government to enforce the acts which have been declared null and void. The ordinance clearly establishes nullification as the law of the land.

[Mr. MILLER: Will the Senator read a little further?]

Mr. W. finished the paragraph, as follows:

"And that the people of this State will thenceforth hold themselves absolved from all further obligation to maintain or preserve their political connection with the people of the other States, and will forthwith proceed to organize a separate Government, and do all other acts and things which sovereign and independent States may of right do."

They stop with nullification; but one step further on the part of the Government brings down secession and revolution.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It is not intended to use any force, except against force. We shall not stop the proceedings of the United States courts, but maintain the authority of our own judiciary.

Mr. WILKINS.—How can the ordinance refer to any laws of the United States, when they are excluded from any operation within the limits of the State? Why do the laws and ordinance of South Carolina shut out the United States courts from appellate jurisdiction? Why do they shut the doors of the State courts against any inquisition from the United States courts? They intend that there shall be no jurisdiction over this subject, except through their own courts. They cut off the federal judiciary from all authority in that State, and bring back the state of things which existed prior to the formation of the federal constitution.

Here nullification is disclaimed, on one hand, unless we abolish our revenue system. We consenting to do this, they remain quiet. But if we go a hair's breadth towards enforcing that system, they present secession. We have secession on one hand, and nullification on the other. The Senator from South Carolina admitted the other day that no such thing as constitutional secession could exist. Then civil war, disunion, and anarchy must accompany secession. No one denies the right of revolution. That is a natural, indefeasible, inherent right—a right which we have exercised and held out, by our example, to the civilized world. Who denies it? Then we have revolution by force, not constitutional secession. That violence must come by secession is certain. Another law passed by the Legislature of South Carolina, is entitled "A bill to provide for the safety of the people of South Carolina." It advises them to put on their armor. It puts them in military array; and for what purpose but for the use of force? The provisions of these laws are infinitely worse than those of the federal system, so far as they apply to the citizens of Carolina. But with its operations on their own citizens, he had nothing to do. Resistance was just as inevitable as the arrival of the day on the calendar. In addition to these documents, what did rumor say—rumor, which often falsifies, but sometimes utters truth. If we judge by newspaper and other reports, more men were now ready to take up arms in Carolina than there were during the revolutionary struggle. The whole State was at this moment in arms, and its citizens are ready to be embattled the moment any attempt was made to enforce the revenue laws. The city of Charleston wore the appearance of a military depot. As a further proof of the necessity of this bill, he would read a printed paper, which might pass for what it was worth.

Mr. CALHOUN. What paper is it? Has it a signature?

Mr. WILKINS. It is a circular, but not signed. Mr. W. then read the paper as follows:

(Circular.)

ascertaining at what points depots of provisions, say of corn, fodder, and bacon, can be established on the main roads leading through your district, at suitable stations, say from thirty to forty miles apart. Looking to the event of a possible call for troops of every description, especially of mounted men, in a sudden emergency, you will ascertain the routes by which they could most conveniently pass through your respective districts, and the proper points at which they may put up after the usual day's march. Having settled this, the next point will be to inquire whether there are any persons at or near those points, who would undertake, on terms to be stipulated, to furnish corn, fodder, and meat, in what quantities, and at what notice? It is desirable that this arrangement should be effected, so as to enable us to command an adequate supply in the event of its being wanted, without actually making purchases at present. If this be impracticable, however, you must then see on what terms purchases can be effected, where, and on what manner the articles can be deposited and taken care of? I will here give you a general outline of my scheme. I will suppose three great routes to be marked out from the mountains towards the sea; one leading from Laurenceville, through Newberry, to Columbia; another from Yorkville and Union, by Winsboro', and Chesterville, to Columbia; and the third from Pendleton, through Abbeville and Edgefield, Burnwell, and Colleton, to Charleston. Along these routes depots would have to be established at intervals of thirty or forty miles, besides separate depots at Camden and some other places. From Columbia these stations would be necessary along the State road to Charleston. But one other route would then, perhaps, be necessary to be provided for, beginning at Darlington Court-house, and ending at Georgetown; one station to be at Kingstree, and another at Lynche's Creek. From all other places some one of these stations might be struck. I present this imperfect outline merely to give you some idea of my general scheme. Your particular attention will, of course, be directed to your own district; and, if you find it necessary, you may call in my aids from the adjoining districts, and such staff officers as you may think proper, and consult with them as to the best method of connecting the districts by some general plan, and favor me with the result.

"Another object to which I would call your early and particular attention, is the state of the arms, public and private, in the hands of the men. Great numbers have been issued from time to time, especially within a few years past. I wish to know how many of them may be relied on in the event of actual service. For this purpose, it must be ascertained, from actual inspection or otherwise, how many men in each company have muskets, rifles or other arms fit for use; and any unfit for use must be repaired. The latter must be collected together and repaired, if it can be effected in your neighborhood; and, if not, they must be boxed up and sent to Charleston; when, after being repaired at the public expense, they will be returned to the companies to which they may belong. To execute the arduous, responsible, and difficult duties imposed by this order, you are authorized to call to your assistance all the officers of the staff within your district; and, if further assistance is wanted, additional officers will be appointed. The travelling expenses of yourself, and such officers as you may employ in this business, will be paid. You will issue the necessary orders in my name, countersigned by yourself as aide-de-camp, to all officers within your district, urging them to do whatever you may find necessary to the prompt and effectual execution of this order. You will, when convenient, call upon the brigadier or major-generals, within your district, for their co-operation and assistance, and, generally, adopt all proper measures for the accomplishment of the important objects which I have in view, which may be stated in a few words to be to secure the means of subsistence, so as to be enabled to bring troops to any given point in the shortest possible time—to ascertain the state of the arms now in the hands of the men—and to have those unfit for use put in complete order. If any other means occur to you of accomplishing, in the promptest manner, these vitally important objects, you will be so good as to suggest them.

"I am, very respectfully, &c.

"N. B. I annex the form of three orders, which you may find it necessary to extend, to enable you to accomplish the objects we have in view. You may modify them as you think proper, and then have copies served on each of the officers, who may be required to execute them within your district. They are not to be published in the papers. Copies of all such orders as you may issue must be sent to me."

Adverting to another circumstance, as tending to show the excitement prevailing in South Carolina against the General Government, Mr. W. said, that in every part of the State, the blue cockade with the Palmetto button, was generally worn. That bit of ribbon, and the button, were no trifling sign of the military spirit prevalent among the people.

It seemed to him, indeed, from all these facts, known to us, officially and by rumor, that it was impossible to avoid a collision with South Carolina, while her ordinance remained in force; and that those gentlemen who represented that the passage of any bill by us would defeat the ordinance, and prevent a collision, had mistaken the sense of the ordinance, and the intention of the people of South Carolina.

[Mr. MILLER here interposed, and said he had not expressed the opinion that nullification would be abandoned upon the passage of a bill of any character in reference to the tariff. If Congress passed a bill altering the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832, he was of opinion that such act would set aside the ordinance, which was specific in its application to the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832. Even if a bill more oppressive than the existing acts should pass, the ordinance now existing would thereby be defeated, and South Carolina would be under the necessity of assembling another convention, and passing another ordinance.]

Mr. WILKINS found, he said, that he was not far from right. What prospect, then, was there of an abandonment, by South Carolina, of her present position? She offers us but two modes of adjusting the matter in dispute. The first is by the total abandonment of the protective system; by the admission of the whole list of protected articles free of all duty, and raising the whole revenue derived from duties on imports exclusively from the unprotected articles. The consequence of the adoption of this policy, would be most fatal and disastrous to the industry of the Northern States. It would put the laboring classes of Pennsylvania on a footing with the paupers of the old world. It would prostrate at once and forever the policy which Pennsylvania had long cherished, which South Carolina had united with her in establishing and maintaining, and under which she was prosperous and happy. The admirable speech made by the Senator from South Carolina, in 1816, in favor of the protective policy, was engraved on the hearts of the people of Pennsylvania. In the dwellings of the farmer, mechanic, and the manufacturer, it hung upon the wall, by the side of Washington's Farewell Address. He well remembered that speech, for it had a powerful influence on his own mind in relation to the policy of the protective system.

[Mr. CALHOUN here said, I thank the gentleman for alluding to that speech. It has been much and very often misrepresented, and I shall take an early opportunity to explain it.]

Mr. WILKINS—I shall be happy to witness the exhibition of the Senator's ingenuity in explaining the speech in such a manner as to make it accord with his present views. I should not have alluded to it, had not the Senator remarked upon the bill from our committee as a bill "of abominations."

Mr. CALHOUN—It requires no apology.

Mr. WILKINS proceeded to state the considerations which rendered a compliance with the terms proposed by South Carolina improbable, if not impossible. For his own part, he was free to say that he could not bring his mind to assent to so destructive a measure. He spoke only for himself. What were the views of others of this body on this subject he did not know, for he was not in the habit of making inquiries as to the opinions of others on such topics. Much as he loved the Union—much as he deprecated any collision between the State and Federal Governments—much as he was disposed to respect the opinions and wishes of a sister State—he would not himself assent to a total destruction even of incidental protection to our domestic industry. He would, however, go far, very far, even to the sacrifice of much of that protection which we claim as just and necessary; but to the point proposed by South Carolina as her ultimatum, he could not go.

He did not believe that there was any probability of the assent, on the part of Congress, to the first proposition of South Carolina. There was but one other proposition made by South Carolina for the adjustment of this controversy, and that was even less hopeful than the former. It was by the call of a general convention of the States, and the submission to them of an ultimate arbitrament on the disputed powers. Mr. W. was of the opinion that the division of the State representation assembled in convention on the matters in controversy would not differ from the judgment of the representatives assembled in Congress. He did not think it at all probable that the convention would either alter the constitution in respect to the powers of the Government over the subject of revenue, or that the protective laws would be pronounced by them unconstitutional, and null and void. But it was not at all probable that two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the States would agree to the call of a general convention. The people were averse to any change in the constitution, and were of opinion that it could not be amended for the better. For his own part, it was his earnest hope, and confident belief, that no change would ever be made in the terms of our admirable compact.

Here Mr. W. yielded to a motion for adjournment, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 31.

The Collection Bill.

The subject again coming up—

Mr. WILKINS resumed his remarks on it. He commenced by stating that, on a proper occasion, he should move one or two amendments to the bill, one of which would be to limit some of its provisions to the end of the next session of Congress: the provisions which it contained for amending the judicial system, he presumed, there would be no objection to leaving, as they are in the bill, unlimited.

When the Senate adjourned yesterday, (Mr. W. continued,) I was speaking of the tariff system—of this system for the protection of American industry, which a vast portion of the American people believe to be intimately connected with the prosperity of the country. As a justification of the adherence, as far as practicable, to this system, he had had reference to the conduct of gentlemen from the South in regard to it. At one period, he now added, Maryland had been considered a Southern State, as she was still a slaveholding State: from the chief city of that State, directly after the meeting of Congress, under the constitution of 1787, a memorial was transmitted to Congress, reciting the weakness and inefficiency of the old confederacy, and its inadequacy to protect the manufacturing interests, and rejoicing that we had now a Government possessing all the necessary power to protect domestic industry, and praying the interposition of Congress for that purpose. Another incident he mentioned, which, he said, many members would recollect, of a member of Congress from South Carolina having, in the year 1809, offered a resolution proposing that all the members of Congress should appear, at the commencement of the next ensuing session, clad entirely in clothing of American manufacture. He had already adverted to the agency of the South in passing the tariff law of 1816, and now, said he, let me make a personal reference, in connection with it, to another gentleman from South Carolina, now a member of this body, (Mr. MILLER;) which reference I make with all possible respect for that gentleman. When the bill of 1816 was under discussion, that gentleman, then a member of the other House, made a motion, deeply interesting to Pennsylvania, and for which I, as one of her sons, feel grateful to him, to raise the duties on hammered bar iron (which the bill proposed to raise from nine to sixteen dollars per ton) to twenty dollars per ton. Thus amended, the bill passed the House, but the duty was reduced in the Senate to sixteen. On the final passage of the bill, including that and other duties, three members only from South Carolina were present, and they all voted for the bill. Strange revolution of opinion! It is now contended by the same gentleman that a duty of eighteen dollars upon the same article, (two dollars below her own proposition,) as fixed by the tariff of 1832, is so onerous, oppressive, and tyrannical, that the whole country is to be involved in a civil war, if not only that, but every other protective duty be not abolished!

Mr. W. said he had also spoken, yesterday, in justification of the strongest provisions of this bill, of the talked-of resistance to the laws in South Carolina. He had understood the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) the other day, as acknowledging that there was military array in South Carolina, but contending that it followed and did not precede the array of force by the United States.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had admitted that there was military preparation, not array.

Mr. WILKINS said, if we examine the measures taken by the Administration in reference to the present crisis, it would be found that they were not at all of that military character to justify the measures of South Carolina which it was alleged had followed them.

Mr. CALHOUN said that South Carolina was undoubtedly preparing to resist force by force. But, let the United States withdraw its forces from her borders, and lay this bill upon the table, and her preparations would cease.

Mr. WILKINS resumed. That is, sir, if we do not oppose any of her movements, all will be right. If we fold our arms, and exhibit a perfect indifference whether the laws of the Union are obeyed or not, all will be quiet! This, I admit, would be an admirable mode to avoid collision and prevent disturbance; but is it one that we can submit to? The moment we fail to counteract the nullification proceedings of South Carolina, the Union is dissolved; for, in this Government of laws, union is obedience, and obedience is union. The moment South Carolina—

Mr. CALHOUN.—Who relies upon force in this controversy? I have insisted upon it that South Carolina relied altogether on civil process, and that, if the General Government resorts to force, then only will South Carolina rely upon force. If force be introduced by either party, upon that party will fall the responsibility.

Mr. WILKINS.—The General Government will not appeal, in the first instance, to force. It will appeal to the patriotism of South Carolina—to that magnanimity of which she boasts so much.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am sorry that South Carolina cannot appeal to the sense of justice of the General Government. [Order! order! from one or two members.]

Mr. WILKINS.—The Government will appeal to that political sense which exhorts obedience to the laws of the country, as the first duty of the citizen. It will appeal to the moral force in the community. If that appeal be in vain, it will appeal to the judiciary. If the mild arm of the judiciary be not sufficient to execute the laws, it will call out the civil force to sustain the laws. If that be insufficient, God save and protect us from the last resort! But if the evil does come upon the country, who is responsible for it? If force be brought in to the aid of law, who, I ask of gentlemen, is responsible for it to the people of the United States? That is the question. Talk of it as you please, mystify matters as you will, theorize as you may, pile up abstract propositions to any extent, at last the question resolves itself into one of obedience or resistance of the laws—in other words, of union or disunion. Wherein (said Mr. W.) consists our liberty? What is the foundation of our political institutions which we boast of, which we hold up to the world for imitation, and for the enjoyment of which the votary of freedom pants in every country of the globe—what is it? It is that of a Government where the people make the laws, and where the people obey the laws which they themselves have made. That is our system of Government, and by a large majority of the people it is respected accordingly. Why, sir, (said Mr. W.) if you were to carry into effect the ultra doctrine of South Carolina at this moment, repeal your whole protective system, shut up our factories, stop our wheels, extinguish our fires, &c.—nay, ruin us by your legislation—yet would the people of Pennsylvania obey the laws, and abide your decision. But then they would appeal to the people; they would endeavor to bring public opinion to act upon Congress, and bear them back into the right course. They would appeal to moral influence, and to that alone.

I know (said Mr. W.) that the gentleman from South Carolina cannot anticipate the application of force in the case now presented; but I pray him, again and again, to advert to one particular paragraph of the ordinance. There were several cases in which the use of force is referred to in the ordinance, in which Mr. W. admitted the right to use it. If, for example, as in a case supposed, Congress intended to overrun and subdue the State of South Carolina, and overturn their liberties, he admitted the right of resistance by force. But, come down to the contingency in which the ordinance declares that force shall be used, and it is in the event of the attempt by the United States to enforce the execution of the revenue laws. "Enforce" is the word employed by the ordinance. For the meaning of this word it was not necessary to resort to Johnson or Webster: the law may be "enforced" by execution, by judicial process, by a simple demand of payment of duties by a United States officer. It needs not the iron grasp of power, the naked sword, or the fixed bayonet, to constitute enforcement of the laws. You enforce the laws every day, and every hour of every day, in the most tranquil state of society. This enforcement of the laws it is which is, after the 1st of February, to be construed into an attempt to put down the people of South Carolina, and to justify the calling forth of thousands upon thousands of armed men to resist it.

Mr. W. here referred to the Charleston Mercury, which he held in his hands, containing the proceedings of a great meeting held at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 21st instant, among which were a number of resolutions, adopting the cockade to which he had reference yesterday, intermingled with notices of "Call to arms!" "Attention volunteers!" &c.; and one of these resolutions (which he read) declares that the persons assembled at this meeting not only affirm the right of the State peaceably to secede from the Union, but are prepared, if needs be, to peril their lives in the assertion of this claim, &c. Yea, sir, said Mr. W., if not prevented, secession is at hand; for the very moment that the marshal of the district calls out the posse comitatus, and heads that posse to enforce a judgment of the federal court to compel the payment of duties on imports, (after the 1st of February,) then has the contingency occurred of an attempt to enforce the laws; then has secession become the alternative. With regard to secession, Mr. W. went on to cite cases to show the consequences to which the admission of this right in any State would lead, should other States adopt the heresy affirmed by the meeting whose proceedings he had read. This view of the subject he followed by saying, that nullification, unless merged in revolution, was not to be stopped. The honorable member had told the House, that laying this bill on the table, and passing the bill depending in the other House, would put a stop to nullification. But what surety was there even of this? After the 1st of February, nullification, with all its attributes and incidents, was to be in full operation in South Carolina. What would be its political operation? Where would it end? He put this question plainly to the gentleman from South Carolina. A convention of the States was out of the question; an amendment of the constitution was out of the question—where was the contest to end? Why, the laws must be suspended. South Carolina, whilst represented on this floor, (ably as she is, and he hoped long would be,) participating in the making of laws, would be obeying just such of them as she pleased, and no more—cutting and carving with her own sword to suit herself! What a state of things was this!

[Mr. CALHOUN here said, that South Carolina would be content to maintain this contest upon the principle of protection, paying, without objection, whatever taxes might be required to be levied for the purposes of revenue.]

Mr. WILKINS—If South Carolina appeals to the federal judiciary, she can bring up the question of the validity of any part of the revenue laws for decision, by the federal courts. Mr. W. had no doubt of the influence of the Senator from South Carolina over the people of that State, but no one had the power to say what course that State would take if the suggestion of the Senator should be adopted. We must take this matter as we unfortunately find it. The merchants of Charleston may import goods free of duty, and the merchants of Baltimore, New York, &c., must pay duties. The people of South Carolina are exempt from all taxation by duties on imports, which is the only taxation known to our laws; and the people of the rest of the Union are compelled to pay taxes. South Carolina participates in the benefits, but not in the burdens of the Government. The ordinance, to this effect, South Carolina is pledged to maintain; and it declares that no power shall prevent free ingress and egress into and from her ports. Every stream of water in the limits of the State, accessible from the ocean, is made a free port. Wherever goods are introduced and landed, all obligation to pay the duties vanishes before the magical influence of nullification.

The State of South Carolina is, quoad the revenue laws, out of the Union. As to the revenue system, our fellow-citizens of South Carolina are gone from us. What, then, is to prevent the goods imported into the State from being distributed into every part of the interior and along the coast? A legalized system would be introduced—he would not say of smuggling, for he would not impute so opprobrious a crime to the authorities of that State; but free ports make free goods, and nullification makes free ports. Well, sir, what will prevent the goods from being sent to other States? Take the marks off from the goods, and they may be sent anywhere. If nullification exempt goods from duties in South Carolina, it exempts them everywhere. They are marked "State rights," and the vessel is called "State sovereignty." They will not be imported under the glorious flag of the Union, but under the flag of South Carolina. South Carolina has got her ordinance. Now we shall see how she will put it in execution, how it works practically. It will make general confusion, defeat equality in public burdens, and demoralize the community.

As nullification is now about to go into full operation, what is to stay the hands of South Carolina, and prevent her from executing her present purpose? He was aware of the wide range of discussion which the question connected with this subject would lead to. But this was the time for bringing those questions before Congress for decision. They should decide now, in one way or other. I am young and stout, said Mr. W., and am willing to see the question tried, and to abide the end of it. The whole question comes to a single point. What is the constitutional relation of a single State to the United States? If the Government is merely an "alliance of States," a federal league between several distinct and independent sovereignties, from which any one may withdraw, there is an end of the question and of our bill. For South Carolina, leaning upon her sovereignty and reserved rights, has exercised the power which she claims of obeying and disobeying a law of the Union, just as he may construe it to be constitutional or unconstitutional.

An attempt on his part to throw any additional light on this subject would be as unnecessary as to contribute a drop of water to the ocean. It was enough for him that he had a few well-settled principles on this point, which he had always entertained, and which had been acted on from the foundation of the Government to the present time. The constitution was formed by the people. It was adopted by the States, which, like individuals, surrendered a portion of their sovereignty for the security of the rest. Those powers which are thus surrendered, however limited in number, are supreme in extent and application. The second paragraph in the 6th article of the constitution was, as it appeared to him, framed to meet this very case—to meet State legislation, State nullification—to meet the case of State legislation which attempts to overthrow national legislation.

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

This supremacy of power was necessary for the general welfare, because it consists in the use of powers which could not be confined to, nor exercised by, any one State. We always had a Union. The great object of the people, from one period to another, has been to render the Union "more perfect." Virginia took the lead in the last attempt, and her statesmen were among its former champions. Experience had manifested the want of a supreme power to bear immediately upon the people of the States. The laws of the old confederation bore on the States alone. Hence the constitution begins, "We, the people;" and the conclusion of the 8th section of the 1st article, giving power to Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof," and the emphatic conclusion declaring such laws to be the supreme law of the land, in the aggregate sense of the term.

We owe allegiance both to the United States and to the State of which we are citizens. Are there, sir, any citizens who owe no allegiance to the United States? Have the people of South Carolina abandoned the proud title of citizens of the United States? Has the General Government any power or quality of political sovereignty at all? If it has, that power must be brought to bear directly upon the people of the States, and of each State.

The Government of the United States forms a part of the Government of each State, enters into it, and supplies whatever may be wanting in State powers. You cannot bring about obedience to the laws, if their obligations and binding force are not directly on the people. If the laws are brought to bear on the States, they may wrap themselves up in their sovereignty and their reserved rights, resort to nullification, and, claiming the power to put their veto on the acts of Congress, they may overthrow your whole system of legislation. This doctrine impairs not the sovereignty of the people. The people retain their sovereignty in reference to the United States as well as to their respective States. They act here as well as in their State Legislatures. Whenever you exercise one of your great constitutional powers, the people act here, and are therefore bound by the law which they themselves made. This is the perfection of political institutions. The people make the laws, and the laws govern. The States are secure in their rights, and always were secure. He admitted their original absolute sovereignty; but, as he had said before, they yielded up a portion of that sovereignty for the general good.

This is a constitution of power "granted," as a lawyer would say, "for a valuable consideration." By the grant of these powers, you created the constitution of the Union. You cannot take them back at pleasure. Here are we asked—can the creature be greater than the creator? No. But the creator may be bound by the act of the creature; the principal may be bound by the act of the agent, if the agent acts in pursuance of delegated power, particularly when the interests of third persons are concerned. We say to South Carolina, our prosperity depends upon the permanence of a system which you created; and you cannot take back the power which you gave to your agents to exercise.

On the subject of practical nullification, Mr. W. said he had made some notes, and the very circumstances which he had anticipated had happened. From a late number of the Charleston Mercury, which he held in his hand, he read an account of a great State rights meeting at Charleston, whereat resolutions were adopted for forming companies to import goods free of duty. The merchants of South Carolina would, it was thought, be reluctant to hazard their commercial credit and convenience by availing themselves of the replevin law; and it had been doubted, whether the force of the ordinance would be tried. But, as he had expected, the politicians, not the merchants, had formed a plan for trying the experiment. Preparations had been made to bring the question to an issue as soon as the 1st day of February arrived. He had made a note of the questions which would arise out of these considerations, but he would not detain the Senate by noticing them.

He would pass to the consideration of the provisions in the bill. The first section of the bill contains provisions which are preventive and peaceful. Mr. W. then read from the first section of the bill, as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c. That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or unlawful threats or menaces against officers of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to execute the revenue laws, and collect the duties on imports in the ordinary way in any collection district, it shall and may be lawful for the President to direct that the custom-house for such district be established and kept in any secure place within some port or harbor of such district, either upon land or on board any vessel," &c.

It enjoins forbearance on the Executive, and gives him power to remove the custom-house to a secure place, where the duties may be collected. It leaves the ports and districts as they now are, open for the commercial convenience of the good people of the State; and even the custom-house would not be taken from the port or harbor where it now is. Our object in removing the custom-house is to prevent all collision, if possible. The words "threats and menaces" do not run through the residue of the section. The power given in this clause is not new; the clause is simply declaratory of the existing law, as it has been held by our courts; for it has been decided, that where it is impossible to collect the duties, the officers of the customs may remove the custom-house.

The next paragraph provides for the cash payment of duties under circumstances which render it impossible to collect the duties in the ordinary way. This is no great matter. We have already abolished the credits on duties to some extent, and this law carries out the system farther. Why should the practice of taking bonds be persisted in when they say they are not bound to pay the bonds. It is a mockery to take bonds when the constitution and the law release the people bound from the obligation of the bonds. Suits must be brought to enforce the payment of the bonds, and the authority of the State and federal tribunals would thereby be brought into conflict, which conflict the bill sought to avoid. The 62d section of the act of the 2d March, 1799, refuses credit to merchants who have refused to pay their bonds. The same principle is applied to the present case, where people are combined to prevent the payment of bonds.

The third and remaining exigency provided for in this first section is the authority to employ the land or naval forces, or militia. This provision is entirely defensive. It merely confirms the authority for the protection of the custom-house and revenue officers. The simple question is—do you require obedience to the laws? How can you make the people of South Carolina pay the duties? The custom-house officers are not sufficiently numerous to enforce obedience to the laws; pains, penalties, indictments, all hang over the head of that man who is bold enough to exact payment. The Legislature forbids the enforcement of the law; and he who attempts to enforce it must suffer the penalty of the law as surely as he is convicted of the offence. The marshal, in this stage of the business, cannot interpose. The militia cannot be called out, for the best reason in the world—that they are committed in support of the other side of the question. Now what is to be done? It is the duty of the President to take care that the laws shall be executed. He is invested with the power by the constitution, and the public hold him responsible for its exercise. You can vest the power nowhere else. The first section of the second article of the constitution invests the President with the "executive power," and he is required to take an oath faithfully to execute the office and preserve the constitution. The second section of the same article makes him the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia, when called into actual service. The only question is—is it necessary to give these means to enforce the laws? If we intend to enforce obedience to the laws, these powers must be given, and nowhere can they be constitutionally lodged but in the President. We give Andrew Jackson power simply to execute, for a limited time, the revenue laws of the country. Well, we confide this power to a man who has never abused any power reposed in him. He said that these proceedings were long anticipated. They were the subject of discussion during the late Presidential contest. Every vote had an eye to the South. He spoke this with respect to the other candidates, all of whom he knew would have supported the constitution. He made no invidious distinctions.

Why did South Carolina throw away her vote on a distinguished individual, who was not a candidate? With an eye to this question. Why did the people of the United States vote for Andrew Jackson? With a view to this same question. For this provision in the law there was a precedent, to which he would refer. The act of 9th January, 1809, sec. 11–18, vol. 4, p. 194–'5, to enforce the embargo, &c. The 2d section of the bill extends the jurisdiction of the circuit courts in revenue cases. It gives the right to sue in these courts for any injury incurred by officers, whilst engaged under the laws of Congress in the collection of duties on imports. It declares that property taken under the authority of the laws of the United States shall be irrepleviable, and only subject to the order and decrees of the courts of the United States; and it gives the penalty for the rescue of the property as is prescribed by the act of 30th April, 1790, sec. 23, vol. 2, p. 95. The provisions of that law make the penalty not exceed three hundred dollars, and imprisonment for three months. This section has two objects in view: first, it gives power to the officers to sue in the federal courts; and second, it provides that they shall not be dispossessed of property seized by them under the laws of the General Government, without the authority of the courts of the United States. The object of this section is to meet legislation by legislation. There is nothing in this provision shocking or harsh.

The laws of South Carolina, made to enforce the ordinance, are harsh and oppressive beyond any of the feudal laws. Under the replevin act of South Carolina, the goods are first seized; if they are not given up, the return is made, and a capias in withernam issues; there is then a suit to recover back the duties; the custom-house officer cannot remove the suit to any other court, and the judges and jurors who are to decide the case are under oath to support the ordinance. For this misdemeanor the officers are subject to a fine of five hundred dollars and two years' imprisonment. And they are liable to have their own property to double the amount of the goods seized, taken, and carried away. Every professional man knows to what cases a replevin law is usually confined. It views the custom-house officer, while discharging his duty, as a trespasser. If the replevy is not obeyed, the intermediate inquiry which the common law provides is discarded, and a writ of reprisal issues. It is not left discretionary with the sheriff to take enough to satisfy the demand; but he is bound to take double the amount. There is no danger that this part of the law can ever be executed, for no one person will have property enough for so tremendous a grasp. The goods are taken finally from the custom-house officer and carried off; and if he attempts to recapture them, he is liable to a fine of ten thousand dollars, and two years' imprisonment. No such indictment is subject to traverse; that is, the accused shall not cross it; he shall not deny the facts alleged; he shall not plead "not guilty." This is the technical effect of refusing a traverse. But can the word be taken in that sense in South Carolina? Perhaps the word, as used in the ordinance, has a meaning peculiar to the South.

Mr. MILLER explained. The word had a peculiar meaning in South Carolina. At the first court the accused could traverse, but he had no right to continue the action. The ordinance denied the right of the accused to continue the case after the first term, except for cause shown. The ordinance, in creating this misdemeanor, merely applies it to the legal forms which in that State apply to all misdemeanors.

Mr. WILKINS.—It was apparent that the constitution of the courts in South Carolina makes it necessary to give the revenue officers the right to sue in the federal courts. It was not intended to restrict this right to any amount in controversy, nor to citizens of other States. It falls under the clause of the constitution which gives jurisdiction to the United States courts in all cases arising under the constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States. He would put a case in a few words: Suppose the collector of the port of South Carolina is prosecuted. He is carried to prison, or the capias in withernam is issued against him. His property is carried off and sold. The case comes before the State court. He sets forth that, under the laws of the United States, he was obliged to do his duty. On the other side, it is said that the laws of the United States had been nullified; and the State laws had taken their place. Out of this issue springs a case provided for by the bill. But it is objected that the case will arise under the State law. But, shape it which way you may, the case arises out of the laws and Constitution of the United States, and the judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity. It ought to be so. There ought to be a judicial power co-extensive with the power of legislation, and a co-extensive executive power. Without this co-extensive power, legislation would be useless in a free Government. Neither domestic tranquillity, nor uniformity of rules and decisions, can be secured without it.

It may be said (continued Mr. W.) that in this way you overturn the State legislation, and that they ought to give their own direction to State controversies. So they may; but let them not come in collision with the constitution and laws of the Union. In every controversy within any State, arising under a State law, coming in collision with the constitution, or with a law of the United States, the federal courts have appellate jurisdiction. He felt himself too much exhausted to read a case or two to which he desired to call the attention of the Senate. But he meant to content himself with a mere reference to the case of Martin vs. Hunter's lessee, in 1st Wheaton, p. 304, and the case of Cohens vs. the State of Virginia, 6th Wheaton, p. 584, where this point had been decided. If appellate jurisdiction be given, the original could not be desired. All the residuum of jurisdiction remaining, after the original jurisdiction given in specified cases to the Supreme Court, might be exercised in any way by the inferior courts that Congress might direct. These observations were applicable to the third section of the bill, which also provides for the extension of judicial jurisdiction, by allowing the party or officer of the United States sued in the State courts for executing the laws of the Union, to remove the case to the circuit court. It gives the right to remove at any time before trial, but not after judgment had been given; and thus affects in no way the dignity of the State tribunals. Whether in criminal or in civil cases, it gives this right of removal. Has Congress this power in criminal cases? He would answer this question in the affirmative. Congress had the power to give this right in criminal as well as in civil cases, because the second section of the third article of the constitution speaks of "all cases in law and equity;" and these comprehensive terms cover all. He referred to the case of Matthews vs. Zane, 4th Cranch, page 382, which decides that, if two citizens of the same State, in a suit in their State court, claim title under the same act of Congress, the Supreme Court has an appellate jurisdiction to revise and correct the decision of that court.

The decision was founded upon the principle that the 3d act of the constitution, considered in connection with the judiciary act of 1789, would not give it a more extensive construction than it merited; and that the great object was, to render uniform the construction of the laws of the United States, and decisions under them upon the rights of individuals; and in such case it was entirely immaterial that both parties were citizens of the same State.

It was admitted by Mr. Harper, counsel for defendant in error, that the exercise of jurisdiction in such case would be undoubted, if it was to maintain the authority of the laws of the United States against encroachments of the State authorities. The clause in the constitution to which he had adverted refers to the character of the controversy, without regard to the parties, or the particular form of the action. The object of the suit, and not the tribunal, determined the jurisdiction. Was it to try the validity of an act of congress? That question determined the jurisdiction. Was it to try any indictment for treason? That question determined the jurisdiction. It was more necessary that this jurisdiction should be extended over criminal than over civil cases. If it was not admitted that the federal judiciary had jurisdiction over criminal cases, then was nullification ratified and sealed forever: for a State would have nothing more to do than to declare an act a felony or a misdemeanor to nullify all the laws of the Union. There were numerous prejudices—prejudices peculiar to particular States, which, under any other view, would throw all jurisdiction into the State tribunals.

Mr. W. would put a case to the Southern gentlemen, by way of illustration. It was one which they would feel disposed to resent, and one to which he felt a repugnance to refer; but he would take it as illustrative of the opinions he had thrown out. There was to be found in the constitution a clause which gives the right to the owner of a slave to pursue him from one State to another, and to take him wherever he may find him. Now it was known that there was in some States a strong feeling on this subject, and that particularly was this sensibility to be found in the State of Pennsylvania, where it was carried to a very great extent. In great party times, he would suppose that a party in Pennsylvania rallied on this great principle. Pennsylvania was covered over with zealous and highly respectable abolition societies. He would suppose that Pennsylvania carried these feelings to such an extent, as to pass a law to nullify this clause in the constitution. He stated that he had, in the judicial station which he had occupied, had cases brought before him for decision, in which he had felt it to be extremely difficult to keep down this feeling. It had been even contended before him that the pursuit of the slave by his owner into that State was an unconstitutional act. He would suppose that Pennsylvania was to pass a law, declaring that the moment a slave sets foot on her soil, he shall be at once elevated to the rank and privileges of a freeman, and that thus she should nullify the clause in the constitution on this point.

It would be deemed very hard by the southern gentlemen that they could not try the question of the constitutionality of that law before the Supreme Court. And if the State of Pennsylvania were to pass a law imposing a fine of ten thousand dollars and five years' imprisonment on any owner of a slave found in pursuit of him, and that her jurors and judges are all sworn to regard this law, he would ask whether the United States courts could not have jurisdiction in this matter. The power of the Judiciary would be entirely nugatory if it could be evaded by throwing the case into the form of a criminal proceeding. He referred the Senate to the cases of the United States vs. Moore, 3d Cranch, p. 159, where it was admitted that Congress might give the power; and to that of Martin vs. Hunter's lessee, 1 Wheaton, p. 350-1, where it was admitted that criminal are the strongest cases.

The fourth section of the bill was merely matter of form. There was no constitutional principle involved in it. It only authorized the courts of the United States to supply the want of a copy of the record. It was intended to obviate the difficulty which was likely to arise from the novel provision contained in the 8th section of the replevin law of South Carolina, which makes it penal in the clerk to furnish such record. This provision did not meddle with the penalty of the clerk of the State court, but contented itself with providing means to supply the deficiency.

The fifth section authorizes the employment of military force under extraordinary circumstances too powerful to be overcome without such agency, and to be preceded by the proclamation of the President. What he had already said had reference also to this section of the bill. He would now merely refer the Senate to some precedents.

The first precedent which he would notice was to be found in the act of May 2d, 1792, vol. 2, p. 284, repealed by the act of February 28, 1795, renewing the power to call forth the militia, which act was still in force. This law grew out of the Western Insurrection in Pennsylvania. Like the present bill, although it was merely intended to meet that exigency, it was so framed as to continue in force. So the bill under consideration, although it had special reference to South Carolina, pointed not to her alone. If the opposition to the laws should extend itself, and the spirit of disobedience should exhibit itself, whether in the South or the North, the general principles of the bill would be equally applicable. It was an amendment of our code of laws to which the attention of Congress had now been called, and which was rendered immediately necessary by the peculiarity of our present situation.

The second precedent to which he would invite the attention of the Senate was the act of the 3d of March, 1807, vol. 4, p. 115, "to suppress insurrections and obstructions to the laws," and "to cause the laws to be duly executed." That act authorized the President to call out the land and naval forces to suppress insurrections, &c. These were the objects for which then, as in the present bill, this extraordinary power had been conferred.

Another precedent would be found in the act of January 9, 1809, sec. 11, vol. 4, p. 194, to enforce the embargo, and which gives the power to employ the land and naval forces, in general terms, to assist the custom-house officers. There was at that moment a great excitement, although nothing like the solemn position in which South Carolina has now placed herself. Yet it was deemed expedient to confer on the President this power.

He would now refer to the last precedent with which he should trouble the Senate. It so happened in the history of Pennsylvania, that that State took from Virginia a strip of land bordering on the Alleghany and Ohio Rivers. On this strip of land, where Virginia had been accustomed to exercise jurisdiction, for which she had opened the titles, and where she had held her courts, there arose an insurrection. This had been called the Western Insurrection, but it was a singular fact that it was confined to this narrow strip of land which Pennsylvania took from Virginia. The President was then authorized to call out the militia of the State, because they were not committed against the United States, but were willing to obey the call. The man to whose name history has no parallel put himself at the head of these troops to quell the insurrection. All power was placed in his hands by the act of November 24, 1794, vol. 2, p. 451, and the President was authorized to place in West Pennsylvania a corps of 2,500 men, either draughted or enlisted.

The sixth section of the bill had reference to the replevin law of South Carolina, and was justified and rendered necessary by the 12th section of that act, which prohibited any person from hiring or permitting to be used any building, to serve as a jail for the confinement of any person committed for a violation of the revenue laws, under penalty of being adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined 1,000 dollars, and imprisoned for one year. The State law, therefore, closes all the jails and buildings of South Carolina against prisoners held by process from the United States for a refusal to yield obedience to their laws. It was necessary, therefore, that something should be done. The case might not be fully met by the resolution of 3d March, 1791, vol. 2, p. 286; and this section merely incorporates that provision, without the introduction of any novel principle.

The seventh and remaining section of the bill extends the writ of habeas corpus to a case not covered by existing laws. These laws do not extend to any other than cases of confinement under the authority of the United States, and when committed for trial before the United States courts, or are necessary to testify. He referred the Senate to vol. 2, p. 63, to the 14th section of the judiciary act. The present section merely extended the privileges of that act, which was so essential to the protection of the liberties of our citizens. It extended the act to cases of imprisonment for executing the laws of the United States. There would be nothing objectionable in this section; it came in conflict with no code of law. If a citizen were confined under the provisions of the ordinance of the 24th November, 1832, he could have no remedy under the laws as they now exist. As all such cases arose under the laws of the State of South Carolina, this section only extended the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus to meet those particular cases which had originated in the present state of things.

He had now done, having fully attempted to explain the reasons which had induced him to give his sanction to the bill. He should only say, in addition, that if it were the pleasure of Congress to enact this bill into a law, he should most fervently pray that no occasion might ever occur to require a resort to its provisions. It was his desire that the present bill, when it should become a law, might be rendered unnecessary by a return of the state of happy tranquillity which would renew the cement of our Union, and might lie for ages to come, without the necessity of reference to its provisions, slumbering in the libraries of the lawyer and among the archives of legislation.

THURSDAY, January 31.

Revenue Collection Bill—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. RIBB felt very sensibly, he said, the weight which devolved upon him in sustaining his views of this subject against an authority so highly respectable, and so deeply seated in the affections of the people, as the author of the proclamation, to the doctrines of which it had become his duty to advert. But whilst he stood on the principles of the constitution; whilst he had on his side the opinions of patriots, of lovers of liberty; opinions which were delivered by some of the most eminent of the men who framed the constitution, which opinions were promulgated throughout the United States for the purpose of inducing the adoption of the constitution, he felt himself clad in armor impenetrable to adverse argument, the high authority of the proclamation notwithstanding.

What clause in the constitution delegates to the Federal Government the sole power of deciding the extent of the grant of powers to itself, as well as the extent of the powers reserved to the States?

It is said that this power is vested by the constitution in the Supreme Court of the United States. The provisions are,

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

"This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

These are the two provisions of the constitution which are referred to as delegating the power to the Supreme Court, to be the sole judge of the extent of the powers granted and of the powers reserved, and as denying to the States the sovereign power of protecting themselves against the usurpation of their reserved powers, authorities, and privileges. If the delegation to the Supreme Court, and prohibition to the States, are not contained in these two clauses, then they are not to be found in the federal constitution.

The latter clause cannot touch the question in debate, for that only declares the supremacy of the constitution, and the treaties "and laws made in pursuance thereof." Powers exercised contrary to the constitution, acts done contrary to the constitution, by the exercise of authorities not under but in violation of the constitution, and by usurpation of State rights, State authorities, and State privileges, are the subjects under consideration.

Let us examine the former clause: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution." The case must be of "judicial power;" it must be a case, "in law or equity," arising under the constitution. The expression is not "to all cases arising under the constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States;" but it is "to all cases in law and equity."

"Use is the law and rule of speech." By this law and this rule we must examine the language of the constitution.

A judicial power is one subject; a political power is another and a different subject. A case in law, or a case in equity, is one subject; a political case is another and a different subject.

Judicial cases in law and equity, arising under the regular exercise of constitutional powers, by laws and treaties made by authority, are different from political questions of usurpation, surmounting the constitution, and involving the high prerogatives, authorities, and privileges of the sovereign parties who made the constitution.

In judicial cases arising under a treaty, the court may construe the treaty, and administer the rights arising under it to the parties, who submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court in that case. But the court must confine itself within the pale of judicial authority. It cannot rightfully exercise the political power of the Government in declaring the treaty null, because the one or the other party to the treaty has broken this or that article; and, therefore, that the whole treaty is abrogated. To judge of the breach of the articles of the treaty by the sovereign contracting parties, and in case of breach to dissolve that treaty, and to declare it no longer obligatory, is a political power belonging not to the judiciary. It belongs to other departments of the Government, who will judge of the extent of the injury resulting from the violation, and whether the reparation shall be sought by amicable negotiation, or whether the treaty shall be declared no longer obligatory on the Government and the people of the injured party. Yet, by the law of nations, the wilful and deliberate breach of one article of a treaty is a breach of all the articles, each being the consideration of the others; and the injured party has the right so to treat it.

By the act approved on the 7th of July, 1798, the Congress of the United States declared themselves of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties and of the consular convention theretofore concluded between the United States and France, and that they should not thenceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States, because of the repeated violations on the part of the French Government, &c.

Before this declaration, the Supreme Court of the United States was bound, in cases of judicial cognizance coming before them, to take the treaties as obligatory, and to administer the rights growing out of the treaties between France and the United States. After that declaration, the court was bound to consider the treaties as abrogated. The courts had no power, before the act of July, 1798, to inquire into violations, and therefore to declare the treaties not obligatory. After that act, they had no power to demand evidence of the violations recited, and revise the political decision of the Government.

To declare these treaties no longer obligatory was a political power, not a judicial power. Yet the violations of these treaties, committed under the authority of the French Government, and the consequent injuries to the citizens and Government of the United States, and the rights of the United States consequent therefrom, before the act of July, 1798, were "cases arising under the constitution" and treaties of the United States. But the judicial power did not extend to those cases of violation, so as to declare the treaties no longer obligatory. The question whether those violations should or should not abrogate the treaties, did not make a case in law or equity for the decision of a judicial tribunal. Yet they were cases arising under the constitution. The power to decide them belonged to the Government of the United States as a political sovereign; but the judicial power did not extend to them; those cases belonged to the political powers, not to the judicial powers of the Government.

The British courts of admiralty executed upon the commerce of the United States the British orders in council, disclaiming the power to decide whether those orders in council were conformable to the general law of nations, which every nation is bound to respect and observe. In like manner, the French courts of admiralty executed upon the commerce of the United States the Berlin and Milan decrees.

The British and French courts had not cognizance to judge the sovereign powers of the nations, and to declare those orders and decrees contrary to the law of nations; that was not a judicial power. So the courts of the United States, even the Supreme Court, had not the power to declare the treaties between the United States and France, and Great Britain, no longer obligatory upon the citizens and Government of the United States, because of the multiplied wrongs and injuries committed upon the citizens of the United States under color of those orders in council and decrees, infracting the law of nations and treaties, and hostile to the rights of the Government of the United States. Those cases, in their effects upon the treaties and amicable relations between the United States and those Governments, did not fall within the judicial power of the courts of the United States. Those questions did not fall within the description of "cases in law and equity," as used in the Constitution of the United States, in conferring, vesting, and defining the powers of the judicial department. Those political powers belong to other departments of the Government. According to the law and rule of speech established by use, such powers are classed under the denomination of political powers, prerogative powers, not under the head of judicial powers.

Before I proceed to illustrate by other examples the distinctions which I have taken between political powers and judicial powers, between political questions or cases and judicial questions or cases, I will refer to the declaration of one whose opinions on constitutional questions I know will command respect; a man to whose opinions I willingly yield my respect, without, however, submitting with that implicit faith which belongs to fools. On the resolutions of Mr. Livingston, touching the conduct of President Adams, in causing Thomas Nash, alias Jonathan Robbins, to be arrested and delivered over to a British naval officer, without any accusation, or trial, or investigation in a court of justice, Mr. Marshall, then a representative of Virginia, now chief justice of the

"By extending the judicial power to all cases in law and equity, the constitution had never been understood to confer on that department any political power whatever. To come within this description, a question must assume a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process, and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit. A case in law or equity may arise under a treaty, where rights of individuals acquired or secured by a treaty, are to be asserted or defended in courts."* "But the judicial power cannot extend to political compacts." This distinction between a political power and a judicial power is recognized and acted upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Williams vs. Armroyd, 7 Cranch, 428, 433.

Again in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, (1 Cranch, 187; 1st Peters' Condensed Reports, 279), this distinction between the political powers of Government and the judicial power is most explicitly avowed and recognized by the Supreme Court. The supremacy of that court is a judicial supremacy only. It is supreme in reference to the other courts, in questions of a judicial character, brought within the sphere of judicial cognizance by controversies which shall have assumed a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties amenable to its process, bound by its power, whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit. "Questions in their nature political, or which are by the constitution and laws submitted to the Executive, can never be made in this court."

The decision of the Executive, upon political questions submitted to its discretion, is as supreme as the decision of the court within its jurisdiction. Neither department ought to invade the jurisdiction of the other; so said the Supreme Court of the United States in Marbury vs. Madison. A judicial decision binds the parties litigant in that particular case, not others who are neither parties nor privies, whose rights and privileges are separate and distinct. Not even the court itself is bound to give the like decision between other parties, where a similar question may be involved. Prudence will dictate that a former decision be not lightly disregarded, but adhered to in a subsequent case, unless the judges see an error in the former decision. But honesty requires that an erroneous opinion be not carried into doctrine, and error perpetuated, merely because of the first error. Errors should be corrected, not perpetuated. To err is the lot of man; to correct

* For the entire speech of Mr. Marshall, see vol. 2, p. 451 of this Abridgment.

JANUARY, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

[SENATE.]

an error, is noble and praiseworthy. No decision binds in law, or in morality, beyond the rights of the parties litigant, and those claiming under them as privies; and even there, not until the time for a new hearing or re-trial has expired. But as to all other persons, it binds not. It is contrary to the first principles of justice, that the rights, interests, and privileges, of any person should be decided, negatived, and abrogated, before he is heard to make good his title and his claim, his rights and his justification. God in his infinite wisdom did not condemn Adam unheard. And this example of divine wisdom and justice is fit to be imitated by human tribunals.

When parties present themselves before the Supreme Court of the United States to litigate the judicial question involved in that controversy, the decision of the court binds the rights and interests therein represented and litigated; it binds no others.

The public rights, privileges, authorities, and prerogatives of the States, are not the property of individuals, and cannot be represented and brought up for decision by individuals.

In a case between two citizens, parties to an ejectment, claiming lands, the one party under a grant from the State of New York, the other under a grant from the State of Connecticut, in the gore which was claimed by both States, the court was competent to decide the private rights and interests of the parties. But that decision could have no controlling influence over the line of jurisdiction between the two States; because those States were not parties. So said the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Fowler vs. Miller, and Fowler vs. Lindsay, (3 Dallas, p. 411.) And one of the judges, in delivering his opinion, with whom all concurred, asked emphatically, "On what principle can private citizens, in the litigation of their private claims, be competent to fix the important rights of sovereignty?"

The twelfth amendment to the constitution takes away the jurisdiction which had been given to the Supreme Court to hold jurisdiction of a suit against one of the United States by a citizen of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign States; but leaves the jurisdiction conferred over controversies between two or more States. If two States, therefore, have a controversy, which, in its character, makes a case in law or equity proper for judicial cognizance, it may be brought before the Supreme Court. Controversies between two or more States, about territory or limits, may be litigated before the Supreme Court of the United States. But then each State must have an opportunity, as a party, to prosecute or defend her right before the decision can bind her. Those are questions of meum et tuum; rights of property which one State claims to the exclusion of the other; not political rights belonging to all the States respectively, where the rights and powers of one State do not exclude but establish the rights of each and every other. Such rights claimed for all, as belonging equally to each and every of the States respectively, cannot make a controversy in law or equity between two States.

Political powers not delegated to the Federal Government, political powers reserved to the States, constitute the subjects of the propositions which are affirmed on the one side, and denied on the other. The propositions affirmed are, that the powers of the Federal Government result from the compact to which the States are parties; that these powers are limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, and no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; "than that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

If the Congress of the United States usurp and exercise a power not delegated, but reserved, it is evident that the controversy about this exercise of power must be between the Government of the United States and the States. How is this controversy to get into the courts, and finally to the Supreme Court, so as to bind the State as one party, and the Government of the United States as the other party? For on no principle can private citizens, in the litigation of their private claims, be competent to fix the important rights of sovereignty. A decision in a case to which a State is not a party cannot bind the State; it is res inter alios acta. So said this court, to whom these litigated questions of the limits of sovereign power are supposed to be referred, by those who deny the right of the States to interpose.—Fowler vs. Miller and Lindsay, 3 Dall. 412.

Mr. Callender was tried, convicted, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment in the State of Virginia by the federal court, under the sedition law. Now, it is clear that Mr. Callender was not in his individual person the representative of the State of Virginia, so as to bind that State by the decision, and fix her sovereign rights. Mr. Lyon was tried and sentenced in Vermont under the sedition law by the federal court; yet that decision did not bind the State of Vermont. Mr. Cooper was sentenced for sedition by the federal court in the State of Pennsylvania, yet that did not bind that State; neither did all these decisions bind the States, nor settle the point that the sedition act was valid and constitutional; nor would the decision of the Supreme Court have had that effect if such cases could by law have been carried to the Supreme Court.

To bind a State, and command obedience to the decision of the Supreme Court, in a question relating to a dangerous usurpation of powers not delegated, but retained by the States, it is necessary that a case should be brought before that court between the United States and a State, as parties litigant; because, according to the first principles of jurisprudence, none but the rights of parties are bound by the decision.

Where is the grant of power to the judicial department to hold a plea of controversy between the United States and a State, as parties in a controversy touching the political powers alleged to be reserved to the States, respectively, and not delegated to the Federal Government? Is there any thing in the constitution which gives color to the idea that a suit can be maintained in the Supreme Court, or in any of the inferior courts, between the United States as plaintiffs and a State as defendant, or between a State as plaintiff against the United States as defendant, to settle a controverted question of delegation and reservation of political powers? Would such a suit be a case in law or equity according to any usage of speech? Let us try to frame the complaint on the one side, and the defence on the other, and come to the judgment, upon the alien and sedition laws. What sentence is to be passed upon the State? I suppose that her resolutions were seditious and unconstitutional; that she should forever thereafter acknowledge that the alien and sedition laws were constitutional; that she repeal her false and seditious resolutions. Ridiculous!

Let the Attorney-General of the United States try to frame a bill in equity, or an indictment for the United States against a State or States; or the Attorney-General of a State to frame a declaration at law, or bill in equity, or indictment, for a State against the United States, to try the controverted questions of political powers delegated and retained by the States; draw out the plaint, and it will appear at first blush to be an anomaly, not known in the vocabulary of "cases of law and equity," not to be classed under the judicial power over cases in law and equity, according to any law or rule of speech. There is no grant of power to the Supreme Court to hold jurisdiction of any such plaint or bill. Such a plaint in law or in equity would be a novelty in the history of judicial powers. The portentous consequences of such a jurisdiction in the court would strike with terror and amazement as soon as such a process should be instituted.

The alien act of June, 1798, was enacted when the United States were at peace with all the world. By this it was declared that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States "to order all such aliens as he shall judge dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States, or shall have reasonable grounds to suspect are concerned in any treasonable or secret machinations against the Government thereof, to depart out of the territory of the United States within such time as shall be expressed in such order." Any alien, so ordered to depart, found at large within the United States, after the time limited in such order, and not having obtained a license from the President to remain, was subject to be imprisoned, on conviction of such disobedience, and never admitted to become a citizen of the United States. To obtain a license, such alien was to prove his innocence, and to give bond and security for his good behavior, and for not violating his license; which the President, however, might revoke at his pleasure. All aliens ordered to depart, who did not obtain license to remain, were liable to be arrested and sent out of the United States, at the discretion of the President.

This act was not levelled against the citizens of any power, State, or potentate, at war with the United States, for there was then no declaration of war by the United States against any foreign power. There was another act passed in July, 1798, "respecting alien enemies," providing for a case of war, and operating only upon the citizens or subjects of the hostile nation or Government. This act of June, 1798, was levelled at alien friends; against those who had been invited by the policy of the States, and the genius and spirit of our free institutions, to fly from the oppressions and convulsions of the old world, and seek an asylum in the States; against oppressed humanity, seeking a home on our peaceful shores. All this numerous class of aliens, not then having completed their naturalization, were placed at the discretion of the President, to be removed upon suspicion, without the form of a trial, except in the mind and judgment of the President. The sedition law operated upon citizens as well as aliens.

These two acts, when made to bear against particular individuals, might have been the subjects of judicial investigation in each particular case; but the decision in such case would have affected only the personal rights of the individuals, parties to the judicial proceeding, but could not fix and bind the important rights of the State sovereignty involved in those two acts of Congress. Those acts, although they had never been brought to bear upon a single person, did invade the political rights and powers of the States, violated that security for liberty of speech, of the press, of the person, which the States respectively had a right, and were in duty bound, to maintain within their respective jurisdictions; and counteracted the policy and interests of the States, by driving from their shores alien friends, whom their laws had encouraged and invited to settle their vast tracts of wild, uncultivated lands; the faith of a sovereign State was pledged; that sovereign was bound to take care that its plighted faith was not violated by the usurpation of another potentate. The private rights and personal security of individuals, and the political rights, authorities, and powers of the State Governments, were both invaded and violated by these two acts. An individual might be indicted for sedition, and sentenced, or be arrested for refusing to depart according to the order of the President, and the court might refuse to discharge him upon habeas corpus. The private rights of the individual, when violated under color of the alien or sedition law, might be submitted to the judicial powers. But the political powers, authorities, and liberties of a State, violated by those laws, cannot be subjected to the judicial power of a federal court, supreme or inferior; they cannot be arrested, tried, condemned, removed or extinguished. Such cases as do not fall properly under the denomination of judicial powers, of cases of law and equity, according to common usage and acceptance antecedent to the constitution, required an enumeration and express delegation to the judicial department to hold cognizance of such classes, of which there are examples in the constitution; such as controversies between two or more States, and between a State and foreign States, &c.

The distinctions between political and judicial powers; between judicial cases in law and equity, and political cases; between the binding effect of a judicial decision on the parties litigant, and its want of obligatory force on others, not parties nor privies, are very necessary to be observed.

The disregard of the usage of speech antecedent to the constitution, and of the distinctions just mentioned, would remove the landmarks of the compact. It would convert the Supreme Court into a political council and board of control, to administer the political opinions of its members. It would confer on the Supreme Court powers too gigantic and terrific, too dangerous to the peace of the United States, to the reserved powers of the States, and to the safety of the Union.

It would carry along with it the power to the Supreme Court to decide upon the acquisition of new territories, and upon the admission of States into the Union, formed out of such purchased territories; the power to decide how far infractions of treaties and delays of reparation did abrogate those treaties between the United States and foreign nations.

The whole system of the United States, for ascertaining and adjusting private land claims in the newly acquired territories by commissioners, reserving the final decision to the Congress, depends upon the distinction I have taken.

Remove these distinctions, and the powers of the legislative and executive departments depend on the judgment of the Supreme Court; and the limits of its own powers would depend upon its own will.

A new mode of drawing to the Federal Government the reserved powers of the States is let in, which evades and puts to naught the safeguard to the minority of the States provided by the compact against amendments. The door is open to usurpation and tyranny, by giving the Federal Government the sole and entire control, independent of any control of the States.

By the theory of the constitution, if the Congress desire to exercise a new power not before delegated, they must draw upon the States for a further surrender and delegation of another portion of their reserved powers. To sanction such new delegation of power, three-fourths of the several States must consent, by ratifying the amendment proposed. But in practice, under this new doctrine, that whatever power is sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States is constitutional, and the States have no power to interpose, a bare majority of both Houses of Congress, with the assent of the President and the Supreme Court, or two-thirds of both Houses with the assent of the Supreme Court, without the assent of the President, may alter the constitution at pleasure. If the Congress exercise any of the powers reserved to the States by passing an act, let the Supreme Court, in a litigation between two citizens, in which this law is incidentally drawn in question, sanction it as constitutional, then, according to this unlimited power, conferred on the Supreme Court by construction, the act would be constitutional law, sound constitutional doctrine. Protect the authors of the law from a public examination of their conduct, by the terrors of an alien and sedition law, to speak or to write against the authors of the law would be seditious; to oppose the law by force would be treason, rebellion! So say those who contend for the unlimited power of the Supreme Court to decide "all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States!" Deny the rights of the States to interpose to arrest the usurpation, and where is the remedy?

Happily, a Legislature cannot be indicted of sedition; a State cannot be indicted of treason, and arraigned at the bar of a court. The general revolt of a whole nation against usurpation and oppression cannot justly be called rebellion. Truth is comprehended by examining principles. A whole people resisting oppression, and vindicating their own liberty and the constitution, commit no crime in so doing. Private men, who swear allegiance to the constitution, who swear "obedience ad legem," swear no obedience "extra vel contra legem." The oath can detract nothing from the constitution; nothing from the public liberty, which the constitution was intended to protect. It admits the right to protect and preserve the constitution, and imposes a duty to avenge the violation of it.

By the constitution, the diversified particular interests of the States were intended to be under the regular action of the Federal Government, secured and reserved from federal legislation: 1st, by a judicious selection of the delegated powers, the exercise of which were most likely to promote the general welfare of all the States, and least likely to bear oppressively upon any one of them; 2d, by regulations and prohibitions upon the exercise of those powers so specified and delegated, so as to render their action uniform in all the States, and to guard against a preference or favoritism towards any of the States; 3d, by guarding against amendments which might delegate additional powers, and divest the States of further portions of sovereignty, unless such amendments were proposed by two-thirds of the Houses of Congress, or two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, and afterwards ratified by three-fourths of the States.

But by this new doctrine of supremacy of the federal court, an irregular action of the Federal Government is substituted in place of amendment. Usurpation of power, if sanctioned by the Supreme Court, is made equal to an additional grant by an amendment of the constitution. A majority of the States combined in interest may, if sanctioned by the Supreme Court, exercise any powers not delegated, not necessary and proper to execute the powers especially delegated, but new substantive powers to the Government, added by construction, destructive of the particular interests and prosperity of a minority of the States—powers which two-thirds of both Houses, or two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States, would not propose; or, if proposed, would not be ratified by three-fourths of the States as an amendment to the constitution.

The Supreme Court of the United States is not such sufficient check and safeguard against the encroachments of the central Government upon the State Governments. The number of judges of the Supreme Court is not defined by the constitution. That number is but seven at present. Four are a majority of the court. But the number may be increased at the pleasure of the Congress and a President, so as to give a majority of a desired political cast. These judges hold their offices for life, removable by impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction by the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators. Their responsibility is too remote, and the number too few for a high prerogative court, with power to adjust the political powers of the Federal and State Governments, and try the Federal Government when impeached of usurpation and encroachment upon the reserved powers belonging to the States. If the central Government be accused of encroachment and usurpation, its triers, the Supreme Court judges, are, in their turn, liable to be impeached and tried by the central Government. The Congress who commit the usurpation are the only persons who can impeach and try their judges. The offending Congress are to be tried by their judges; and the offending judges are to be impeached and tried by the offending Congress. There is but little wise and practical security in this against the encroachments of the central Government. No plaintiff would feel very safe if the defendant had the sole power to appoint the jury, with the power superadded to accuse that jury of misconduct, and try the accusation. It seems to me that if those wise and practical statesmen and patriots who framed the new federal constitution had designed the Supreme Court to be the sole prerogative court of high and ultimate commission to try the central Government for usurpation of powers not delegated, and the final and sole safeguard for the reserved powers of the States, they would have devised some more certain and direct responsibility of the judges to the States, than by referring their impeachment to Congress, who must be parties, aiders, and abettors in the usurpation. The States would not have adopted the constitution if they had been informed that such was to be its interpretation.

Are there no dangers to liberty to be apprehended from referring all the political powers of the Federal Government, and all the reserved powers of the States, to the guardianship of a few judges appointed for life, not removable, except by impeachment for crimes and misdemeanors; not impeachable or removable for error of opinion? So far removed from responsibility, ("for impeachment is not now even a scarecrow," if transformed into a political court instead of a judicial tribunal, is there no cause to apprehend that a majority of the judges may administer their theory of what the Government should be, instead of the theory as actually adopted by the States? Are no judicial opinions tintured and discolored with the party feelings and opinions of the day? Is there no cause to apprehend that the judges will follow up the maxim taught in the law schools, and issued from the bench, "est boni iudicis ampliari jurisdictionem," not only to the enlargement of their own powers, but to the enlargement of the powers and increase of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, as the means convenient and proper to the end, the amplification of their own jurisdiction?)

If the judges of the Supreme Court are to have the final and exclusive authority to settle political questions, touching encroachments upon the reserved powers of the States, and all other political questions arising under the constitution, then, superadded to those qualifications which have heretofore been thought essential for a judge, the primary consideration in selecting him ought to be, in what political school has he been brought up? What are his political opinions on certain great contested political questions? To what political party does he belong? I respect a court of justice, but I abhor a party court. Let us not, by construction, transform a court of justice into a political council of state. Let us not transform the emblem of justice into the emblem of power. Let us not defile the sanctuary of justice with the passions of political parties contending for political powers.

If the Supreme Court is once acknowledged to be the ultimate tribunal for settling the boundaries of political power between the Federal Government and the State Governments, so as to bind the parties to the compact, then it will inevitably follow that the court will be the subject of political party strife. Reform in the court, by infusing a new spirit by other or additional judges, will become the subject of political party strife as much as reform in the executive administration. The majority of Congress and the Executive might at any time add to the bench of the Supreme Court a sufficient number of judges to carry an important question of political power. The British ministry advised the King to create a sufficient number of new peers to carry the reform bill. The power of a majority of Congress, with the aid of the President, to create new judges, for a special occasion, is as effectual as the power of the King to create new peers.

The principles of civil justice to be administered by the judicial tribunals are fixed, immutable, and eternal; they are so nearly assimilated in all civilized nations, that they may be made universal. But the notions of political justice, and balances of political power, are mutable and variant, differing, like the complexions, habits, education, and feelings of politicians.

If the Supreme Court is to be the sole and exclusive judge in the last resort, not only of judicial questions properly submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, but also of all questions touching the confines of political powers delegated and not delegated by the compact, then not only the legislative and executive departments of the Government hold their powers at the will of this court, but the concurrence of this court, with the other departments of the Federal Government, "in usurped powers, might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve." If one of the parties is to be the sole and exclusive judge of the extent of the powers to him delegated, and of the concessions made by the other parties, then such party would have an unlimited and supreme authority over the other parties. It is not sufficient to discriminate in theory the several classes of power, and distribute them between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments; neither will it suffice to mark with precision the boundaries between the powers delegated to the Federal Government and those retained by the States, and trust to these parchment barriers for defence against the insatiable appetite and restless gnawings of power. Experience teaches that the efficacy of such paper barriers is too feeble to withstand the scorching desires of power, and that some more adequate defence is indispensable to secure the more feeble against the more powerful members of the Government.

The judicial department does not present the requisite security in matters of such transcendent and vital importance. The judges of the Supreme Court are too few in number. The permanent tenure by which their appointments are held, as well as their salaries and the mode of their appointment, destroys all sense of dependence on the States, and lifts them above the common burdens of the people; and, from the very nature of their callings, they see human nature in the worst light.

These are but too apt to infuse into their minds high-toned notions of a forcible consolidated Government, as necessary to "save the people from their worst enemy—themselves." Judges, in a long course of official duties, are familiarized to the sight of frauds, chicaneries, misdemeanors, and crimes; accustomed to exercise the force of the laws upon knavish wealth, naked poverty, and squalid vice; they are but too apt to confound the distinction between the judicial powers necessary to administer the laws, and political powers necessary to prescribe the laws; between the powers necessary to be granted to secure and protect against a violation of the laws by the vicious, and the powers necessary to be reserved to the good for protection and security against a violation and abuse of the political powers of the Government.

In England, from the time that Alfred hung the forty judges for illegal and corrupt practices, to the trial and conviction of Algernon Sidney for high treason, in writing that celebrated treatise on Government, (which, since his execution, has been published,) against the divine right of kings, and the doctrines of non-resistance and passive obedience, and from that time to this, the history of judicial power, as exercised, teaches this solemn truth—judges are but men, fallible men.

The history of judicial power in our own country and in our days, is not less impressive.

But I forbear.

I respect an independent, upright judge. There is a generous confidence yielded by the moral sense of the community to such an officer. He is looked upon as the guardian of civil rights, the protector of life, liberty, and property. But the judge who exhibits himself as the zealot of a political party, freezes the generous confidence of the people, and turns it into fear and trembling.

Now, Mr. President, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that, whilst I concur in the doctrines of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, 1799, and 1800, I do not mean to approve the time, manner, and occasion in which South Carolina has applied them to practice. They are great conservative principles, not to be carried into practical effect but on great and pressing emergencies, when all other means of staying the hand of lawless aggression have been tried—unsuccessfully tried; and when war and revolution, in Governments differently organized from ours, would be justifiable in the eyes of liberal, enlightened, and impartial men. These great conservative powers and privileges, like all other powers, are liable to abuse in the hands of indiscreet and heated partisans. But yet, as some great conservative power is necessary to control the Government itself, to hold it in subjection to the constitution, to keep it within the limits of delegated power, I believe such regulating check more safely lodged in the whole body of a State—a whole nation of people; and there less liable to abuse than if lodged in the hands of a few, and those few exposed to many temptations to sanction the usurpations, as participants in the power and emoluments of the usurpation.

SATURDAY, February 2.

Revenue Collection Bill—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

The bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports again coming up—

Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN said: When the senate adjourned yesterday, I was referring to the acts of Congress organizing the judiciary of the United States, and thereby preserving, in full spirit and energy, the principles that the laws and the Constitution of the United States shall be considered the supreme law of the land. This provision of the constitution, and the legislation upon it, constitute an impregnable fortress, against which speculation and sophistry will spend their force in vain. There is no tyro in the schools, there is not an honest independent yeoman who tills our soil, who cannot comprehend the whole argument on this subject. Any man, when he finds that the laws of Congress are the supreme law of the land, and finds laws carrying out this provision, knows where sovereignty is placed by the constitution a thousand times better than all the abstract propositions in the world would teach him. The people are not to be speculated out of their senses, and of this we have had a recent and very satisfactory assurance. The principles of the proclamation were greeted with almost universal approbation throughout the land; no paper, except the Declaration of Independence, had ever been received by the people with more heartfelt satisfaction; none need be, except that sacred instrument; for in those bygone days, there were many discordant voices heard amid the general rejoicing. But now there is but one voice, from Georgia to Maine, with the exception of that which comes from a single quarter. Who can fail to bless God that the people are thus true to the principles of their fathers, and are thus ready to protect and maintain the work of their fathers? If nullification receive not its condemnation in our days, I know, said Mr. F., it will receive the execration of all posterity.

Why was it that, in our constitution, the State judiciary was required to regard the authority of the laws of Congress as supreme? Why was it that in the 25th section of the judiciary act, an appeal from the State to the federal courts is granted? The fathers of the constitution knew no other way to support the supremacy of the laws of Congress than this. They provided that all questions arising under the constitution should be referred to and decided by the judicial department of the Government. They with that temperate wisdom which characterizes all their acts, suffer the disputed questions to go from court to court. They try the judicial conscience of every court; and if the State tribunal decides unconstitutionally, the Supreme Court of the United States has power to reverse their decision. No argument which he could urge would add to the weight which those wise provisions would have in settling this question. They prove the high regard which our fathers had for this principle of the constitution, and their extreme anxiety to preserve and perpetuate it.

As a matter of history, it would be interesting to look at the circumstances attending the passage of the judiciary bill. In what we sometimes call the popular branch of Congress, in the House of Representatives, it met with such unanimous support, that the yeas and nays were not called for when the question was taken. In the Senate, where the bill originated, fourteen voted in the affirmative, and six in the negative. Three of the negatives were from the South, and three from the North. Two of the Southern negatives were from the Senators from the State of Virginia. But he was persuaded that the opposition of Virginia to the bill did not arise from any objection to this mode of preserving the constitution and laws. Virginia opposed all the provisions of the judiciary system, as we organized it, from objections which she had to the form, not to the object of its establishment. That the Commonwealth of Virginia did not oppose the principle that the Supreme Court of the United States is the arbiter in the last resort, he would show, from a previous piece of history, which he took great satisfaction in bringing before the Senate. To go back to the transactions of former times, to contemplate those acts of our predecessors, which have illustrated their own and our fame, was always pleasing and profitable; and it was with great satisfaction that he could bring up, on this occasion, the voice of good old Virginia in favor of the constitution; and he hoped it would put down forever those speculations which would ruin the constitution, and defeat the hopes of the world. The opinion of Virginia, to which he should refer, was given at an interesting time. The State of Pennsylvania, one of the proudest States of the Union, (he meant no invidious distinctions, she was one of the largest, wealthiest, and most powerful of the States,) the State of Pennsylvania had determined, in the Olmstead case, to resist the decision of the United States court, and to resist it unto blood. The Legislature went so far as to pass laws to call out the militia to resist the federal process. The judiciary went on in its quiet steady way. Notice was given to the marshal and to the President, that the State of Pennsylvania would resist the process, but there was no flinching in that day. The marshal was ordered to execute the law and the decree of the court. An order was given to imprison the defendants. Even gallantry was overlooked, (for ladies were the defendants;) and, in a case where the life of the constitution was at hazard, they would not even stop for them, and the issue was about to be tried by arms.

[SENATE.]

Pennsylvania, at this point, was patriotic and prudent enough to retire, and give up the contest. Notice was given to the marshal to make up the debt and costs, and the amount was forthwith paid. Pennsylvania would not, at the last pinch, encounter the constitution. Many patriots appeared then, and offered to devote themselves to the cause, and to die in the last ditch. The same language was used then, as we hear from South Carolina now. But Pennsylvania had too much patriotism to push her opposition to the extremity of war. She gave up the point, and proposed an amendment to the constitution, for the establishment of a tribunal to settle all disputes between the Government and the States. She took the advice of Virginia, and recorded her response as follows:

"Preamble and resolutions on the proposition of Pennsylvania to amend the constitution of the United States.

"The committee to whom was referred the communication of the Governor of Pennsylvania, covering certain resolutions of the Legislature of that State, proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, by the appointment of an impartial tribunal to decide disputes between the State and federal judiciary, have had the same under their consideration, and are of opinion that a tribunal is already provided by the constitution of the United States, to wit, the Supreme Court, more eminently qualified from their habits and duties, from the mode of their selection, and from the tenure of their offices, to decide the disputes aforesaid in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be erected.

"The members of the Supreme Court are selected from those in the United States, who are most celebrated for virtue and legal learning: not at the will of a single individual, but by the concurrent wishes of the President and Senate of the United States; they will therefore have no local prejudices and partialities.

"The duties they have to perform lead them necessarily to the most enlarged and accurate acquaintance with the jurisdiction of the federal and several State courts together, and with the admirable symmetry of our Government.

"The tenure of their offices enables them to pronounce the sound and correct opinions they may have formed, without fear, favor, or partiality.

"The amendment to the constitution proposed by Pennsylvania seems to be founded upon the idea that the Federal Judiciary will, from a lust of power, enlarge their jurisdiction, to the total annihilation of the jurisdiction of the State courts; that they will exercise their will instead of the law and the constitution.

"This argument, if it proves any thing, would operate more strongly against the tribunal proposed to be created, which promises so little, than against the Supreme Court, which for the reasons given before, had every thing connected with their appointment calculated to insure confidence. What security have we, were the proposed amendments adopted, that this tribunal would not substitute their will and their pleasure in the place of the law? The judiciary are the weakest of the three departments of Government, and least dangerous to the political rights of the constitution. They hold neither the purse nor the sword, and even to enforce their own judgment and decrees must ultimately depend upon the Executive arm. Should the federal judiciary, however, unmindful of their weakness, unmindful of the duty which they owe to themselves and their country, become corrupt, and transcend the limits of their jurisdiction, would the proposed amendment oppose even a probable barrier in such an improbable state of things?

"The creation of a tribunal such as has been proposed by Pennsylvania, so far as we are enabled to form an idea of it from the description given in the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, would, in the opinion of your committee, tend rather to invite than prevent a collision between the federal and State courts. It might also become, in process of time, a serious and dangerous embarrassment to the operations of the General Government.

"Resolved, therefore, that the Legislature of this State do disapprove of the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

"Resolved, also, That his excellency the Governor be and he is hereby requested to transmit forthwith a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress, and to the Executive of the several States in the Union, with a request that the same may be laid before the Legislature thereof.

"January 23, 1810.—Agreed to, unanimously, by the House of Delegates.

"January 26, 1810.—Agreed to by the Senate, unanimously."

This doctrine is as sound as pure gold seven times tried. Here is the very issue which South Carolina seeks to try. Pennsylvania called out her militia to uphold her sovereignty, and in a well-advised hour retracted her appeal to force, and proposed an amendment to the constitution, for the purpose of effecting her object. But good old Virginia respected the wisdom of our fathers, and declared that the constitution which they had provided could not be bettered by amendments. She refused to sanction an amendment which would dispense with the judiciary of the United States. Now, Mr. President, in this view of the subject, what a most admirable system of Government is ours. It is not to be wondered at that tyrants and the friends of power all over the world look at it with envy and jealousy. We cannot but perceive that, by the General and State Governments, each acting in their respective spheres, the principles of liberty must ever be preserved. New York cannot infringe upon the rights of Pennsylvania, nor Pennsylvania upon the rights of Virginia. The States cannot come into conflict with each other, nor can the General Government interfere with the rights and jurisdiction of the several States. But as we have great interests in common, the wisdom of our predecessors provided a sovereignty, above that of the several States, to attend to the common interests. This constitution was watched over with sleepless vigilance, as he hoped it always would be, and effectually guarded against all encroachments. What can the General Government do to prostrate the liberties of the States, when twenty-four of those States support it and continue its existence and power? Since he had had the honor of a seat here, he had often been sorry to hear the General Government gravely spoken of as an alien excrescence. Our own work, the dearly cherished constitution, bequeathed to us by our fathers, had been scolded at as an odious foreign importation; and the Supreme Court, which keeps in check the different powers of the State and Federal Governments, had been spoken of as a thing down below which the sovereign States ought not to submit to. He rejoiced that this subject was now fully before the people. He believed that the crisis had been brought to them in the benignity of Providence, that they might rally around the constitution, and that tribunal which preserves all the principles of the constitution in purity. How, Mr. President, could we take a single step in the improvement of our condition without this General Government? Have we not intrusted to it all the concerns of commerce, the collection of the revenue, the vast concerns of the public lands, our Indian relations, &c.? How can we take a single step to preserve our great common interests, if the State sovereignties can annul our acts at pleasure? Suppose a case of war waged by us, in defence of our national rights, against a foreign nation. If three or four ill-advised States can throw themselves on their sovereignty, refuse to take part in the war, and nullify the acts declaring it, our country, instead of being a name and a praise among nations, would become a name of reproach, and subject to the contempt of the whole civilized world. He would much rather go back to the old confederation, in which each State is bound, in honor, to pay its quota towards the public exigencies. Nothing can give us security for a single hour against State nullification.

He had said, with submission, that the Supreme Court was intended by the constitution to be the great arbiter in regard to questions within and without the powers conferred upon it. In answer to this, it was said, suppose the Supreme Court transcends its powers? He would reply, in the language of Virginia, that we had adopted the best system which we could devise. If it failed in practice, the failure would be owing to the imperfection of all human institutions. No prudent man will push such a supposition to its extremity, and upon the faith of it give up our constitution. Should it fail of its object, we shall have but to mourn over the frailty and insecurity of this as well as of all terrestrial things. What experience has justified the supposition that the authority given to the Supreme Court will be abused? For fifty years we have prospered with it; and the venerable and illustrious man who has given to it high renown in the world, still lives to give it his beneficent energies. The judiciary holds neither the purse nor the sword, and depends wholly upon its moral power, and the aid of other departments of the Government, for the enforcement of its decrees. It is the great peace arbiter. Let us then cherish and support it. Let us select the best men to fill its seats, and we shall have no cause to distrust it. But what is done with the State courts? He put it to South Carolina to answer. She has a constitution and a judiciary. When her Legislature enacts an unconstitutional law, what is done by her citizens? Do some of them call a town meeting and nullify it? No; they put in the plea before the State court, that the law is unconstitutional, and the court decides the question. This had been done in his State a dozen times. The supposition of the Senator from Kentucky was the merest imagination that ever afflicted the human intellect. That Senator's imagination carried him to the extremity of fear. What fear? That Congress would break the constitution, by putting in operation a wicked law. The bill of abominations would come to the Senate, and they would join the other House in the conspiracy against the rights of the people and the States. Then it would go to the Supreme Court. And who were they? They were made, he says, by the Senate, and were impeachable only by the House of Representatives; and therefore they were all of a piece, and might conspire together to defeat the purposes of the constitution and the rights of the States. This general conspiracy draws into its vortex all the reserved rights of the people. Thus far his fears alarmed him. Was it wise in a grave nation—he spoke in the abstract—to indulge in such violent suppositions? Such imaginations would drive a man to shut himself in a cave, seclude himself from all associations with his kind, lest the first man whom he may happen to meet should contrive a plot against his life. Because the judiciary may turn traitors to the Government and the constitution, and the legislative department may support them in their treason, shall we have no Government? Shall we therefore unloose all the bonds of Government, and return to a state of anarchy? Because fathers may turn tyrants, and mothers prove monsters, shall we abolish those dear relations and extinguish those sacred charities which they enkindle and cherish? Shall we draw rules of civil and social conduct from such violent suppositions? After all, we must confide, to a greater or less extent, in our fellow-man; more or less we must trust to others every moment of our lives. Shall we then sit down in inglorious ease, merely because our confidence may be abused? Rather should we use the best means which our Maker has given us to plant such safeguards as we can around our constitution; and if we are not traitors to ourselves, if we dig not our own graves, we shall be free and prosperous.

But it is said, that the judiciary is not competent, from its organization, to settle political controversies. What is meant by political powers? Every power is political to some extent.

Revenue Collection Bill—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

[SENATE.]

Did Chief Justice Marshall mean to say, in the speech cited by the Senator from Kentucky, that the judiciary could not decide a question arising out of the tariff laws? Never. His head was too sound for that. Besides, a political speech is not the best authority which can be adduced for judicial opinions. He marvelled not a little when the Senator from Kentucky introduced it as authority. When he came to look at it, he found that it was a speech made in Congress, in high party times, upon a case which involved great political and party excitement at that day—the case of a British subject who was seized as a deserter, given up, and put to death. But he rejoiced to find that the illustrious individual who made the speech referred to was perfectly at home in discussing the subject, and that the views which he took of it displayed the soundness of his head and the purity of his heart. “To come within the description, (of the powers conferred upon the judiciary,) a question must,” he says, “assume a legal form, for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit.” The case must have a legal form, and parties, and must be submitted to the court; these are all the forms which are necessary to place it within the powers of the judiciary. When something is to be adjudicated, something to be given and taken away, then the judicial power may be exercised, though the case result from a treaty. In the dispute concerning the northwestern boundary, referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, there were no parties but the two States. But the case made by South Carolina has all the attributes which the doctrine laid down in the speech referred to requires.

The tariff law is individual in its effects, and makes parties by which the case can be submitted to the court. A merchant belonging to New York sojourns in Charleston, for commercial purposes. He imports goods from Great Britain. He is required to pay the duties on them. This makes a plain case of law, involving a personal claim. The merchant tells the collector that he cannot pay these duties. Why? Here is the law of the United States, says the collector, and I am bound to enforce it. That law has been nullified, replies the merchant; and here is the ordinance of nullification, passed by some citizens of this State who assembled the other day for that purpose. What will be the rejoinder of the officer? He will say, Sir, I act under the authority of the United States, and you must pay the duty. The merchant insists, and pleads in bar of the law the laws of South Carolina. Is there any political question here to which the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court does not extend? Where is the usurpation in this case? On the part of the United States law, or this ordinance?

I have done, continued Mr. F., with this part of the case. For the purpose of keeping all power in check, the judiciary was established. The framers of the constitution hoped to obtain, through it, a peaceful mode for the adjustment of all constitutional questions. In a country of wider extent than all Europe, and embracing under one Government many distinct communities, they hoped to secure perpetual peace and tranquillity by this arbiter of peace. Compare the operation of this peaceful check with the resort to which Europe is accustomed for the preservation of the balance of power. Must we have the sword or the court as our arbiter? Europe has tried the sword, and has shed rivers of blood in the vain pursuit of the balance of power.

MONDAY, February 4.

Revenue Collection Bill—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

The Senate having again proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports—

Mr. BROWN, of North Carolina, rose. He did not believe, he said, that he should be able to say any thing to equal the high intellectual entertainment which the gentleman who preceded him in this discussion had furnished to the Senate. But he would endeavor to remunerate whatever attention the Senate might give to his plain, homely effort, by the brevity of his remarks. If he had consulted the admonitions of discretion rather than of duty, he should have been silent, nor have offered to oppose his views to those of gentlemen of such distinguished ability. But the bill before the Senate involved questions of such magnitude, that he could not content himself with a silent vote upon it. The subject was of high interest to the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, both as a member of the common Union, and in reference to her peculiar position, bordering, as she does, upon the State out of whose legislation arose this question. This obligation of duty derived additional force from the resolutions of the State of North Carolina, instructing her Senators to exert their influence to obtain a “peaceable adjustment of this controversy,” and to produce a restoration of harmony between the Federal Government and the State of South Carolina. While it always afforded him pleasure to comply with the requests of his constituents, in obeying their injunctions on this occasion, he followed also the dictates of his own judgment and ardent wishes. It was his earnest hope that this contest, which was now assuming an angry and threatening aspect, should be settled in a peaceable manner. He need not say that he disapproved of the course of South Carolina, or that his State disapproved of it. Her course, he thought, had been rash and uncalled for by the exigency of the times. She should have relied, as he did, upon a constitutional remedy; upon the returning sense of justice in the people of the Northern and Eastern States; and upon the wisdom and patriotism assembled in the legislative halls of the country. But the State of South Carolina thought differently, and took redress into her own hands. She was responsible to herself for her course. It was not his business to sit in judgment upon her, but to express, on his own part, and that of his State, disapprobation of her course.

The bill, though proposing on its face to be general in its application, was manifestly intended to be applied to South Carolina alone. Though the name was not written under the picture, he who runs may easily read. What is the proper way of settling this question? What course is most likely to lead to a peaceable adjustment of it? This is the question before us. The Committee on the Judiciary must excuse him, if, notwithstanding the high respect he entertained for their talents, he should wholly dissent from the specific remedy which they propose. He did not believe that the bill by them presented to the Senate was calculated to carry out the glorious, the inestimable principle of our institutions, that our Government should be essentially pacific in its remedies. He believed that, in its consequences, it would be attended with violence, and perhaps lead to civil war. He objected to the provision which authorized the repulsion by force of any attempt to execute the laws of South Carolina in reference to the revenue. To that provision he mainly objected, but there were some other provisions of minor importance which did not meet his assent. If any one principle was better established than another, in reference to our institutions, it was that the military should be subordinate to the civil authority. If any one principle was sacred, it was this. It was one which no emergency justified us in departing from; one which constituted the very essence of a republican form of Government, and without which free institutions could not exist. When we establish the doctrine that military authority may step in to execute the law, before the judiciary has exerted its powers, then the essence and spirit of our institutions are essentially changed. It has been our boast that in cases where other nations resort to war, we resort to a peaceful mode of attaining a settlement of the question; and to the judicial tribunal is committed the administration of these peaceful measures. He did not at all object to the due administration and operation of the laws of the United States. He wished the laws to find support in the energy of the constitution. It was vain to say that coercive measures are necessary in this case; for there is an inherent energy in the constitution which will enable the laws to triumph without an appeal to force.

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. WILKINS) asked us the other day, if we were unwilling that the powers proposed to be given to the Executive by the bill should be confided to the present President of the United States. But that was not the question. He would say that the past course of the President had been such as to entitle him to unlimited confidence, and there was no individual to whom he would more willingly confide this power than to the President. But there was no man, however elevated in station and ennobled by virtue, however pure his integrity and honest his purposes, to whom he would give a power which was unwarranted by the constitution. We are told that a jealous watch over the repositories of power is the only way of preserving liberty. He could not believe for a moment, that, if this power were given to the President, he would abuse it. But it might, in worse times than these, and in worse hands than his, be abused to the destruction of our institutions. We may be told that the power will be limited as to continuance and application. But what does history teach us? That the fact of to-day becomes a precedent to-morrow. Our own history shows us instances of powers, some well established as constitutional, which the framers of the constitution and its early friends would have shrunk from with dread. The General Government has been gradually drawing to itself the exercise of doubtful powers. When told that they are not given by the constitution, they reply that they are justified by precedent.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the course of his remarks, spoke of the submissive manner in which that State would yield obedience to the most unjust and injurious legislation of Congress. The history of that State was illustrated by the virtues and patriotism of her citizens, but the Senator would pardon him if he should say that the State of Pennsylvania was not quite exempt from the faults which are imputed to the State of South Carolina. The course of Pennsylvania, in the famous Olmstead case, had some agency in bringing about the present state of things in South Carolina. Though South Carolina had not derived her impulse from that source, yet the doctrines once contended for by Pennsylvania were appealed to in justification of her present course. The opinions and principles of Pennsylvania in the Olmstead case had been cited in the discussions in South Carolina, as justifying her resort to self-redress. He did not stamp his approbation on them, nor on those of Carolina. [Mr. B. then read extracts from the report made in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, on the message of the Governor, relative to the mandamus of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gideon Olmstead, as follows:]

"That the subject referred to them has not failed to engage their most serious reflection. They have viewed it in every point of light in which it could be considered. It is by no means a matter of indifference. In whatever way the Legislature may decide, it will be in the highest degree important. We may purchase peace by a surrender of right, or exhibit to the present times, and to late posterity, an awful lesson in the conflicts to prevent it. It becomes a sacred duty we owe to our common country, to discard pusillanimity on the one hand, and rashness on the other. In either case, we shall furnish materials for history; and future times must judge of our wisdom or our weakness. Ancient history furnishes no parallel to the constitution of this united republic. And should this great experiment fail, vain may be every effort to establish rational liberty. The spirit of the times gives birth to jealousy of power; it is interwoven in our system; and is, perhaps, essential to perfect freedom and the rights of mankind. But this jealousy, urged to the extreme, may eventually destroy even liberty itself. As connected with the federal system, the State Governments, with their inherent rights, must at every hazard, be preserved entire; otherwise the General Government may assume a character never contemplated by its framers, which may change its whole nature."

"Resolved, That in a Government like that of the United States, where there are powers granted to the General Government, and rights reserved to the States, it is impossible, from the imperfection of language, so to define the limits of each, that difficulties should not sometimes arise from a collision of powers; and it is to be lamented that no provision is made in the constitution, for determining disputes between the General and State Governments, by an impartial tribunal, when such cases occur.

"Resolved, That from the construction the United States courts give to their powers, the harmony of the States, if they resist encroachments on their rights, will frequently be interrupted; and if, to prevent this evil, they should, on all occasions, yield to stretches of power, the reserved rights of the States will depend on the arbitrary power of the courts.

"Resolved, That, should the independence of the States, as secured by the Constitution, be destroyed, the liberties of the people, in so extensive a country, cannot long survive. To suffer the United States courts to decide on State rights, will, from a bias in favor of power, necessarily destroy the federal part of our Government; and whenever the Government of the United States becomes consolidated, we may learn from the history of nations, what will be the event."

Those papers show what were the doctrines of Pennsylvania at that time; and it is well known that she went on to carry those into practical operation. She called out her whole military power to resist the decree of the court, and steps were taken to bring her military force into actual service. He did not adduce this fact because he approved of the doctrines of Pennsylvania, for, in his opinion, she went too far. But he meant to show her rashness did not draw down upon her the power of the Union. The administration of that day had not recourse to military coercion. The decided stand which the State had taken was known to the Government and to Congress, but they did not consider that any coercive measure was necessary before the judicial tribunals had tried their remedy. No bill was introduced in Congress, no measures recommended by the President for meeting the measures of Pennsylvania with military force. They trusted to the force of our institutions, without other remedy, and those institutions triumphed.

Should not the recollection of this transaction inculcate upon Pennsylvania moderation, and unabated confidence in a peaceful remedy? The case addressed itself particularly to that State, and bound her to practise the same moderation towards Carolina which the Union practised towards her, when, in a moment of high excitement, she opposed herself to the laws of the Union. He would, in further support of his views, read from a speech delivered by a highly distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, a passage which was fraught with just and liberal sentiments. [From the address delivered before the literary societies of Jefferson College, at the annual commencement in September, 1832, by the honorable W. WILKINS, he read the following passage:]

"If we start with horror from such frightful consequences, let our efforts be directed to avert the evil which brings them in its train. Ever keep in mind the spirit of compromise in which our Constitution had its origin. Instead of defiance and derision, let us adopt the tone of conciliation, and, where practicable, of concession. Instead of hunting up materials, from spiteful comparisons between different States or districts, let us remember only what is glorious in the history, or estimable in the character of each; adopting the happy quotation of Lord Chatham, when deprecating that stubborn and contemptuous defiance which led to the dismemberment of the British empire; let each State, in reference to every other,

'Be to her faults a little blind,
Be to her virtues very kind.'"

In dwelling on the common efforts and the common sacrifices—on that precious fund of glorious recollections which two wars have accumulated for the whole country—there must be kindled a generous and sympathetic ardor which will prove the most powerful of centripetal forces. I agree, continued Mr. B., that the spirit of compromise and conciliation is the strongest bond which binds us together, and it is that tie which unites us, and not the strong arm of military power.

The gentleman from New Jersey, in the course of his remarks, said that the constitution was ratified by the people; that it was submitted to the States merely from convenience; and that the people had clothed the General Government with its powers. To that position he would not assent. It brings up the great question of consolidated powers. The establishment of this doctrine utterly annihilates the constitution as it was expounded by the most enlightened republicans of '98 and '99. If that doctrine had been constitutional, then it was only necessary that the constitution should be ratified by the majority of the people. The ceremony of submitting the instrument for the ratification of the States was an idle mockery, if the powers granted by the constitution were not granted by the sovereign States, but by the people in mass. He would refer to the history of the transaction. Eleven States had ratified the constitution, constituting an overwhelming majority of the people; but still North Carolina refused to ratify it, and so did Rhode Island. As sovereign States, they refused their sanction to it. If the doctrine of the Senator from New Jersey was correct, North Carolina was, at this time, guilty of resistance to the constitution and laws. Little Rhode Island was guilty of opposition to the supreme law of the land, for she did not come into the Union for some time after North Carolina. That single circumstance shed much light on this subject. The State of Rhode Island, a small State, but little larger in population than some of the counties in New York, yet exercising on that occasion a sovereignty co-extensive with that of New York, Pennsylvania, or any other State in the Union. Another fact repudiates the doctrine here advanced, that the constitution is the work of the people. It is only necessary for a majority of the States, constituting one-fourth of the people, to refuse to elect Senators, and an end is put at once to the General Government. This consideration puts to flight all the arguments urged to prove that this is a consolidated Government. He was aware that it had been said, in reply to this remark, the meaning of the quorum, which was necessary to enable the Senate to transact business, would in this case be construed to mean a majority of the States actually represented; and the States not represented would not be considered as belonging to the Union. But this objection would drive gentlemen to an admission of the rights of secession—a doctrine which, perhaps, they would not be willing to allow; for if a State has not the right of secession, no act that she herself may do, or omit to do, can place her out of the Union.

But if the origin and nature of our government did not put this idea to rest, the character and extent of our country would have done so. The people of so wide and various a surface would never have delegated the powers to make a consolidated Government. They knew that no such Government could exist here. What says Mr. Hamilton in the Federalist? What says Mr. Madison on the subject? Why, that to adopt a consolidated Government would be destroying the principles of the revolution, and would inevitably lead to monarchy. And why? Because whenever a majority, having adverse interests to the minority, should combine to oppress the smaller portion, the latter would have to intrench themselves behind their reserved rights, and make resistance to the oppression, or be annihilated.

What would be the consequence of this resistance? So soon as the minority discovered that the majority were forcing interests adverse to their own, and they began to resist the encroachment, the military arm of the Government would immediately be strengthened, and there would be but one step beyond—that of a monarchy.

The gentleman from New Jersey had said that it was the aspiring pride of the State sovereignties which had led to this state of things.

The aspiring pride of the State sovereignties! It was an avowal of doctrines such as these which was so repugnant to his feelings. It was well known that in the origin of the Government the country was divided into two great parties. One of these parties contended in favor of the reserved rights of the States, and to restricted powers of the General Government. The other was for conferring on the General Government unlimited powers. This last was called the federal party. With a loud note they proclaimed the necessity of investing the General Government with a vast range of authority. Some of them even went so far as to propose a form of Government which would have been substantially a monarchy. Mr. Hamilton, in the convention which framed the federal constitution, had advocated the appointment of a chief Executive Magistrate, and a Senate during good behavior, which was equivalent to appointing them for life. Such, said Mr. B., is my remembrance of the subject. The history of these times will show the fact. The doctrine of State rights, and of the reserved powers of the State sovereignties, was abhorrent to the leaders of that party. They did not, however, succeed in carrying their enlarged views into effect. He did not intend to characterize the whole of that party as entertaining these views. But such were the sentiments of some of its leaders. Nor did he intend to impugn the motives of these gentlemen, though he doubted not they were actuated by feelings as patriotic as those which actuated any men. But it was well known that the high-toned part of the federal party did doubt the competency of the people to self-government. They were for arming the federal power with all authority, in order, as they said, to save the people from their own worst enemies. There were some of the prominent men of the country who did not subscribe to that principle, but who did believe that the people were competent to self-government; that they were fully able to go through the work which they had begun, and to carry out that beautiful theory of republican rule. Happily for the country, they prevailed. Happily for the country, the principle was established, that the States were sovereign and independent, as to all powers which they had not delegated to the General Government. And some of the republican party went so far as to believe that the States themselves had the right, in the last resort, to determine for themselves what were the precise powers which they had delegated. He was well aware that the doctrine of nullification, as it now prevailed in South Carolina, was about to be made use of, not against that doctrine alone, which he did not rise up to defend, but for the purpose of founding upon it a war of extermination. It was against that that he desired to enter his protest; under this masked battery, he saw that it was intended to fire upon the rights of the States. Gentlemen held up the flag of nullification, rang all the changes upon the word, sounded the tocsin of alarm throughout the country, and presented the whole matter in a light the most unfavorable to South Carolina, in order to justify to the other States the war which they were disposed to wage. It was a war, too, which would admit of no neutrals. The gentlemen who have taken the strong ground, like Napoleon, have thrown out the declaration that there must be no neutrals.

I take my stand, said Mr. B., on the reserved rights of the States. I repudiate the doctrine of nullification. I repudiate also the high-toned doctrine of the federal party. I believe it is to that high-toned doctrine that we are to attribute nullification. I believe that doctrine produced it; is the parent of it. It is by an improper pressure of the Federal Government on the rights of the States, and by exercising doubtful powers, that the State of South Carolina has been thrown into this position. He did not mean to justify the course of that State. But whether she was right or whether she was wrong, this furnished her with something like an excuse for her conduct. He believed that the principle was as susceptible of demonstration as any principle of mathematics; that almost any attitude of resistance against the Federal Government, in which States had been seen, arose out of the unwarrantable exercise of doubtful powers by the United States. They had always been inclined to tranquillity. They had always been disposed to make a child's bargain with the United States: If you will let us alone, we will let you alone. They would never have admitted the idea of rising in opposition to the United States, unless there had been some exciting cause. The whole history of the world proves this fact. There is no precedent where a people have arrayed themselves against a supreme power without any occasion, because the great body of mankind has always been found more ready to acquiesce in oppression than to resist it. He desired gentlemen to produce a single precedent where a people whose pursuits are peaceful and agricultural for the most part, were willing to cast away "the piping times of peace," and for the mere love of glory to rush into a conflict against power, and that power twenty times larger than itself. Could gentlemen produce an instance where any State, without provocation, had ever offered resistance to the General Government? He had thus, he believed, established the great principle that the States themselves were always willing to be quiet, and that most of the opposition which had been manifested against the General Government had arisen from the exercise of doubtful power by that Government, by which had been provoked that State pride which the gentleman from New Jersey so earnestly denounced. Without that pride this republic would now have been as nothing. To justify this principle, that most of the controversies which had arisen, have arisen from the circumstance of the Federal Government taking their debatable ground, he would read an authority which would meet with the approbation of all pure democrats. It was the authority of George Clinton, a name deserving of all respect; clarum et venerabile nomen; a man distinguished for his steady adherence to democratic doctrines. When he was President of the Senate in 1810, he gave his casting vote against the bank. It was on that occasion that he used the following language:

"In the course of a long life I have found that Government is not to be strengthened by the assumption of doubtful powers, but by a wise and energetic execution of those which are incontestable; the former never fails to produce suspicion and distrust, whilst the latter inspires respect and confidence.

"If, however, after a fair experiment, the powers vested in the General Government shall be found incompetent to the attainment of the objects for which it was instituted, the constitution happily furnishes the means for remedying the evil by amendment; and I have no doubt that, in such event, on an appeal to the patriotism and good sense of the community, it will be readily applied."

What was the result of his experience? That the Government was never strengthened by the exercise of doubtful powers. A doctrine which still prevails among the distinguished leaders of the party in the State of New York, and which they can never consent to surrender, unless they should become recreant to the great principles which they have always maintained. But he would not only quote authority, but he would also quote facts. What was it which excited the first controversy between a State and the United States; a conflict which threatened to bring ruin on the country, and which was designated the reign of terror by the republican party, as it well deserved to be characterized? He referred to the alien and sedition law, which, by usurping the power of trampling into dust the liberty of speech, the freedom of the press, and all the rights and securities which the people had enjoyed, called forth a movement the most glorious to the country that could be imagined. It drew forth the celebrated report of Mr. Madison, a report to the merits of which he was totally inadequate to do justice. This was a movement of the aspiring pride of the State sovereignties, which, instead of destroying the Union, brought back the Government to its first principles. So much, then, for State pride. If that State pride had preserved the constitution at its last gasp, it ought not to have called down upon it such unqualified reprobation. The doctrines of Virginia saved the confederacy in that dangerous crisis. They produced a civil revolution, which brought into power the wisest and the ablest statesman who ever lived in any country. This was one of the benefits which had resulted from State pride.

In the case of the establishment of the United States Bank there arose also a conflict of powers. There were many who believed that it was an assumption of power not delegated to the Federal Government. Ohio was one of the States which held that opinion. This matter also was finally adjusted. What was the next question which agitated the country? It was the exercise of the power of internal improvement. That was not an expressed power granted to the General Government. It was among the doubtful powers, and the right to exercise it was denied by several of the States. It was denied by the State of New Hampshire, and by a very respectable portion of the State of New York, which held that it was one of the doubtful powers. The right of appropriating money to all or any objects was another of the doubtful powers. The State of New York, and some other of the States, disputed the right of the Federal Government to appropriate money except for the purposes pointed out by the constitution. Such are the contentions which had arisen from the exercise of doubtful powers by the Federal Government.

The case of Georgia was the next to which he would call the attention of the Senate. The usurped powers which the United States attempted to exercise over her provoked the pride of that State, as well it might. When the Government of the United States undertook to tell her that she could not extend her jurisdiction over the whole of her own soil, she might well resist. This contention, arising also from the exercise of doubtful powers by the United States, was at one moment pregnant with awful menace.

The last, but not the least, of the conflicts which have arisen from the exercise of doubtful powers by the General Government, was in relation to the protective system. Here the Government of the United States had assumed the right of unlimited taxation, of taxing one portion of the community for the benefit of another and a more favored portion. He hoped that he had thus succeeded in establishing the position that most of the controversies which had arisen had their origin in the exercise of doubtful powers by the Federal Government, operating against those rights which the States deem necessary for the preservation of their existence in a sovereign capacity.

The gentleman from New Jersey had held up the constitution in his hand, and, with all that patriotic ardor for which he was distinguished, said he should cling to the bond. I, too, said Mr. B., will cling to the bond; and while I will willingly allow the gentleman to take full usage, I hope that, in taking the pound of flesh, he will not spill one drop of blood. The gentleman had also said, that old Rome never submitted to the dictation of any of her provinces. This was a luminous commentary on the rest of his remarks. No wonder that he had spoken disparagingly of the States, when he compared them to Roman provinces. This sufficiently accounted for the consolidated principles of the gentleman from New Jersey. But old Rome was always ready to extend justice to her provinces. Whenever the deputies of a province came before her Senate, she did not fear to do them justice. We may all becomingly fear to do wrong, but we should not fear to do justice.

The gentleman from New Jersey had said he would not strike a sister State, but would retire to the wall. He, Mr. B., admired this principle, which so admirably accorded with what he knew of the private worth of the gentleman from New Jersey. But when the gentleman went on to say that the dignity of the country required that the laws should be executed, he could not avoid asking him in what that dignity consisted? Did it consist in calling out the military power, in bringing citizen into conflict with citizen, and deluging the country with the blood of her children? If that was the meaning of the dignity of the country, he, Mr. B., prayed Heaven to deliver him from such dignity. He considered that the dignity and honor of the country would be best promoted and established by doing justice, and carrying out peacefully and efficiently the principles of the constitution. This would be worth all false glory, all the national glory of which we have heard so much. It would eclipse all the glory of imperial Rome, and of imperial France, which was nothing to the glory of a just, equal, and benignant dispensation of the laws.

One of the reasons which had mainly induced him to rise was, to show that every peaceful remedy should be resorted to. The constitution was framed in a spirit of mutual deference. It was ratified in that same spirit of deference, and so it ought to be administered. The whole history of our country conforms to that principle; a mutual deference to all great interests of the country. The practice of the Government has been invariably marked with the spirit of conciliation.

The State of Kentucky, in 1794, was dissatisfied with the Government of the United States, because the free navigation of the Mississippi had not been secured. The Legislature of that State made a strong remonstrance on the subject to the General Government, claiming that free navigation as their right. They asserted that God and nature had given them this right; and they menaced a withdrawal from the Union if it was not obtained for them. What was the course of Washington? What was the course of the American Congress on this occasion? They did not assume the ground that they would not legislate while this menace was held over them. Yet no one could doubt the courage of Washington. No one could doubt that he was not prepared for every emergency. He said that the Government had been established in a spirit of compromise, and he recommended that a respectful reply be given to the State. He laid before the Legislature the facts in the case, and the free navigation of the Mississippi was obtained.

There was also another case, which was the assumption of the State debts. At the close of the war of the revolution, besides the national debt, each State had contracted its debt; and it was demanded by the Eastern States that the General Government should assume the payment of these debts of the States. Such was the dissatisfaction which had resulted from Congress delaying the payment of these debts for five years, that a dismemberment of the Union was expected. In making this reference, he had no intention to cast an imputation on the States, but merely to state facts. The General Government ultimately assumed these debts. Suppose that, instead of taking this course, the General Government had acted on the idea thrown out by the gentleman from New Jersey, that the pride of the State sovereignties ought to be checked; we should not, said Mr. B., be at this moment engaging in this discussion, and enjoying the privilege to which this floor entitles us.

The next instance was the repeal of the embargo law in 1807. This was a measure of Mr. Jefferson, and one to which he was much attached. But when he saw that, by the continuance of this embargo, the Union was likely to be dismembered, did he say that the law must be enforced at all hazards? No such thing. Acting on the conviction that this is a Government of compromise, he repealed the embargo. In his works published since his death, it is made apparent that this was a very favorite measure with him. Yet on the approach of so dangerous a crisis, he hesitated not to abandon and repeal it.

This is another instance of concession on the part of the General Government to States, which resisted the exercise of doubtful powers.

Mr. B. said, as he had stated his objections to the course which the honorable Judiciary Committee had advised or recommended to the Senate to adopt, and deeming it not calculated, as honorable gentlemen had observed, to preserve the Union, but, on the contrary, calculated, if carried into practical operation, to destroy this glorious Union, it was proper that he should state what he thought would best meet the present crisis. He considered the true remedy a peaceful remedy, that of conciliation, according alike with the genius of the constitution and the practice of the Government. The revenue should be reduced to the wants of the Government; and the oppression which the Southern people labored under, in consequence of the tariff system, ought to be removed. If gentlemen wished to preserve the Union, the country should be appeased. This appeared to him to be an infallible remedy. The one, however, which the committee had prescribed, might be fraught with some danger. He was aware that there was a set of politicians, who thought this the favorable moment to try the strength of the Union, and that Government ought not to concede one particle of the protective system. Can it be possible, at this day, (said Mr. B.) that any individual would wish to jeopardize the peace and harmony of twelve or thirteen millions of people, not only the peace of a whole people, but to retard the progress of free Governments throughout the world by an experiment of that kind, to try the strength of the Union, and whether it can survive the use of the military power? He hoped not. He trusted that our republic would be hazarded by no such speculative experiment.

It is argued, continued Mr. B., that the State of South Carolina having placed herself in this attitude of defence, Congress ought not to legislate on the subject, as had been said in some of the newspapers, while the sword is brandishing over our heads. This is not meeting the question; it is not the true question; it is a question of a very different character. Are the people of South Carolina alone concerned in this matter? Is not a vast portion of the American people concerned in it? Are not the whole of the Southern States interested in this subject? It is not only the Southern States, the State of New Hampshire, the State of Maine, and a portion of the people of New York, but a large and respectable number of the States in the Southwest, which consider the tariff system unjust and repugnant to the principles of the constitution, and that we have no right to keep it up. It is argued that justice should not be done to South Carolina, because she has assumed a menacing attitude. This is not a proper view; it is not just to the other States. Is it any reason, because South Carolina has acted imprudently, that she should not receive justice? If she has forfeited any claim to the consideration of the General Government, ought the other States to incur the forfeiture? Nothing can be more erroneous, nothing more absurd, nothing, I will say, more tyrannical, than to oppress all the Southern States, because South Carolina has acted rashly. I do not, said Mr. B., argue this question as a Southern question. Thank God, in the exercise of my legislative rights and duties here, I can look beyond the Potomac. Thank God, I have a feeling which is not confined to the geographical limits of any portion of the United States. I can look and judge of my countrymen north as well as south of the Potomac; and I wish it to be distinctly understood, that what I now say respecting South Carolina, I deem applicable to every member of this confederacy. To no one of these States would I arrogantly say, I will not do justice, until you come on your knees before me.

I do hope, if I have any patriotism, it is not that narrow contracted patriotism which is confined to geographical limits. I trust it is that patriotism which looks abroad over the Union, and embraces every portion of my fellow-citizens. And so help me God, if my constituents were this day to demand that I should perpetrate an act of injustice against any member of this confederacy, that I should do an act in behalf of North Carolina which would trench upon the rights of Maine or of Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania, which I believed destructive of their constitutional rights, so help me God I would resign my seat, and retire to my home, rather than jeopard the peace of this Republic, this glorious experiment of a free Government, by taking what justly belongs to Maine, and unjustly to bestow it on North Carolina; believing that a man presents a more truly dignified attitude who refuses to do an unjust act, than he who perseveres in injustice.

But what are we now called upon to do? We are called upon imminently to jeopard the public peace, by a novel and dangerous experiment; to enforce a law which not only a large portion of the American people believe unconstitutional, but which I verily believe, if the question were submitted to their individual opinion this day, they would repudiate and require to be rejected. We are called upon to enforce a tariff law, which I believe the majority of the people of the United States desire to have amended or modified; and the modification of which is fortified likewise by the recommendation of the Chief Magistrate.

And before I proceed further, let me explain myself on this point. I do not take the ground, and I will not take it, and I wish to be distinctly understood with respect to this matter, that a law which is tainted with injustice should not be put in force. I take the ground that no law oppressive in its character should be executed by interposition of military power, until every pacific measure which can be devised shall have been resorted to without the desired result. The remedy for evils of the greatest magnitude should be sought for in the peaceful tribunals of this country, according to the great principles handed down to us by the English whigs, and which we have infused into the spirit of our constitution and government.

If, on a failure of all these means, it shall be found necessary to use force to execute the laws, let it be used. I am not prepared to say that the emergency cannot arise; but I do say, that before a law of this kind is to be executed, before the peace of the Union is to be disturbed, there ought to be a reference to the justice, to the wisdom of Congress, to weigh, to examine the provisions of that law, and solemnly to pause and reflect before proceeding to put it in force by military power.

I beg leave, said Mr. B., to advert to what the President of the United States has said in his message to Congress, and I do it because this is the first remedy which the President recommended to Congress at the opening of the present session. I cannot doubt, that if the Executive wishes were consulted, he would, and decidedly, give the preference to a peaceful settlement of the difficulties by Congress. I do not mean to say that his preference should influence our legislation, but it ought to have weight with us.

Speaking of the extinguishment of the public debt, the President goes on to remark:

"The final removal of this great burden from our resources affords the means of further provisions for all the objects of general welfare and public defence which the constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction of the revenue as may not be required for them. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that after the present year, such a reduction may be made to a considerable extent; and the subject is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in the hope that the combined wisdom of the representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object, as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall unequally upon any, and as may promote all the great interests of the community."

Again, in another part of the message, the President remarks:

"That manufactures adequate to the supply of our domestic consumption would, in the abstract, be beneficial to our country, there is no reason to doubt; and to effect their establishment, there is perhaps no American citizen who would not for a while be willing to pay a higher price for them. But for this purpose, it is presumed that a tariff of high duties, designed for perpetual protection, has entered into the minds of but few of our statesmen. The most they have anticipated is a temporary, and generally incidental protection, which they maintain has the effect to reduce the price, by domestic competition, below that of the foreign article. Experience, however, our best guide on this as on other subjects, makes it doubtful whether the advantages of this system are not counterbalanced by many evils, and whether it does not tend to beget in the minds of a large portion of our countrymen a spirit of discontent and jealousy dangerous to the stability of the Union."

These are the sentiments of the President regarding the law which we are now called on to adopt extraordinary means of carrying into execution.

As I consider this is a most important point, as I consider it the true means of removing the difficulty now involved in this question, I have not only adverted to the annual message of the President as showing the views of the administration and their remedy for the difficulties in the South, but I would now beg leave to read from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

[Here Mr. B. read an extract from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the reduction of the duties.]

Thus we have the direct suggestion of the present administration, that this is the most appropriate remedy. It is the one which was first suggested at the opening of the session, and I believe it is calculated to achieve all the great objects so much to be desired, all which it is necessary to achieve, and that without endangering the republic.

What is the extraordinary spectacle, I would remark, which the American republic now exhibits to the world? A republic which has heretofore boasted of its freedom—a republic which has heretofore pursued the "even and peaceful tenor of its way"—a republic which had been found competent to all the legitimate purposes of Government without slaughtering its citizens, and which, with very few exceptions, has gone on peaceably for fifty years. We present the extraordinary spectacle of calling on the administration and the Executive branch of the Government to enforce a law against a portion of our fellow-citizens, to compel them to contribute so much money to the revenue, which it is acknowledged is six millions annually more than is requisite for the wants of the General Government. A removal of that burden would remove all difficulty with the State of South Carolina. Even a partial removal of it, a mitigation of it, would make the tariff system more acceptable to the people, without a total abandonment of the principles. I speak in reference to the views and prevailing sentiments of that portion of the people I represent.

Sir, it does appear to me a powerful consideration that we are almost on the eve of a civil war; and for what? To enforce a law for the collection of revenue, when it is admitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, that there are at present six millions of dollars more than is wanted for the common purposes of the Government. Is this calculated to elevate us in the eyes of the nations of Europe? Is this calculated to cheer the hopes of those people who have been long struggling for their rights? Permit me to say that I think it will somewhat weaken the force of our republican experiment; yet, I believe that our Government is capable of achieving all the great objects for which it was designed, and settling this matter.

If in the revolutionary contest, when the blood and treasure of this country were profusely poured forth to establish the rights and liberties of mankind, to give self-government and to abolish unjust taxation, any one of our ancestors who were engaged in this glorious struggle had predicted that in less than half a century afterwards we should be engaged in the consideration of a bill to compel a portion of the people, at the point of the bayonet, to pay taxes when the Government had six millions of dollars more than it needed, they would not have believed him; credulity itself at that time would not have believed such a prediction. If they could have credited the story, it would have enervated the arm which struck for liberty, would have damped the bosom which glowed with patriotism. But what has been the practice of our Government heretofore? I beg leave to recur to another case distinguished in the history of our Government, and which I overlooked at the time I was remarking on the various instances of forbearance shown by our Government. In the late war, when a large majority of the people of the United States believed the pride of the country to have been wounded, when the constituted authorities of the land believed the national honor to have been trampled upon by the British Government, and considered it the sacred duty of all to assist them in resenting the insult, we found many on that occasion—yes, even pending the gloomiest period of the war—resisting every bill which went to give the Government of the United States men and means to prosecute that war. They resisted it on the ground that peace might be obtained, and, I believe, because they deemed the war to be unjust, and while our villages were smoking and our country invaded by a large body of hostile troops.

We find at that moment a large body of men in Congress, whose patriotism I do not call in question—far be it from me to do so—a powerful, talented, and respectable body of men, even at the darkest periods of that war, voting against giving men and money to carry on the war. Great Britain had trampled on our commercial rights, had insulted us on the high seas for six years before war was declared. Notwithstanding all this, we found a powerful body who said that no army or money ought to be voted to the Government. Now, if that spirit of forbearance, great as it was, could be shown to an enemy whose cry was, Delenda est Carthago—if that spirit could be exercised bello flagrante—certainly some little patience is due to our brethren of the South. Surely some forbearance ought to be shown to our countrymen. If there were many at that time who thought the sword should not be unsheathed against those who would trample us under foot, is it to be supposed that we are now to plunge it into our fellow-citizens without some little examination into their cause?

I wish to be distinctly understood on one point. I do not intend to justify South Carolina; I am not her advocate, but she has a right to have justice done her. I do believe, however, that this question may be settled; and that by acting in a spirit of conciliation—a spirit not only due to her, but the vast portions of the North and South—the question might be put at rest. As regards the union of these States, there is not a member in the Senate, and I trust I shall not be considered egotistical when I say that there is not, in the whole Union, one in soul and heart more dearly devoted to it than my humble self. I believe that all the advantages of liberty, and of a free government, are at issue in this matter; and it is for that reason I urge a pacific course. Even the Grenvilles and the Norths, arrogant as they were, even they brought forward their measures; even they repealed some of their odious laws to satisfy the desires of the colonies. And shall it be said, there is now a spirit more inexorable, more inaccessible to the voice of justice, than that which prevailed under the British monarchy. If so, the blood of those who achieved the revolution was shed in vain, and the hopes of the friends of free government are forever put at rest. If that inexorable principle, that there is to be no regard paid to the feelings and wishes of the minority, he would say that this would change the whole principle of our federal compact, depriving it of all its republican and benignant features, and converting the federal into a consolidated Government.

In every portion of the Union there is a set of great primary interests. He wished to be distinctly understood on this point. He did not mean to say that the Government of the United States should yield to every rash requirement of a State; far from it; but he did intend to say, that whenever any of those great primary and leading interests made just remonstrance against any obvious oppression, it was our duty, in the true federative spirit of our Government, to forbear; otherwise, the Government must effectually change its character. The West has her primary interests and sensibilities in reference to the great land question, and he (Mr. B.) would always be disposed to do ample justice to her as well as to every other section of this country. He would not feel power and forget right. New York has great interests in a commercial and manufacturing way; he, therefore, would do nothing that would trample them down. He would let them be free as they are, and give them all the privileges they require. With regard to the manufacturing interests of the country, he believed that the constitution did not tax the interests of one portion of the people to benefit another. He would bear and forbear. And, as to a specific measure for the reduction of the revenue, he declared that he was not one of those who would give a deadly blow to the manufacturing interests, by a thorough and too rapid reduction to the revenue point. He would do it gradually, in that spirit of forbearance which is due to the whole Union. Having glanced at the peculiar interests of the West and North, he would now advert to those of the Southern States. Their interests consist in producing as much as possible, selling at the highest prices, and buying as low as possible. But that natural course of things had been interrupted by the Government of the United States for many years past. But he did not subscribe to that doctrine which is maintained by some, that there are not essential interests common to a large portion of the United States. He believed every section of the Union, North, South, West, and East, were inseparably connected. There was no such thing as an adverse interest. It was true that an artificial state of things had grown up.

There was no difference between the great natural interests which God and nature had given us; if there was any difference, it arose from a dread of unjust legislation. Unjust legislation had produced it, and not the diversity of soil, habits, and pursuits. The true doctrine was, to extend equal protection to all in their various habits and pursuits, and leave the path free for a generous and beneficial competition of all.

Proud as he was of the achievements which had been performed under the star-spangled banner; proud as he was of the stars and stripes which have fluttered in every sea and every clime; anxious as he was for the glory of the country; yet God forbid that those stripes and stars, which had heretofore been the rallying point of heroism, should now float over the mangled corpses of our bleeding countrymen. God forbid that our country should undergo this sad and disastrous revolution, for he believed, whenever that should take place, not only the liberties of this country, but the best and brightest hopes of the civilized world, would be destroyed forever.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said, that he asked the indulgence of the Senate to say a word, to correct some misapprehensions of the Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. BROWN.) Sir, said Mr. F., I must have been peculiarly unhappy in stating my views, when the Senator understands me to have compared our Government with the Roman provinces. So far from this, I did, in very explicit terms, refer to Rome by way of grateful contrast, not of parallel; and urged, that it was because we were not conquered provinces, but a Union of free and co-equal States; that it was because ours was a peace and not a war spirit, that I would retreat from a custom-house on land to a custom-house on the water; that from a real tenderness of shedding a brother's blood, I would go back to the very wall and never strike, until forbearance should itself become treason.

Again, sir, I was quite as unfortunate with the honorable Senator, when he ascribes to me the notion that our constitution was the production of the people in the aggregate. I too well knew the fact to be otherwise, to contend for such an absurdity. In adopting the constitution, it was insisted that the people acted in separate communities, and for the palpable reason that they existed in separate communities. But, sir, as matter of argument, I endeavored to show, that so far as concerned the character of the instrument, the extent of its powers, or the nature of the Government created by it, it was altogether immaterial whether the popular will was ascertained by distinct communities, or by a reference to some aggregate expression of that will. That, even granting the largest demands of the gentlemen who press the pretensions of State sovereignty, it would not in any measure impair the strength of the proposition that maintains the supreme authority of the General Government, by the nature of the powers contained in the grant. That, in either view of the subject, we must still turn to the constitution as the best expounder of itself; and if the delegation has there been made, why, sir, the character of the party to it cannot affect the grant. After all our speculations, we are constrained in the end to inquire what are the attributes with which the constitution invests the departments of the Government.

TUESDAY, February 5.

The Revenue Collection Bill.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. HOLMES said he would come to the question in controversy, which he considered to be this, and plainly this: In the conflict of power between the United States and any single State, who is the final and effectual umpire? What authority can decide when these disagree, and make its decision effectual? Had he stated the question fairly? Yes, he said, that question must come, and there was no going between it; no intermediate course by which it could be escaped. The constitution has established no umpire for such a case; and when the conflict comes, the question must be decided, who is the final power to judge it? My ground is, then, said Mr. H., that this power must of necessity be vested in the Government of the United States; not in the Executive, but in the whole Government; and that it must have the power to execute its decisions, or else it is a nullity. How then did the case now stand? The power of the Government of the United States to lay imposts, it was well known, was an exclusive power. The States were prohibited the exercise of it without the assent of Congress. If the power exists at all, it is exclusive in the Government of the United States. Now, he asked, the power being granted to the United States and prohibited to the States, can the States control the exercise of it? Mr. H. went on to argue that it could not be a concurrent power. Nor could it be an alternate power, that may be exercised either by the General or the State Governments. Suppose, he said, that the United States were to arrest a man for treason, convict and hang him for resisting the laws, it would be a very useless thing for a State Government to take up the case, and determine to un-hang the man; at least if they did, it would be of very little use to the dead man. The power, being in the Government of the United States, must be an exclusive power, the exercise of which no State had a right to obstruct. Now, said Mr. H., comes the issue. The Congress of the United States have passed certain revenue laws; they have been acted upon, adjudged to be constitutional, and have been executed by the Executive. South Carolina says they are unconstitutional, and has passed laws intended to repeal them or make them inoperative within her limits. The question, then, has arisen, shall the laws of South Carolina succeed, or those of the United States?

Passing by, for the present, the doctrine of peaceable nullification of the laws, Mr. H. said he would see if he could not understand some of the doctrines which had been advanced in regard to social and political compacts. If he understood gentlemen their meaning was that a social compact is one which may be enforced; a political compact one which may or may not be enforced. To be a little more explicit, he must go back to his schoolboy days for an analogous distinction—that between perfect and imperfect obligations. Those who have read Vattel and Paley know that a perfect obligation must be enforced, and an imperfect obligation may or may not be performed, at pleasure. The only question to be determined is, whether the Constitution of the United States be the one or the other of these. I insist, said Mr. H., upon its obligatory character, and its power of enforcing its own authority; that it is a perfect compact, a social compact as gentlemen call it. My syllogism, then, is this: that a perfect obligation may be enforced in the manner prescribed in the compact; that the United States constitution is a perfect obligation; and that it may, therefore, be enforced in the manner prescribed in the compact. If I do not prove all this, sir, then my doctrine must fall to the ground.

Now, sir, here is a case. The United States passed certain revenue laws, which the State of South Carolina annuls. If the United States have the power to pass the revenue laws, the nullifying laws are nullified. The minor, in this proposition, depends upon the facts and principles out of which the constitution arose. He should attempt to show first, that the United States, at the time of adopting the constitution, had power to grant to a General Government the right of ultimate decision; second, that the States intended to do it; third, that they did it; and, fourth, that they have always since acted up to this intention. He would pledge himself to make these propositions, if he could. What is sovereignty? There is but one absolute sovereign—except the Sovereign of the Universe. No State is sovereign except in respect to other States. Every nation that governs itself, under what form soever, without dependence on a foreign power, is sovereign. Can the Government enforce obligations upon the people of this Union? When sovereignty is vested, it is vested with the right to govern the people over whom it acts. If the people disposed of a part of their sovereignty to a certain body of men, they made a grant at will, which they can resume whenever they please. The grant to a certain body of men of exclusive legislative, judicial, and executive power, is a grant at will, according to our Declaration of Independence. The power that gives the sovereignty can take it back; but where several States concur to grant a sovereignty for the common benefit, two or three of the parties cannot withdraw it without the assent of the whole. He did not care whether the States or the people made the grant.

The inquiry whether the States or the people made the grant is entirely beside the question. Suppose Great Britain made the constitution for us. The question would be, what is it? Does it vest in the United States sovereign powers, whether expressly, or by implication? That the powers given by the constitution are sovereign, there is doubt. The powers to make peace and war, to coin money, &c., are attributes of sovereignty. Two or more States may grant to a common Government all their legislative, judicial, and executive powers. This would be a grant of their whole sovereignty. Consequently, they might grant certain defined powers, and this would be a grant of a portion of their sovereignty. Those principles by no means admit the inference that the people of a State may reserve federal sovereignty. Two or more States, then, as they have the power, may vest in the common Government the right to define its own limits. He would admit that where the majority of the people could decide, the Government would become consolidated. But that consolidation, in this case, would result in despotism, he would not admit. The federal power, so far from tending to consolidation, held the popular power in check.

This was a most happy frame of Government. The popular power held the federal power in check, and the federal power checked the popular power. He need not go beyond these walls for an illustration of this position. Can the majority of the people of the United States, without the concurrence of the States, as States, carry a measure? Certainly not. Look at the facts of the case. He would illustrate it by a few examples. Fourteen States of this Union, in population a little above one-fourth of the whole population of the United States, can defeat any measure of the House of Representatives. Thirteen States in population somewhat below a fourth of the whole population of the United States, or even twelve States with a population but a little above one-third of the whole, may defeat any federal law. How, then, can the popular branch carry any measure they please, and produce a consolidation of power? But this was not all. Thirteen States could always check the whole popular power in the appointment of judges, for the judges were created by the federative power. The States, too, were represented in the electoral colleges. No Government under heaven was so capable as this is of protecting the rights of the minority. If each State had an equal vote, the Government would be merely federative; and if the House of Representatives had all the legislative power, the Government would be consolidated; but it was neither federative nor consolidated. The federative in the Senate, and the popular power in the House, checked each other, and there was a third compound power in the Executive which checked both. Never was power in any Government so well balanced. Yet we are told that we must go beyond this power, to ascertain whether State rights have been violated here or not.

Having shown that the States could form just such a Government as we have, the next question was, did they design to form it? If they did not, then they deceived the people, or the people deceived themselves. What was the old confederation called? "A league of perpetual union," not a Government. The constitution was called the Constitution of the United States; that is, a constitution of Government. Each State, under the old confederation, retained its sovereignty, freedom, and independence; and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by the confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled. Under the constitution, the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. The old confederation had legislative but not executive and judicial power. He appealed to gentlemen to say whether the constitution was formed for any other purpose but to create a sovereign power. It bestowed on the General Government all the attributes of sovereignty, and it begins, "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union," &c.

Mr. H. then compared the Constitution of the United States, with that of the State of South Carolina, to show that, in title, and in the causes conferring judicial, executive, and legislative power, they bore a strong resemblance, and had the same object in view—the creation of a sovereignty. In each case, the framers seemed to think they were doing the same sort of business; making a compulsory power for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the constitution. Was it to be believed that the State constitutions were to be enforced, and the federal constitution to be observed or not, at pleasure? The constitution of South Carolina is the Government of South Carolina, and that of the United States is the Government of the United States. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which authorizes the supposition that laws made by the United States can be resisted by any other power. The presumption is, that the same power which has legislative authority has also the authority of adjudication; and that the same government that makes the laws can alone repeal them; and, further, that even the same branch of the government which makes can unmake a law, unless otherwise provided for. In the case of war and peace, a peace may be made by the President and two-thirds of the Senate, though, to declare war, the whole concurrent legislative authority is necessary. Ordinarily, the power that makes is the only power that can repeal a law. Would it not be an anomaly in legislation, if one power could make a law, and a portion of that power repeal it? South Carolina is but one of the family, but seeks to control the whole. Like the old lady in Dr. Franklin's story, she does not know how it happens that, in all the family quarrels, she is always right and the rest are always wrong. We have a Legislature, an Executive, and a Supreme Court; all exercising supreme authority. If we had need of more positive proof that these powers are supreme, we have it in the fact that all State officers are sworn to support them, and the State judges are bound thereby, in contravention of State laws and constitutions. Every judge in South Carolina must swear this, notwithstanding the ordinance. The design of the framers of the constitution was to make a common sovereignty, as we find by looking back to their correspondence. Under the confederation, the States were pares, and there was no power to compel a refractory State to obey the laws of the Union. Their whole object was to get this compulsory power. Every thing else was right, except the means of protecting the common interests.

The design of the great founder of our Government was apparent from a letter to a friend in Great Britain, in which he says, "they (the people) see the necessity of a general controlling power, and are addressing their respective Assemblies to grant it to Congress." Again he says, "I do not see that we can long exist as a nation, without lodging somewhere a power which will pervade the whole Union, in as energetic a manner as the authority of the State Governments extends over the several States." We see that he believed this controlling power to be essential to the preservation of our independence.

Having considered, continued Mr. H., whether this power could be and was intended to be granted, it remained with him to inquire next, whether, in fact, it was granted. This was a constitutional Government, and, therefore, it was sovereign as far as to all powers delegated to it. This was the general understanding of the people; and the idea of nullification and reserved rights was almost everywhere ridiculed by them. In a Tennessee newspaper he had seen a story which he would relate. A law of that State respecting marriage, required the publication of the banns some time previous to the marriage. The time appeared, too, very long to one individual, and he determined to oppose the law and set himself down on his reserved rights. The law did not prohibit marriage, which would be flatly unconstitutional, but it delayed it, and therefore was in a measure unconstitutional. He accordingly nullified and disobeyed the law. If we refer to the powers granted to the Federal Government, we shall be satisfied that they have all the essential attributes of sovereignty: they were the powers of taxation, war, treaties, coin, commerce, domain, allegiance, (viz. treason,) and naturalization.

What attribute of sovereignty was more essential than the right, in some manner, to determine definitively and effectually its own limits? The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Bibb) said, as he understood him, (he was sorry that he was not present to say whether correctly or not,) that the Supreme Court could judge only in judicial cases, and not in political cases. But were not controversies between States political cases?

The judicial power extends to all cases in law, arising, &c., and the cases are described; one case mentioned is that of controversies between States. A sovereign State, it is said, must not be drawn to the feet of the Federal Government; but in a case involving political power, the Supreme Court must adjudicate upon it.

What case controverted between States was not a political case, except those merely of meum and tuum? Questions arising relative to foreign ambassadors are also political cases.

The power might be humbling to the pride of the States, but it was essential to the General Government, and was intended to be given by the framers. The large and proud States might seek, with more confidence than the smaller and weaker States, to destroy this power. How would Rhode Island and Delaware fare if the General Government could not protect their rights in controversies with more powerful neighbors? He should think that no small State would ever consent to this doctrine.

Ne, sir, it is the rock of their political salvation. He would warn them to cling to it. Whenever the judiciary should be deprived of the power of deciding controversies between the United States and a State, the great States would eat up the little ones; gentlemen might depend upon it. All the quarrels between the General Government and the United States had originated with the large States. The State of Virginia, in 1798, passed her famous resolutions, going a great length; a little too far; travelling in the road of nullification. What did Massachusetts say on that occasion? [Here Mr. H. read the resolutions passed by the State of Massachusetts relating to the proceedings of Virginia.]

Pennsylvania had a dispute with the General Government on the subject of the Olmstead case. Well, Pennsylvania is a large State; she kicked up her heels, and there was an application made to the military power. Gen. Bright,

"—— With his ten thousand men, Marched up the hill, and then marched down again."

The marshal very peaceably executed his precepts. Then that State applied to the other States, saying that there must be some other tribunal to decide cases of this description, instead of the federal court. Virginia replied that the United States Supreme Court was the constituted tribunal, and that no better could be found. How did Massachusetts act during the time that the embargo law was in force? She was for declaring the law unconstitutional, and really did so. Pennsylvania and Virginia joined in that opinion. The large States were always troublesome to manage. They would wax faint and kick.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Bibb) had said that no process could be devised to compel a sovereign State to yield to the judgment given in favor of another sovereign State. He thought he was lawyer enough to devise a process to make Massachusetts come into court and answer to Rhode Island. [Here Mr. H. named the various processes that would be necessary to effect that object.] Yes, he could put the little State of Rhode Island in such a position, that, if Massachusetts were to attempt to disturb her, she might double her fist and say, "Touch me if you dare!" In giving this great power, he admitted there is much danger, but not so much as may appear at first sight.

The power must be vested somewhere, and where else can it be vested? If we give any power at all, we must give as much as is given in this bill. It was a high-handed power, he admitted, but not more high-handed than the power assumed by a State to nullify the laws of the Federal Government. Legislative power was not in so much danger of being abused as was power vested in the hands of the Executive. This bill gave to the President all the power which the circumstances exacted, but it gave him no more. He was never too much disposed to give power to a President, and to this President he would not give it quite so soon as he would to any other. The remedy against the abuse of power was here; and the construction of the Government itself. The House of Representatives is only elected for two years, when they must be accountable to their constituents. Senators are elected for six years, when they must answer to their States for the share they have taken in the federal administration. In both branches there is an equal responsibility to the body politic. The President himself is also responsible to the people, acting through their representatives; and in consequence of these securities, the danger of the abuse of power was very much diminished. After all, if a State conceived itself to be injured by any abuse of power, it had the right to appeal to the good sense of the community, and could apply for an amendment of the constitution. Then, after that, came the last remedy—revolution. If the whole people were so depraved, so corrupt, and so bent on oppression, that there was no hope of any redress, then the only remedy was revolution. But the gentleman from Kentucky had put an extreme case, a case which was not even to be supposed; one which the framers of the constitution never had contemplated; but still, if such case should ever occur, then the remedy must be revolution. It had been said there was danger to be apprehended from the investment of this power in the hands of the Executive. But it appeared to him that when the gentlemen who made this observation were sticking against giving the President these powers, after what they had done in former instances, they were straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

Suppose that the Federal Government were to permit South Carolina to carry her point, and to have things just as she desired. The principle being extended thus far, where would the Government stop? South Carolina, he would suppose, had made her regulations to admit goods into her ports without the payment of duty. In reference to commercial advantage, this would at once destroy the equality between the States. South Carolina would exclusively enjoy the benefit of this regulation, to the injury of all the others. On this principle, any State may nullify the laws of the Union. Suppose that Rhode Island had adopted a provision that no law of the United States which did not adopt the principle of the protective system should be considered as constitutional, on the ground that the principle of protection is recognized by the constitution. She has the same right as South Carolina to adopt nullification. And suppose that South Carolina should declare that no law should be constitutional which adopted the principle of protection. These conflicting opinions of the States would place the Federal Government in a position where its action is sure to be wrong.

He would now ask what had been the opinions of the large States as to the powers of the General Government? At the very first session of the first Congress this power was assumed in the great judiciary bill for a final determination of all questions between the United States and a State. The 25th section of that bill had been a standing law through all the different administrations of the Government. It was passed in the Senate by a vote of 14 to 6—South Carolina voting unanimously in its favor; and it passed the House of Representatives without a division. No attempt was made during the whole discussion of that bill to strike out the 25th section of it, which has been a standing law ever since. It was considered as the sheet anchor of the constitution, that which was to hold us together eventually through all the storms of politics which might occur. Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts failed in their powerful attempts to resist the constitutionality of this section. Why had not the section been repealed, if it was so unconstitutional? Congress dared not repeal it, for the repeal of that section would break up the Union.

It had been asked what was the necessity for this bill? What had South Carolina done? He could only answer that she had done this, she had done nothing more than to repeal our laws, and to make it highly criminal to execute them. She had repealed them in many points, as he showed by a reference to her acts, and she had also done a few other things. She had raised an army to carry on a contest against the United States. This was easily shown. She had raised an army to enforce the execution of her own laws, which have repealed the laws of the United States; and, in doing this, had she not raised an army to carry on a contest with the United States? It was a direct aggression. He would adapt the law precisely to meet the case. The State of South Carolina would have no good reason to complain if the penalties prescribed by the laws of the United States for violating their laws were no greater than those which she has enacted for a violation of hers. There could be no great cruelty in this course. Mr. H. then read the fines and penalties imposed by the acts of South Carolina. He stated that the General Government was, by the provisions of these laws, placed in a situation where she was obliged to legislate so as to meet the whole case.

Revenue Collection Bill—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

[SENATE.]

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

Presidential Election—Counting of Votes.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, reported a resolution, fixing on Wednesday next as the day for counting the votes, when the Senate will attend the House for the purpose of witnessing the examination of the votes. The hour appointed for the proceedings is 1 o'clock. The resolution was agreed to.

Revenue Collection Bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. TYLER said: I now come to the most important part of the work which I have to perform. I shall now proceed to touch the bill itself; and I propose to dissect its provisions and expose its enormities. He would take the bill up by sections, because he believed that the work had not yet been done, and he desired that the Senate should be fully advised of the character of the bill before they enacted it into a law. He regarded it as the first fruit of the doctrines he had combated.

I object to the first section, because it confers on the President the power of closing old ports of entry and establishing new ones. It has been rightly said by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BRAN) that this was a prominent cause which led to the revolution. The Boston port bill, which removed the custom-house from Boston to Salem, first roused the people to resistance. To guard against this very abuse, the constitution had confided to Congress the power to regulate commerce; the establishment of ports of entry formed a material part of this power, and one which required legislative enactment. Now I deny that Congress can deputize its legislative powers. If it may one, it may all; and thus, a majority here can, at their pleasure, change the very character of the Government. The President might come to be invested with authority to make all laws which his discretion might dictate. It is vain to tell me (said Mr. T.) that I imagine a case which will never exist. I tell you, sir, that power is cumulative, and that patronage begets power. The reasoning is unanswerable. If you can part with your power in one instance, you may in another and another. You may confer upon the President the right to declare war; and this very provision may fairly be considered as investing him with authority to make war at his mere will and pleasure on cities, towns, and villages. The prosperity of a city depends on the position of its custom-house and port of entry. Take the case of Norfolk, Richmond, and Fredericksburg, in my own State; who doubts but that to remove the custom-house from Norfolk to Old Point Comfort, or of Richmond to the mouth of the Chickahominy, or of Fredericksburg to Tappahannock or Urbanna, would utterly annihilate those towns? I have no tongue to express my sense of the probable injustice of the measure. Sir, it involves the innocent with the guilty. Take the case of Charleston: what if ninety-nine merchants were ready and willing to comply with your revenue laws, and that but one man could be found to resist them; would you run the hazard of destroying the ninety-nine in order to punish one? Trade is a delicate subject to touch; once divert it out of its regular channels, and nothing is more difficult than to restore it. This measure may involve the actual property of every man, woman, and child in that city; and this, too, when you have a redundancy of millions in your treasury, and when no interest can sustain injury by awaiting the actual occurrence of a case of resistance to your laws, before you would have an opportunity to legislate.

Again: "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;" and yet this section invests the President with authority to exact cash duties at one place, while the credit system prevails at another. These extraordinary powers were to be exercised, not only to put down unlawful combinations, but whenever there were any "unlawful threats." Now I wish to know, for I am much attached to a distinct and definite phraseology, what would be considered as constituting unlawful threats? If one of the Government inspectors should chance to be abused by a drunken blackguard in the streets, was that to be deemed an "unlawful threat," which would invest the President with authority to call the military into requisition? Every power is surrendered; and the discretion of the President is the only rule for his government.

But this is not all. He is further empowered to employ the land and naval forces to put down all "aiders and abettors." How far will this authority extend? Suppose the Legislature of South Carolina should happen to be in session: I will not blink the question; suppose the Legislature to be in session at the time of any disturbance, passing laws in furtherance of the ordinance which has been adopted by the convention of that State; might they not be considered by the President as aiders and abettors? The President might not, perhaps, march at the head of his troops, with a flourish of drums and trumpets, and with bayonets fixed, into the state-house yard at Columbia; but, if he did so, he would find a precedent for it in English history.* So, also, Governor Hayne would be in some danger; and any judge or juror, who should dare to justify the popular movement by any judgment or verdict against the tariff laws, would run the hazard of being suppressed. But, sir, the thing might not even stop here. My own State has never failed to denounce these tariff laws as unjust and unconstitutional; and, inasmuch as all such denunciations have a tendency to excite the public mind, it might fall under the appellation of "aiders and abettors." I, too, sir, have followed the example of Virginia in opposition to the protective policy, and it may be my fate to be punished under the first section of this bill—I say the first section.

* "Colonel Pride's purge," as it was called, in the time of Oliver Cromwell.

I have all proper confidence in the President, but I have an instinctive abhorrence to confiding extravagant powers in the hands of any one man. If they should be used by the present President with a proper discretion, and for the common good, if our institutions should come safely out of his hands, yet the precedent would be left on the statute book, and other Presidents might not use the power so beneficially. Rome was perfectly safe when she called Cincinnatus from the plough and clothed him with dictatorial authority; but she had cause long to bewail the dictatorship of Sylla and Caius Marius. I therefore say nay to this grant of powers. I care not what may be the character of the Chief Magistrate; how high his public worth may be rated; or how great and splendid may have been his services to his country: I will not intrust such powers in his hands. I would not even have confided them to him who was properly called Patria Pater.

The second section extends the powers of the United States courts over a portion of the criminal jurisdiction now belonging to the State courts exclusively. Let me state a case. If an officer of the customs shall differ, in regard to any matter appertaining to his duties, with any citizen of Richmond, or any other place, and a quarrel should thereupon arise, and the custom-house officer shall beat and maltreat such citizen, no redress for the injury can be obtained in the State courts, and the action for damages can alone be brought in the federal courts. Nay, sir, if the revenue officer commit murder, cold-blooded murder, he is triable for the same only before the United States court, maugre the laws of Virginia, which prescribe the punishment for the offence, and the mode of trial. Thus rescuing the citizen from responsibility to the tribunals of the State of which he is a citizen, and overturning usages which have existed through all time.

The well-known and established legal means of proceeding in the State courts are, by this section, also abrogated, by preventing writs of replevin, detinue, or trover, or attachments in equity, where the subject of the suit may be in the hands of any officer of the United States, no matter how acquired. Can it be the design of the Senate, by a law applicable to every State in the Union, to deprive the State courts of the jurisdiction they have enjoyed, ab urbe condita, to the decided profit and convenience of the citizens of the country?

The third section carries out the second, and furnishes an instance of practical nullification every way equal to the South Carolina ordinance. It presents the singular spectacle of the translation of a cause ad aliud examen; while the record, the only evidence of the existence of such a case, is left behind. It requires an act to be done by "a court," and yet declares that this very act is to be deemed and taken as done, when the petition for its performance is left in the office of the clerk of the court. Further, after the suit is removed by the defendant, by the mere deposit of his petition for removal, without notice to the plaintiff, the plaintiff is required to proceed de novo; and if he does not comply with this unknown order, a judgment of non pros. is to be entered against him, with costs. Now, sir, I beg to know what the plaintiff has done to merit all this. He has brought a proper suit in a proper court, against a proper defendant, which suit the defendant may or may not remove at his own pleasure; and yet the plaintiff is to be burdened with all the costs, in any event, which may have been incurred in the State court; nor is the defendant required to give bond to answer costs and damages, not even the additional costs to which the plaintiff may be liable.

I pass over the fourth section, and proceed to the fifth. This provision inspires all the officers of the Government, and all the "State authorities," from the Governor down to the constable, with the spirit of prophecy. Formerly, that was a spirit which visited the world at intervals "wide and far between." It was that spirit which "touched Isaiah's holy lips with fire," and had its origin, not in parliaments or legislative assemblies, but in a much higher source. But this section converts every petty officer into a prophet, and endows him with the faculty of foretelling coming events. Mr. T. then referred to the language of the bill, which empowers the President to call out the military and naval force, when he shall be informed that the laws will, in any event, be obstructed. If the President was informed that the laws will be obstructed, these coming events are to be arrested by the interposition of Executive power. How would this work? No, I will not say how would, but how might it work? A judge—no, a constable, picks up an anonymous letter, or a general order, such as had been exhibited here in this debate, in which there was a great talk about a military force—a steamboat had lowered the flag of the United States half-mast, and raised above it a tri-colored ensign; he communicates these ominous facts, dovetailed with such comments and rumors as his fears may have created, or idle gossip conjured up, and the President adopts the conclusion that the revenue laws will be violated, and issues his proclamation accordingly. Yet, after all, it may turn out that this informant has been frightened with shadows, and shadows would have more effect upon one of these officers than ten thousand men armed in proof would have upon the President himself. Take the controversy now pending between the States of New York and New Jersey, which materially affects the interests of the city of New York; and sup pose that the Supreme Court decides against New York, and issues its process against Governor Marcy; the people of the city are roused against the decision, denounce the Supreme Court, have numerous attended meetings in their City Hall, and parade their streets in a threatening attitude. What is to be done? The marshal makes no effort to execute the process, but reports to the President that the laws will be resisted. A proclamation is thereupon issued; the military is ordered out; and a collision may or may not be brought on, as the feeling or policy of the hour shall prevail.

The sixth section of the bill he viewed as a Botany Bay law. It was in fact a Botany Bay law, with one exception, that the law in England requires conviction before transportation; by this, transportation precedes conviction. There, a place is designated to which the convict may be transported; here, to such convenient place as the judge and marshal shall appoint. The marshal is also authorized to make "such other provision," for the safe keeping of the prisoner, I presume is meant, as he may deem "necessary and expedient." Suppose a man to be arrested for a debt due the United States; the jails are closed against his reception, and the marshal is to carry him to some convenient place; is he not completely in the power of the officer? and may he not drag him away, far from his friends, to any place he may please, and, under the authority to do whatever he may deem "necessary and expedient," put chains upon his limbs, cast him into a loathsome dungeon, and carry him to the end of the earth? Is there any thing in the section which limits his discretion to the State wherein the party may be arrested? If such was the intention, why not so have said? When the liberty and rights of the people are concerned, why leave that uncertain which may so readily be rendered certain? The absence of all such limitation on the discretion of the officer, as the section now stands, raises the implication that no such restriction is designed. It may be said that the judge and marshal may be well trusted. It may or may not be so. But there can be no necessity for extending a power which may be abused, when the abuse may so easily be limited and restrained.

There was no ambiguity about this measure. The prophecy had already gone forth; the President has said that the laws will be obstructed. The President had not only foretold the coming difficulties, but he had also assembled an army. The city of Charleston, if report spoke true, was now a beleaguered city; the cannon of Fort Pinckney are pointing at it; and although they are now quietly sleeping, they are ready to open their thunders whenever the voice of authority shall give the command. And shall these terrors be let loose because some one man may refuse to pay some small modicum of revenue, which Congress, the day after it came into the treasury, might vote in satisfaction of some unfounded claim? Shall we set so small a value upon the lives of the people? Let us at least wait to see the course of measures. We can never be too tardy in commencing the work of blood. May we not indulge the expectation that South Carolina will have some regard to her own peace, and not bring matters to an issue with unnecessary precipitation? I hope that a voice, which has gone forth from Virginia, will arrest her attention. Sir, I have heard my State slightly called the Mediator State. She is so, and I rejoice that she has assumed that office. In the great cause of union, I trust she will always joyfully press forward, and, addressing herself to a sister State, whose interests are nearly identical with her own, I will not doubt but that her mediation will prove successful. Then scoff at her who may, she will have presented you the olive branch, and furnished new cause for your gratitude and affection.

I regret that the course adopted here has not been better calculated to avoid a rupture. I fear me that what has been done has been but too well calculated to chafe the spirit of that honored and lofty State. An army had been sent thither, instead of a messenger of peace; revenue cutters to watch her commerce; an armed ship riding in her roadstead; and a proclamation issued breathing denunciation. These were not calculated to allay excitement. I think a better course might have been adopted. If the President had rested upon his message at the opening of the session, my belief is that the tariff would have been reduced. But it was in the nature of man to fight for money. Some of the advocates of the tariff on this side of the Potomac were ready to yield a portion; but I fear that to others the temptation of high profits is too strong to be resisted, more especially when the army and navy, and the whole military force, is to be employed to rivet high duties on the country. An honorable exception was found in Virginia. All classes of society and all interests united in recommending a suitable modification, manufacturer and all, so far as the resolutions of the Legislature furnished any evidence of public sentiment. But it is a bad mode of settling disputes to make soldiers your ambassadors, and to point to the halter and the gallows as your ultimatum.

Sir, if a foreign country violates her treaty stipulations, spoliates upon your commerce, and holds your friendship as nothing, you still negotiate; you resort to every possible expedient to preserve peace; you will invest the President with no discretionary power to declare war; but if a State braves your authority, and threatens to set your laws at defiance, you pant for the contest, and commit to the hands of the President unlimited discretion; and yet what are the horrors of a foreign, compared with those of an intestine war?

If the majority shall pass this bill, they must do it on their own responsibility; I will have no part in it. When gentlemen recount the blessings of union; when they dwell upon the past, and sketch out in bright perspective the future, they awaken in my breast all the pride of an American; my pulse beats responsive to theirs, and I regard union, next to freedom, as the greatest of blessings. Yes, sir, "the Federal Union must be preserved." But how? Will you seek to preserve it by force? Will you appease the angry spirit of discord by an oblation of blood? Suppose that the proud and haughty spirit of South Carolina shall not bend to your high edicts in token of fealty; that you make war upon her, hang her Governor, her legislators, and judges, as traitors, and reduce her to the condition of a conquered province—have you preserved the Union? This Union consists of twenty-four States; would you have preserved the Union by striking out one of the States—one of the old thirteen? Gentlemen had boasted of the flag of our country, with its thirteen stars. When the light of one of these stars shall have been extinguished, will the flag wave over us, under which our fathers fought? If we are to go on striking out star after star, what will finally remain but a central and a burning sun, blighting and destroying every germ of liberty? The flag which I wish to wave over me, is that which floated in triumph at Saratoga and Yorktown. It bore upon it thirteen States, of which South Carolina was one. Sir, there is a great difference between preserving union and preserving Government; the Union may be annihilated, yet Government preserved; but under such a Government no man ought to desire to live.

His mode of preserving the Union was by restoring mutual confidence and affection amongst the members; by doing justice and obeying the dictates of policy. The President has pointed out the mode in his opening message. We had been informed that there was an excess of $6,000,000 in the treasury. I would destroy that excess; yet I would not rashly and rudely lay hands on the manufacturer, if I had the power to do so. While giving peace to one section, I would not produce discord in another. It would be to accomplish nothing, to appease discord in one section and produce it in another. The manufacturers desire time; give them time, ample time. If they would come down to the revenue standard, and abandon the protective policy, I would allow them full time. I present these suggestions, for I am anxious to see this vexed question adjusted.

It had been said that it would not do to offer terms while South Carolina maintained a menacing attitude. I consider this view altogether erroneous. Shall not justice be done to the other Southern States? They, too, complain loudly, deeply, of the oppressive burdens under which they labor in common with South Carolina. But, regard it as exclusively a South Carolina question; what prevents you from yielding to her wishes? Pride, alone, stands in the way—false pride. It is the worst, the most pernicious of counsellors. Against its influence Lord

Chatham and Edmund Burke raised their voices in the British Parliament; but the reply was, that it would not do to make terms with revolted colonies; and a besotted ministry lost to the English crown its brightest jewel. It is idle to talk of degrading Government by yielding terms. This Government is strong—South Carolina weak. The strong man may grant terms to the weak; and, by so doing, give the highest evidence of magnanimity. All history teems with instances of the evils springing from false pride in Governments. Bruised thrones, dismembered empires, crushed republics; these are its bitter fruits. Let us throw it from us, and try the efficacy of that engine which tyrants never use; that great engine which would save Poland to Russia, Ireland to England, and South Carolina, not as a province with her palmetto trailing in the dust, but as a free, sovereign, and independent State, to this confederacy—the engine of redress. This is my advice.

But my advice is disregarded; you rush on to the contest; you subdue South Carolina; you drive her citizens into the morasses, where Marion and Sumpter found refuge; you level her towns and cities in the dust; you clothe her daughters in mourning, and make helpless orphans of her rising sons: where, then, is your glory? Glory comes not from the blood of slaughtered brethren. Gracious God! is it necessary to urge such considerations on an American Senate? Whither has the genius of America fled. We have had darker days than the present, and that genius has saved us. Are we to satisfy the discontents of the people by force—by shooting some and bayoneting others? Force may convert freemen into slaves; but, after you have made them slaves, will they look with complacency on their chains? When you have subdued South Carolina, lowered her proud flag, and trampled her freedom in the dust, will she love you for the kindness you have shown her? No; she will despise and hate you. Poland will hate Russia until she is again free; and so would it be with South Carolina. I would that I had but moral influence enough to save my country in this hour of peril. If I know myself, I would peril all, every thing that I hold most dear, if I could be the means of stilling the agitated billows. I have no such power; I stand here manacled in a minority, whose efforts can avail but little. You, who are the majority, have the destinies of the country in your hands. If war shall grow out of this measure, you are alone responsible. I will wash my hands of the business. Rather than give my aid, I would surrender my station here, for I aspire not to imitate the rash boy who set fire to the Ephesian dome. No, sir, I will lend no aid to the passage of this bill. I had almost said that "I had rather be a dog and bay the moon than such a Roman." I will not yet despair; Rome had her Curtius, Sparta her Leonidas, and Athens her band of devoted patriots; and shall it be said that the American Senate contains not one man who will step forward to rescue his country in this her moment of peril! Although that man may never wear an earthly crown or sway an earthly sceptre, eternal fame shall wreath an evergreen around his brow, and his name shall rank with those of the proudest patriots of the proudest climes.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Delaware, then took the floor, and moved an adjournment.

THURSDAY, February 7.

Military Orders.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies of the orders which have been given to the commanding officer of the military forces assembled in and near to the city of Charleston, South Carolina; and also copies of the orders which have been given to the commander of the naval forces assembled in the harbor of Charleston; particularly such orders, if any such have been given, to resist the constituted authorities of the State of South Carolina, within the chartered limits of said State.

Revenue Collection Bill.

The Senate then again proceeded to the bill making further provision for the collection of the revenue.

Mr. CLAYTON said: If the measure proposed by the bill should, as is alleged, drive South Carolina to open secession, still, sir, I hold that State secession is a less evil than State nullification. I think the soundness of this opinion is easily demonstrable. If the latter doctrine be triumphantly established; if it be, indeed, true that any one of these States can constitutionally and rightfully decide, in the last resort, on the mode and measure of redress for all her alleged grievances; then, sir, is South Carolina, while all her ports are open for the admission of every article of importation, duty free, still within the pale of the Union, and entitled to participate in all its blessings, though she refuse to share in any of its burdens. The whole amount of southern exports, estimated at forty millions annually, may be exchanged for foreign manufactures and foreign produce; and by virtue of this ordinance of nullification, the exchanges may, through the free ports of Charleston, Beaufort, and Georgetown, be transhipped coastwise, and forced upon the consumption of the whole country, in defiance of all our laws for the collection of duties. The immediate effect of this must be desolation and ruin to us—desolation and ruin so certain and so speedy, that our southern fellow-citizens would find us a prey hardly worth the trouble of further pursuit, after the lapse of five or ten years from the period when such a system should go into effective operation. Throwing out of view the destruction of our manufacturers and mechanics (the immediate consequence of this state of things), I ask, what have we—to what possible resources can we apply—to meet this never-ending drain of our means and money to pay for all the most important necessities of life thus purchased abroad? In a few years we should be beggared by the operation of such a state of things, and soon after, where the husbandman now goes happily to his plough, and the mechanic sings cheerily to the sound of his axe or his hammer, the country would be rapidly deserted, and, in a few more fleeting years, would present but a wild and melancholy waste, a lasting monument to posterity of our own folly and pusillanimity. And let it not be overlooked by those who would temporarily riot in the profits thus drawn from the hard hand of honest industry, that they would eventually be the losers by their own avidity; for where would be their market for articles received in exchange for their immense surplus produce, when we should be no longer able to buy them? On the other hand, the consequences of the secession of South Carolina from the Union, though that would be an event deeply to be deplored, while the memory of our national glory is retained, would be infinitely to be preferred by us to such a condition of affairs. In the event of her successfully maintaining her separate independence, we should subject all her products, and all her exchanges obtained for them, when introduced among us, to our own tariff; and, if peace did not smile upon us as it heretofore has, we should, at least, by the sacrifice of some of its blessings, maintain our independence of all foreign nations. I tell the honorable members from Carolina, therefore, that, while secession has its terrors for me, nullification presents even still greater evils in perspective; that I have been driven in sorrow to that task of calculating the value of this Union, which I once supposed I could never learn, and which I still think no man can learn, while the constitution stands unimpaired by misconstruction, and that I cannot be deterred from the support of this bill, whose only object is to countervail the effects of their State ordinance and State legislation, by the threat of disunion as a necessary consequence of its passage.

I come then, sir, to the discussion of the main question before us.

Are the ordinance and laws of South Carolina, set forth in the President's message, consonant with the Constitution of the United States? If repugnant to the provisions of that sacred instrument, has the State a right to secede from the Union? Have we the power to coerce obedience to our revenue laws? And, if we have such power, are the provisions of this bill such as are proper to secure that obedience?

There never was a question more involved in metaphysical subtleties than the essential inquiry into the right of nullification and secession has been, by the respective advocates of these different doctrines. They invariably seek out the most refined, and often, I may add, the most indefinable distinctions. It would with them be evidence of gross obtuseness of intellect, to fail always to discriminate between the foundation of the powers of the Government, and the sources from which those powers are drawn; between sovereignty and sovereign power, determining at the same time with precision where each of these originated and where they now remain, and between the effect of a ratification by the people of the United States collectively, and that of a ratification by the same people voting by State divisions. The distinction between a State and the people of a State is made and carried so far, that the State itself is considered as a kind of ethereal, supernatural being, whose essence is illimitable, uncontrollable sovereignty over the very people composing it, and to whose will alone it is indebted for "a local habitation and a name." The recent address to the people of South Carolina, by their delegates in convention, is replete with such distinctions.

I admit, sir, that, by the very terms of our constitution or form of government, there is an ultimate sovereignty, a paramount power of amendment and revocation, resting in the people of three-fourths of the States. Undoubtedly it is true, that this ultimate sovereignty has never been alienated or delegated. It is true, too, that the people of the United States (not of South Carolina alone) have reserved to themselves, or their respective States, all the attributes of sovereignty not delegated by the constitution. Nay, more sir, I recognize, and glory in the recognition of the principles of our revolutionary forefathers, that the right to resist tyranny and oppression, no matter by what power exercised, still exists in every man, not as a constitutional or delegated power, but as an inherent, indivisible, and unalienable right. But this ultra-constitutional and revolutionary right, which, when exercised, must always confessedly subject those who attempt to enforce it to the penalties of treason in the event of their failure, is as widely different from the pretended right of nullification, as the heavens from the earth. It is open, unblushing treason against the Government; and, even when asserted under the gallows, has the merit of being more respectable, because it is more intelligible and daring, than nullification. It is not a mere State right, but looks above all the restraints of power. It may be exercised against South Carolina by her own citizens, or against this Government by the people of the United States. It is nothing more than the right of rebellion; the right of self-preservation; the right to fight in self-defence. No man ever did, or ever could part with it. If successfully vindicated in a righteous cause, he who asserts it becomes a hero; if unsuccessfully, a traitor. Ask the nullifier if this is the sovereignty which he refers to as a unit, indivisible, and unalienable, and he will tell you, no! He seeks shelter not in his individual resources, but under theegis of his State; nay, claims protection under the constitution which he seeks to destroy; is horror-struck by the charge of treason, and asserts the right of State interposition as a right reserved in the very bond of our Union: and when, to disprove the right of the State to interpose, you point him to the plain words of the constitution, which negative the right of any State to make war on the rest, which positively prohibit any State to engage in any war, or to keep troops when this Government is at peace, he coolly tells you that these are State rights and attributes of sovereignty, which are, in their nature, unalienable. Sir, this political dogma, understood in the sense of those who use it, never had any foundation in truth. As an axiom of political science, it is unknown among statesmen.

Sovereign power was not only considered as divisible by those who formed this Government, but we see that the chief beauty of their whole structure consists in the many divisions which have been made of it. One portion of it is to be found in the House of Representatives, which, for example, can alone originate impeachments and bills for raising revenue. Another portion of it is in the Senate, which, while it generally exercises concurrent legislative power with the House, has the peculiar right to check the Executive in the administration of the appointing power, and constitutes the National Judiciary in all cases of impeachment. Another portion of sovereign power is in the Executive; another in the Congress and the President combined; another in the Judiciary; another in each State, which can never lose her equal representation in the Senate, without her consent; another in the majority of the people of each State; and another in three-fourths of all the States.

The people have conferred upon the judicial department of their Government the power to settle, in the emphatic language of a resolution of the Legislature of Delaware, which I received yesterday, and which it gives me pleasure to sustain to-day, "all controversies between the United States and the respective States, and all controversies arising under the constitution itself." I view this judicial power as a necessary incident to the right of self-preservation existing in the Government, and as being expressly delegated by the constitution. The gentleman from Virginia contends that, when Governments come into collision, the Supreme Court of the United States cannot decide; and the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BISS) takes a distinction between political and judicial power, and avers that the question now in agitation, touching the constitutional power of South Carolina to nullify the laws, cannot be decided by the court, because the decision would involve the exercise of political power.

When Mr. Marshall, the present illustrious president of the court, in his place as a member of the House of Representatives, took the distinction relied upon between judicial and political power, he clearly explained and defined it.

FEBRUARY, 1883.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

[SENATE.]

I want no better authority than his to sustain my positions, though the adversary argument has been rested upon it. His conceptions, as expressed by himself in that debate, on the case of Jonathan Robbins, was, that the court could decide only in cases brought before it; that it could do nothing of its own mere motion. It has no legislative or executive power; but in every case, in law or equity, which can arise under the constitution or laws, it is, as the courts of the United States are now organized, the sole arbiter, either in the first or in the last resort. And nothing has ever fallen from Mr. Marshall to contradict this principle; on the contrary, the whole current of authorities in the court sustains it.

The true point in issue between us is therefore limited to this: can the question as to the validity of the South Carolina ordinance and legislation, referred to in the Executive message, and whose sole object is to annul and evade our revenue laws, arise before the court? Why not? If it be not presented for determination there, no other intelligible reason can be stated to account for the fact, than the refusal of those who are interested in the matter to bring up that point. In an action for a breach of our tariff laws, the citizen of South Carolina who may claim the benefit of this State interposition, may plead the special matter in bar to the action setting forth the ordinance and laws under which he demands protection. The attorney for the Government must demur to the plea, because the facts contained in it are not traversable. The judgment of the court below and of the court in appeal must be on the very question, whether this ordinance and these laws are constitutional. Will any professional gentleman here deny this? Will any one of them oblige us by stating what difficulty exists in this mode of presenting the whole question in controversy between us to this tribunal? Sir, I defy their scrutiny. They know, as I do, that the case is one which can easily arise before the court, if they dare to submit its decision to that tribunal which the constitution has designated for the purpose.

The President, in his late message in reference to this most interesting subject, has brought back the Government to the true principles of the constitution, and maintained the authority of the court as I have stated it. The sentiments of the Vice President elect coincide with his. Mr. Van Buren, in his speech on the Judiciary in 1826, says:

"It has been justly observed, that there exists not upon this earth, and there never did exist, a judicial tribunal clothed with powers so various, and so important, as the Supreme Court.

"By its treaties and laws made pursuant to the constitution are declared to be the supreme law of the land. So far at least as the acts of Congress depend upon the courts for their execution, the Supreme Court is the judge whether or no such acts are pursuant to the constitution; and from its judgment there is no appeal. Its veto, therefore, may absolutely suspend nine-tenths of the acts of the National Legislature.

"Not only are the acts of the National Legislature subject to its review, but it stands as the umpire between the conflicting powers of the General and State Governments. But this is not all. It not only sits in final judgment upon our acts as the highest legislative body known to the country; it not only claims to be the absolute arbiter between the Federal and State Government; but it exercises the same great power between the respective States forming this great confederacy and their own citizens.

"There are few States in the Union, upon whose acts the seal of condemnation has not, from time to time, been placed by the Supreme Court. The sovereign authorities of Vermont, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Missouri, Kentucky, and Ohio, have in turn been rebuked and silenced by the overruling authority of this court. I must not be understood, sir, as complaining of the exercise of this jurisdiction by the Supreme Court, or to pass upon the correctness of their decisions. The authority has been given to them, and this is not the place to question its exercise."

In opposition to all authorities, however, honorable gentlemen quote the Virginia resolutions of 1798, and the report on them in 1799. Mr. Madison, who has recently explained a report, of which he was himself the author, is considered by them as not now correctly understanding what he himself wrote; and we are told that Virginia alone can expound what she meant by her resolutions. While I utterly deny her right to expound for the rest of the world the Constitution of the United States; while I hold lightly even her own resolutions, drawn and sent out, as I shall ever believe, chiefly for their political effect in a pending contest for political power between herself and another section of the country; I say to her representatives here, that if she meant in 1798, or in 1799, to deny the powers of the Supreme Court, and arrogate to herself the authority to decide in the last constitutional resort on the laws of Congress or the Constitution of the United States, she has repealed her resolutions by still later resolutions, in reply to those of Pennsylvania, in regard to the Olmstead case. My honorable friend from New Jersey (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN) has shown us that when Pennsylvania proposed, in 1810, to amend the constitution, by appointing an arbiter between the decisions of the States and the General Government, Virginia, by an almost unanimous vote of her Legislature, in answer to the proposition, referred Pennsylvania to the court as the only proper arbiter, and recognized the very principles against which one of the Virginia representatives is now contending. Be it the part of others to attempt to exonerate her from the charge of inconsistency at these different periods—that is no task of mine.

I come, sir, to a brief consideration of the question, are the provisions of the bill before us such as are proper to secure that obedience to the laws of this Government which the proceedings of South Carolina are calculated to withhold? The leading clause in this bill, authorizing the President to employ the land and naval forces of the Union to arrest the unconstitutional proceedings of the officers of South Carolina, should they attempt to rescue imported goods from our revenue officers, has been the subject of bitter denunciation by Southern gentlemen, and particularly by the gentleman from Virginia. Sir, this is almost a literal transcript from the act of 1809, for enforcing the embargo law. [Mr. C. read the eleventh section of that act, to show that it employed the very words of the bill before the Senate.] Let us now inquire who voted for an act so similar in its provisions to that now before us. Fortunately, the journals of Congress of that day have preserved the yeas and nays on a motion to strike out the eleventh section of the embargo law. In both Houses, nearly all the representatives from Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, voted for a bill, which, when now sought to be applied to a different section of the country, is the object of their animadversion and horror. As strong remonstrances were then made against the passage of this law by Congress from other parts of the United States as are now presented in behalf of South Carolina, and were then, as they will be now, made in vain.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina has told us that all human institutions, like those who formed them, contain within themselves the elements of their own destruction; and that our own Government is now exhibiting their operation. To this general philosophic remark I should not have objected but for its application. All the works of man are destined to decay; but while the American people shall remain true to themselves, their Government cannot be destroyed; for it contains, within itself, endless and ever-renewed energies, which must bring it out in triumph, and with Antæan vigor, in despite of every effort to overthrow it. From foreign force it has nothing to fear; it dreads nothing now from any section of this Union which shall seek to prevent the just operation of our laws by foreign intervention. Yea, sir, a foreign alliance, sought by any member of this confederacy, for the purpose of making war upon us, would be the means, under Heaven, of immediately rallying every patriot, of every political party, under the broad banner of the republic. Popular virtue, however, is the only safe basis of popular government. This is the "fountain from the which our current runs, or bears no life;" and I concede that the mortal blow to the liberties of this country may, at last, be struck by the hand of one who has been indebted to it for existence. The shaft which shall stretch the American eagle bleeding and lifeless in the dust must be feathered from his own bright pinions; and bitter will be the curses of men, in all ages to come, against the traitorous heart and the parricidal hand of him who shall loose that fatal arrow from the string!

"Remember him, the villain, righteous Heaven,
In thy great day of vengeance! Blast the traitor,
And his pernicious counsels, who, for wealth,
For power, the pride of greatness, or revenge,
Would plunge his native land in civil war!"

FRIDAY, February 8.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

The Senate then proceeded again to the special order of the day, being the bill making further provision for the collection of the revenue.

Mr. WEBSTER said he wished to interrupt the course of the debate for a single moment, in order to set one matter right, if he could. Since a warm controversy was rising on this measure, he thought it but proper that we should understand between what parties the controversy existed.

Soon after the declaration of war, by the United States against England, an American vessel fell in at sea with one of England, and gave information of the declaration. The English master inquired, with no little warmth of manner and expression, why the United States had gone to war with England? The American answered him, that difficulties had existed, for a good while, between the two Governments, and that it was at length thought, in America, to be high time for the parties to come to a better understanding.

I incline to think, Mr. President, that a war has broken out here which is very likely, before it closes, to bring the parties to a better understanding. But who are the parties? Will you please to remember, sir, that this is a measure founded in Executive recommendation? The President, charged by the constitution with the duty of executing the laws, has sent us a message, alleging that powerful combinations are forming to resist their execution; that the existing laws are not sufficient to meet the crisis; and recommending sundry enactments as necessary for the occasion. The message being referred to the Judiciary Committee, that committee has reported a bill in compliance with the President's recommendation. It has not gone beyond the message. Every thing in the bill, every single provision, which is now complained of, is in the message. Yet the whole war is raised against the bill, and against the committee, as if the committee had originated the whole matter. Gentlemen get up and address us, as if they were arguing against some measure of a factious opposition. They look the same way, sir, and speak with the same vehemence, as they used to do when they raised their patriotic voices against what they called a "coalition."

Now, sir, let it be known, once for all, that this is an administration measure; that it is the President's own measure; and I pray gentlemen to have the goodness, if they call it hard names, and talk loudly against its friends, not to overlook its source. Let them attack it, if they choose to attack it, in its origin.

Let it be known, also, that a majority of the committee reporting the bill are friends and supporters of the administration; and that it is maintained in this House by those who are among his steadfast friends, of long standing.

It is, sir, as I have already said, the President's own measure. Let those who oppose it, oppose it as such. Let them fairly acknowledge its origin, and meet it accordingly.

The honorable member from Kentucky, who spoke first against the bill, said he found in it another Jersey prison ship; let him state, then, that the President has sent a message to Congress, recommending a renewal of the sufferings and horrors of the Jersey prison ship. He says, too, that the bill snuffs of the alien and sedition law. But the bill is fragrant of no flower except the same which perfumes the message. Let him, then, say, if he thinks so, that General Jackson advises a revival of the principles of the alien and sedition laws.

The honorable member from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) finds out a resemblance between this bill and the Boston port bill. Sir, if one of these be imitated from the other, the imitation is the President's. The bill makes the President, he says, sole judge of the constitution. Does he mean to say that the President has recommended a measure which is to make him sole judge of the constitution? The bill, he declares, sacrifices every thing to arbitrary power—he will lend no aid to its passage—he would rather “be a dog, and bay the moon, than such a Roman.” He did not say “the old Roman.” Yet the gentleman well knows, that if any thing is sacrificed to arbitrary power, the sacrifice had been demanded by the “old Roman,” as he and others have called him; by the President whom he has supported, so often and so ably, for the Chief Magistracy of the country. He says, too, that one of the sections is an English Botany Bay law, except that it is much worse. This section, sir, whatever it may be, is just what the President's message recommended. Similar observations are applicable to the remarks of both the honorable gentlemen from North Carolina. It is not necessary to particularize those remarks. They were in the same strain.

Therefore, sir, let it be understood, let it be known, that the war which these gentlemen choose to wage, is waged against the measures of the administration, against the President of their own choice. The controversy has arisen between him and them, and, in its progress, they will probably come to a distinct understanding.

Mr. President, I am not to be understood as admitting that these charges against the bill are just, or that they would be just if made against the message. On the contrary, I think them wholly unjust. No one of them, in my opinion, can be made good. I think the bill, or some similar measure, had become indispensable, and that the President could not do otherwise than to recommend it to the consideration of Congress. He was not at liberty to look on and be silent, while dangers threatened the Union, which existing laws were not competent, in his judgment, to avert.

Mr. President, I take this occasion to say, that I support this measure, as an independent member of the Senate, in the discharge of the dictates of my own conscience. I am no man's leader; and, on the other hand, I follow no lead, but that of public duty, and the star of the constitution. I believe the country is in considerable danger; I believe an unlawful combination threatens the integrity of the Union. I believe the crisis calls for a mild, temperate, forbearing, but inflexibly firm execution of the laws. And, under this conviction, I give a hearty support to the administration, in all measures which I deem to be fair, just, and necessary. And in supporting these measures, I mean to take my fair share of responsibility, to support them frankly and fairly, without reflections on the past, and without mixing other topics in their discussion.

Mr. President, I think I understand the sentiment of the country on this subject. I think public opinion sets with an irresistible force in favor of the Union, in favor of the measure recommended by the President, and against the new doctrines which threaten the dissolution of the Union. I think the people of the United States demand of us, who are intrusted with the Government, to maintain that Government; to be just, and fear not; to make all and suitable provisions for the execution of the laws, and to sustain the Union and the constitution against whatsoever may endanger them. For one, I obey this public voice; I comply with this demand of the people. I support the administration in measures which I believe to be necessary; and, while pursuing this course, I look unhesitatingly, and with the utmost confidence, for the approbation of the country.

Mr. DALLAS said: The measure was recommended by the President in a message to Congress, which was referred to a standing committee of the House. That committee had reported this bill. It was an administration measure. Honorable gentlemen might be assured that, whatever language was applied to the bill, there were those who would not flinch from its responsibility. As a political man, he would say, that the President, in recommending this measure, would attach to himself, more strongly than ever, he would not say all the people of the country, or all the members of any political party, but the entire democracy of Pennsylvania. That democracy, with its fifty thousand majority, was ready to assume the responsibility of this act. However heavy might be the responsibility thrown on this measure, he would undertake to say, that his State was ready to assume its full share. He felt very anxious to treat this question as one of a grave and very important nature; and he proposed, with a view to the accomplishment of his task, with as little labor to himself and tediousness to the Senate as was possible, to inquire, in the first place, what causes had led to this measure; second, whether we had the constitutional power to exact it; and, third, what were its probable tendency and effect. Many remarks had been made in the discussion, to which he should pay no attention; not from want of respect to those from whom they had fallen, but from want of comprehension to see their application to the subject.

What were the causes which led to the bill? It was undoubtedly drawn from analogous practice, but it was out of the ordinary course of legislation. The cause would be found in the proceedings of a popular convention held in South Carolina, and the legislative and executive acts following them. He was at all times prepared to treat the movements of a sovereign member of the Union with respect. They were not to be viewed as the factious proceedings of a political party. Theirs was not the attitude of a changeling. The proceedings to which he referred resulted from the deliberate, and, he might say, the inflexible purpose of a highly respectable, although, in his apprehension, misguided State. He might be mistaken in representing the attitude of the State. He referred to the appearances everywhere existing in the State. This attitude might possibly be very soon changed, and, in that case, our proposed legislation in regard to it must be changed.

In relation, Mr. President, to nullification and secession, the question is, have we the constitutional power to pass this bill? In reference to the abrogation of the revenue laws by the State of South Carolina, I say that, as a matter of equal constitutional justice, the abrogation of those laws, according to the ordinance of South Carolina, abrogates them throughout the whole country. I say it is the necessary consequence of annulling them in that State. We are bound by our oaths, as Senators of the United States, not to acquiesce in or sanction such proceedings. We have no right to give a preference to the ports of one State over the ports of another. Sir, I put it to the honorable Senators present, whether a tacit acquiescence on the part of this body ought to be given to a regulation in South Carolina, which establishes free trade in the port of Charleston, thereby giving it a preference over any port in the United States. Would not a tacit acquiescence be a violation of our oaths as Senators? Let us look to the principle of morality as connected with this subject. There are sins of omission as well as sins of commission. He who is not prepared to do his duty, or refrains from it from a fear of consequences, acts in violation of it. No single State, no several States of this Union, can be expected to furnish all the revenue which the Government requires—the entire consumption of the country upon which the taxes are laid; these imposts should be borne equally by the entire mass of the American people. Sir, I protest that, wealthy as the people of the State of Pennsylvania may be, pouring at all times their countless thousands into the public treasury—I protest against the Congress of the United States requiring one cent from the population of that State which is not fully required from others. If you do make it a matter of equal legislation—though we would cheerfully contribute millions to the general treasury in common with the other States—and yet show preference, in the slightest degree, to any portion of the Union, as a member of that great commonwealth I would protest against it. Charleston cannot be a free port, compatibly with the constitution of the United States. The instant that the legislation of this Congress shall proclaim it to be so, I shall likewise declare Philadelphia a free port. New York also, as well as every other port in the United States, will have a just right to be declared free. Sir, this effect is as unavoidable in practice, as it is sound in constitutional theory.

If the position now taken by South Carolina, in reference to Charleston, be sustained by the connivance of this body, your revenue is lost; not a part of the revenue, but the whole of your revenue, is gone; all that is collected by the Government of the United States by virtue of the acts which are nullified in South Carolina. How is it? I speak practically. If it be for one moment entertained that the duties collected under these laws are to be enforced in every port but the port of Charleston, and the other ports of South Carolina, will not the mercantile community throughout the whole of this country make these ports the great marts of distribution, through the coasting trade, to all the other States of the Union? As a matter of prudence, as a matter of necessity, they must do it, or they could not sustain themselves. They must direct their foreign correspondents to consign their cargoes to the port of Charleston, and other ports in South Carolina; and their ships would be employed in the whole coasting trade of the United States, to distribute their cargoes, free of all duties and exonerated from all tax, throughout all the ports of the country. No merchant in Pennsylvania could bear up against such a system, and therefore must become bankrupt. He could not consent to pay the duty which is now properly levied on these goods, while, in a neighboring State, the goods came in free of charge. As a matter of necessity, as well as of sound constitutional duty, if a free port were connived at in the State of South Carolina, you must make every port free. Your Government will then be without revenue; that will be the necessary consequence. I believe, sir, that that is a Utopian creature the world has never seen or heard of. We cannot exist without a revenue; we must have it for all the great purposes of the body politic. The extinguishment of the revenue is the necessary consequence of adopting this doctrine, and is, in itself, a superabundant, a strong, if not an imperative call on those who are managing the concerns of the American people, to prevent such a contingency.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

They expel the judicial power of the United States out of the limits of the State of South Carolina; or, what is tantamount, pursue a course by which those laws are made imperative, yet inapplicable as far as regards the citizens of South Carolina. I will go still farther. They break in with a strong hand on the sanctity of personal rights, on the privilege of personal freedom, and on the liberty of conscience. Having duly weighed the phrases, I will show that they inflict disfranchisement, degradation, exile, or vassalage, indiscriminately, on all who dare to perform their duty as citizens of the United States, by enforcing and sustaining the laws.

He had heard often on this floor, and elsewhere, of that which had been characterized as a despotic majority, and of systems of oppression resulting from the tyranny of members. But, in this country, he had never known an exhibition, except that which he now witnessed, and which he hoped the virtue of the people of South Carolina would remove, where the fundamental principles of life, liberty, and law, were absolutely abrogated. He had said that there were positive, direct violations of the constitution involved in the measures of South Carolina. Yet it was alleged, on the face of those measures, that they were perfectly conformable to the constitution. If nullification be perfectly conformable to the constitution, we shall see that hereafter. If secession be conformable to the constitution, we shall see that hereafter. But even supposing these doctrines were in conformity with the constitution, still would they find no favor, if, in their progress, they trample on those rights which are recognized in the letter of the constitution. We know that there is an express provision in the constitution, that no State shall pass any law, fundamental or otherwise (and this ordinance of South Carolina is called by the head of the military power of that State a fundamental law), impairing the obligation of contracts. What says the ordinance of South Carolina? That all contracts which are now existing, or which may hereafter exist, for the purpose of carrying into effect the law providing for the collection of the duties on imports, shall be null and void, now and forever. Is that a violation of the constitution, or not? If this ordinance had confined itself to such contracts as might hereafter be formed, and had simply pronounced the law on which they might be based null and void, that would have been one thing. There might have been an argument founded on that subject. But it was not so; the ordinance declares that all contracts which have been, or may be entered into, shall be considered null and void. Did that comport with the provisions of the constitution to which he had referred? He had a dislike to all refinements on the constitution. He belonged to that admirable class of politicians who adhered to the plain meaning of its phraseology; and when the constitution declared that no State should pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, what could be said of a law of the State of South Carolina declaring existing contracts to be null and void? If the framers of the law relied upon the end to justify the means, they would find their reliance a bad one; for no end which was contemplated by them would justify such means.

But that which to him constituted another plain violation of the constitution, was accompanied by a direct encroachment on the sanctity of private rights, the sanctity of private property, and the sanctity of the courts of justice. We have a provision in the constitution which declares that every individual accused of crime "shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed." What was the meaning of this provision? That every individual juror shall be charged on his oath conscientiously to determine between the people and the party. It was a sound, settled, and unalienable right, which every individual so accused possessed, to have an impartial jury to try him. I ask (said Mr. D.) that there shall be an impartial jury in all criminal cases, let the matter of accusation be what it may; and they who would deprive an individual so accused of this right, would go far towards the establishment of arbitrary rule. Give me the trial by jury, in all its fairness, purity, and sanctity. We know that, in the formation of the constitution, the trial by jury was regarded as a subject deserving the most serious consideration of our greatest statesmen. It had always been considered as one of the most sacred order of privileges. Now what says the ordinance of South Carolina? That the accused shall not have it. It provides that the jury shall be sworn in advance. To do what? To hear and decide according to the evidence? No. To do impartial justice between the people and the accused? No. They were to be sworn in advance to convict the prisoner at the bar.

Am I right in this? Am I correct in that view of the question? An officer of the United States, executing the laws, renders himself amenable to the criminal law of South Carolina under this ordinance. He is taken before one of the State courts, where he is indicted for the offence. He gives the court and the prosecuting counsel to understand that he stands there as a citizen of the United States, and, as such, he claims, as a privilege given to him by the constitution and the principles of eternal and immutable justice, to challenge the constitutionality of the law. Can he do so? No. The ordinance is despotic. The jurymen are sworn, under that ordinance, and in the presence of the prisoner, to convict him.

In the course of my entire experience as a criminal counsel, (said Mr. D.) and I have practised at the bar from early youth, I have never known any right so constantly appealed to in criminal cases as the constitutionality of the law. Yet this ordinance says, you shall not have this right in South Carolina.

Here is involved a direct violation of the constitution. There were other parts of the constitution which were either in their spirit or their terms directly violated. This ordinance violated almost every contract or compact involved in that constitution. That instrument is full of mutual contracts between the States. Almost every provision implies, if it does not express, the compliance on the parts of the States with some contract. This ordinance withdraws them from the performance of these obligations. He would refer to one. The whole of these free, sovereign, and independent States had incorporated into their constitution a provision, from which no one can fly, to guaranty to every State a republican form of government. That provision is openly violated by this ordinance. What does the provision import? Look at it with the eye of common sense, and not through the medium of refinement; with the eye of those who framed the constitution, and of the people who ratified its provisions. "We, the people, agree to guaranty to the whole of this confederacy, and to all the States, a republican form of government." The Senate would see that if the ordinance of South Carolina were to prevail, this provision would be defeated, and rendered a mere nullity. Can we (said Mr. D.) guaranty a republican form of government to a State which disclaims our right to do so, which puts herself upon her sovereignty, and sets up for herself? If she does this, the constitution is worse than a farce. If South Carolina should desire to establish a monarchy, if a majority of the people of the State should so decide, and secede, we might the very next day see a dictator there, instead of a republican form of government. Thus, it would be shown that we had guarantied a form of government which any State in the Union would have the power to abolish and abandon. In carrying out the ordinance of South Carolina, intended to nullify the revenue laws alone, the Legislature of the State had practically nullified an immense body of laws; and this mode of obtaining their object has been agreed to be constitutional and right.

They had nullified that important provision which secures the right of trial by an impartial jury.

He was going on to say, that the State of South Carolina, in nullifying the revenue laws, had nullified also an immense body of other laws. She had annulled the provisions of the judiciary act, prescribing the mode of appealing from the State tribunals to the federal courts, in all cases of law and equity arising under the constitution and laws of the United States.

But he would go farther. Not by the ordinance of South Carolina, but by the military arrangements of the Executive of the State, was that provision of the constitution which takes away from a State the power "to keep troops" signally violated. I take (said Mr.

D.) these documents to mean fairly and candidly what they express. I take their meaning in their fair and candid spirit. They who framed the ordinance and laws are entitled to this construction. They mean what they speak, and perhaps something more than they speak. And when we see the Executive of the State keeping troops in Charleston, it is obvious that this provision of the constitution is violated.

Again: These laws of the State of South Carolina contain principles which are subversive of those of the United States. Not only is the supremacy of our laws whistled to the wind, but the paramount character of our national allegiance is denied and overthrown.

Sir, (said Mr. D.,) I cannot find in the constitution, expressly or impliedly, a warrant for the course of South Carolina, and can therefore entertain no doubt of our constitutional power to enact this bill into a law. What are its tendencies and objects?

It is painful to see the true character of a legislative measure so strangely perverted or misconceived as this has been in the course of the present debate. We have it in print before us; it has lain upon our desks for many days, liable to the strictest examination; it hangs, inaccessible to vision, upon no lofty pillar; it has already travelled through the press, and has been canvassed by the people, in a variety of ways; it cannot now be deformed by mere rhetoric, nor buried under a mound of obloquy. Like the constitution on which I have been commenting, its words are plain and intelligible, and it is meant for the home-bred, unsophisticated understandings of our fellow-citizens. Who cannot perceive that, in every one of its provisions, in all its possible action, it is purely and simply defensive? It is illuminated with a declaration to which a Senator adverted, "let us alone, and we will let you alone." It is called into being by the ordinance, laws, and military demonstrations of South Carolina; and it cannot work, except as counteractive of avowed schemes to evade, resist, and nullify our laws. These schemes, it is agreed on all hands, must succeed, if we supinely fold our arms. If they are legitimate and just, let them succeed; if they are wrong, and subversive of our peace, our constitution, and our statutes, we must act, or give up the Government as incapable or unfit to be administered. The bill proposes to exhaust the civil and judicial means of carrying the laws into execution, before a single movement of a different kind be countenanced. When our legal custody of imported goods, under the duty act, is avowedly to be defeated by the extraordinary replevin law, can we do less than double the number and strength of our custom-house bolts and bars? When the avenues to do justice are poisoned or polluted by test oaths, can we do less than devise modes of reaching and entering her eternal temple, through purer and safer channels? And when the sublime terrors of the blue cockade and the palmetto button are paraded before our eyes, may we not be excused, if, in mere effort to keep our courage from oozing out at our fingers' ends, we permit the eagle to soar a little, only a little, and the stars and stripes to fan but gently our fainting spirits? Sir, (said Mr. D.,) law is alike odious and dangerous to those who wish to disobey it. Restraint is always arbitrary, dictatorial, despotic, in the vocabulary of those who desire to do as they please, and what they please. Yet are the people of this country strongly impressed with the conviction that, without law, there can be no liberty; and that they who preach disobedience to the one, are the most apt to disregard the other. There is something very oppressive about the course of control which this bill sanctions. Obedience to the revenue laws is to be enforced, first, through collectors, surveyors, and tide-waiters. Is not this, sir, quite unprecedented? Then, the interference of marshals, bailiffs, and tipstaves, is authorized. Who can imagine a greater extension of arbitrary power? Anon, impartial (aye, there's the rub) judges and jurors are provided. Is not this assuming a most belligerent and offensive attitude? But it gets worse and worse. If our laws are threatened with prostration, our officers with violence, and the community with riot, conflagration, and bloodshed, why then, the bill, in pure, unmixed, unmitigated despotism, arms the President with the overwhelming and exterminating power of issuing death warrants. No! his proclamation to disperse! Sir, the Boston port bill, the Jersey prison ship, the imperial ukase of desolation against Poland, was nothing to this; all their virtues concentrated could not equal a Presidential proclamation to enforce the payment of duties on a hog-head of sugar! But enormity accumulates upon enormity; and this dreadful bill, denounced as a declaration of war, actually authorizes the officers of the customs, when the property under their charge shall be endangered by unruly combinations and force, to back out of the scrape, run away, and not stop until they have a river between themselves and their assailants! It is too much; the principles of '98, the holy cause of human freedom, the blood of our ancestors, the blue cockade and the palmetto button, cannot sanction or endure it.

Sir, (said Mr. D.,) this is, in plain reality, the outline of the bill, until we reach a point at which, for the purpose of protecting the lives, liberties, and properties of our fellow-citizens in South Carolina, it may become necessary to quell refractory and treasonable disobedience with the vigor and promptness of military or naval force. If the emergency be brought on by those who are bent upon throwing off their allegiance to the constitution and laws of the land, we may deplore, but we cannot avoid it; we must meet it with every possible forbearance, but with firmness. Ours will not be the responsibility for consequences, unless we fail in preparing adequately and effectively to prevent or ameliorate them. Nor have I the dread, which is entertained by others, of using, on special occasions, and by authority of law, the regularly armed energy of the country. In its present reduced condition as to numbers, though admirable state as to discipline, more force could not be expected to be at any time, or on any point, at the disposition of the Executive, than Mr. Jefferson called out, under one of the precedents for the present law, to carry into effect the embargo.

Our Union (said Mr. D.) is an incalculable blessing. While it has lasted, what have we not accomplished, both in peace and in war? All the great objects of the human associations have been cultivated and attained with almost unexampled rapidity and ease. Liberty has been chastened, and made forever stable; science has been stormed in her hundred trenches, and mastered in all her ramparts; happiness has gently diffused itself throughout an immense population, taking its own ways over a boundless region of country; and wealth and power have gradually made the American people rivals of Greek and Roman fame. All the high aims, too, of a virtuous ambition have been reached in war. Independence consummated; renown everywhere acknowledged; glory, bright among the brightest! Yield away the constitution and the Union, and where are we? Frittered into fragments, and not able to claim one portion of the past as peculiarly its own! Sir, our Union is not merely a blessing; it is a political necessity. We cannot exist without it. I mean, that all of existence which is worth having must depart with it. Our liberties could not endure the incessant conflicts of civil and conterminous strife; our independence would be a real mockery; our very memories would turn to bitterness.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina, said: I shall now proceed to consider the ordinance.

Although I have shown that the people of South Carolina, having, in their sovereign character, put their construction on their rights, which stops all further consideration, except of an unconstitutional or belligerent nature, I will proceed to consider this question as subordinate to the constitution of the United States.

The first section declares the tariff laws null and void. The State has the right, consistent with the constitution, to make this declaration. It is the mere recital of a truth; only declaring what was originally so. But it is argued that the tariff is constitutional. If so, we are not now to decide that question; that is for another forum. We are not to expound and enforce our own law.

Is the tariff constitutional? This question must be decided in the affirmative, before you can enforce its provisions, or impugn its ordinance. The power to protect domestic manufactures is not to be found in terms in the constitution. If it is to be found at all, it must be among the incidental powers. Thus, under the taxing power, the right to protect is set up. But it is the opinion of the great body of the people of South Carolina that the right to tax for revenue does not extend the right to tax for protection. It is said by the President, that, as the power to tax is in Congress, they can tax to any extent, without the right, on the part of any one, to question the motive; this I deny as a correct principle of constitutional construction. The people have the right to examine the motive. A limited power to tax can only be properly restrained by looking at the motive. Congress have the power to fix their own compensation; they may, under the taxing power, levy a tax on the people, intending to distribute the same among themselves; this could only be prevented by the people refusing to pay it, if the tax is laid with an improper motive. The true way to test this tax is to analyze the law, and then determine whether it is competent to levy a tax, to give the benefit thereof to the manufacturers. We have the treasury estimate of an extra amount of taxation, equal to six millions; take this sum, and then inquire, can Congress levy that amount, and give the same to the manufacturers? This right to levy a tax for protection is by some referred to the power to regulate commerce. By looking into the proceedings preliminary to the adoption of the Federal Government, to be found in the first volume of the laws of Congress, it will be there seen that this power was desired only to protect the navigating interest; the object being clearly to invigorate and encourage commerce, not to cripple and destroy it. I will not dwell on this subject. I delivered my opinions at length in the debate on the passage of the last tariff. This subject has undergone a most thorough investigation, and the united voice of the planting States pronounced the principle of protection unconstitutional. This is no new doctrine, for the first time broached by the convention of South Carolina. It has been pronounced from Virginia to Mississippi for the last eight years. But it has been urged that the revenue is repealed, as well as the protection; and, therefore, the ordinance is unconstitutional.

Sir, let us examine a little the validity of this objection to the ordinance. If it be partly contaminated, the whole is void. The fraudulent execution of a valid power makes the deed null. A dollar, part silver, part pewter, is a counterfeit. Where a wrong-doer mixes his goods with those of another, if there is no way to ascertain how much belongs to each, he who produces the difficulty must lose what belongs to him. Who could expect to be paid for sugar sold, if half were sand? It is the fault of him who practises the fraud, if he loses that which might have been valuable.

The third section declares that appeals shall not be taken from the State court. This contravenes the 25th section of the judiciary act, it is said.

It is well known that the right to take a case from the State court, by an appeal to the Supreme Court, has been contested in every form, ever since the enactment of this law.

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

By this clause in the constitution, it is declared that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain.

The whole of the judicial power is thus vested in the United States court. By what authority can any power be transferred by Congress to the State courts? There is no such power.

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects."

Having provided for the courts in the first clause, they have, in this one, provided for the jurisdiction, which is limited to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. "Extend to," means, reach to, cover. These words do not give exclusive jurisdiction.

Judicial power is a generic term, including the Supreme Court and the inferior courts of the United States.

A State court is not an inferior court of the United States, and therefore no appeal can fairly be predicated on the proceedings of the State courts.

There is a subsequent clause, which provides that the State courts shall be bound by the constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and to treaties; this was the only check which was intended to secure the rights of persons under the constitution, laws, and treaties. There is no more ground to suppose State courts could not be trusted to execute such cases as might be brought in State courts, where rights were secured under the Federal Government, than the Governors.

Where fugitives may be demanded, the United States cannot control this officer; he may demand, or not; so the State officers must swear to support the constitution of the United States;

FEBRUARY, 1833.] Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification—Powers of the Federal Judiciary.

[SENATE.]

if they do not, there is no way for this Government to compel them, unless by a resort to force, which was not intended.

The President relies on this clause: "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding," to prove the State courts bound to sustain the United States laws. This is not denied; but not when those laws are in violation of the constitution; and it was not intended that the State judges should have their decisions questioned any more by federal judges, than federal judges should have their opinions questioned by State judges—both were to be final in their sphere. State courts are of general jurisdiction, nothing presumed out of their jurisdiction; federal courts limited. Every thing must be proven to give jurisdiction. Upon general principles, there would be more propriety in the State courts reversing the federal decisions, than the converse, because all courts of limited jurisdiction may be kept within their province by courts of general jurisdiction.

The President, in his proclamation, says, the laws, constitution, and treaties, are the supreme law of the land. This is not a correct view of the constitution. The President seems to consider a law above the constitution, and the treaties subject to it. Now, I understand it to be exactly different. The treaties are not required to be made in pursuance of the constitution, but the laws are.

A treaty may become necessary, impairing, in some instance, the constitution; and it is incident to the war power. The treaty-making power may fairly be considered as an independent substantive one, involving the highest political rights; and, when sanctioned by two-thirds of the Senate, binding on the constituted authorities of the United States and the States. And here I will remark, there seems no ground to suppose that the terms "law of the land," mean any thing more than that the constitution, and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and treaties, are, by this clause, made the law of the land of the States, not of the United States; they have no land but the public land; the lex terre referred to here is the local law; and the federal laws are made a part of the local law, and to be locally administered. So much for the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who seeks to enlarge the powers of the United States by this clause.

The last clause, (of the ordinance,) the subject of secession, has been misunderstood by some, and misrepresented by others. The constitutionality of secession, or whether it shall be peaceable or not, is not involved in the principles laid down. It is predicated on the assumption of a belligerent posture by the Federal Government towards South Carolina. It is not true that any attempt on the part of the General Government to enforce the revenue law is made the condition upon which the secession shall take place. The exception is a very broad one—any attempt, except by the "civil institutions" of the country. This most material qualification has been left out by the President, when adverting to this subject in the proclamation.

This latter clause is considered another violation of the constitution of the United States. It is only the declaration of a purpose, and not the execution of one. There is nothing to be considered but the abstractions contained therein. He said, upon the general right to secede, he would only state what his opinions were; the convention of South Carolina would determine for themselves. He did not think, as a political principle, the Federal Government could recognise this right, simply because no Government, unless it is so agreed upon in its constitution, can recognise that which may lead to its own dissolution. Social compacts, from their nature, imply a perpetuity; political compacts, such as our federal system, do so likewise. The constitution contains stipulations of a binding character to associate, but none to secede. Even admitting the most indubitable and extensive sovereignty to be recognised as belonging to the States, still the Federal Government could not admit the right of the States to secede. Yet if a State shall be constrained, under any circumstances, which I trust may never occur, to discuss this question, whether the circumstances upon which she places her rights will justify her, must of course be for her consideration, not mine. I can scarcely conceive of a state of facts in which secession would not follow a state of things making it immaterial to inquire whether it is peaceable or revolutionary. There are many things which Government cannot formally admit, which necessity forces it to acquiesce in. Thus, for instance, the absolute unqualified right to emigrate cannot be admitted by Government, since the admission of this right might operate exceedingly harsh on the residue of the community, if pushed to extremity; although the Government may have the right to guard against its own dissolution, or an unjust withdrawal of individuals from the common burdens, yet, still, this would be an arbitrary power, and must be resorted to only in the very last resort. To arrest a citizen and confine him, because he proposes to emigrate, would in most cases involve the Government in more trouble and expense than the detention would compensate for. A father cannot admit the right of a daughter to marry without his consent; yet, if she does marry, he must submit, and make the most of the new relationship of his child. So of suicide: no Government can admit the right of any one to take his own life; yet, if he will destroy himself, you cannot punish him.

I consider that a State has the same right to secede that a citizen has to emigrate. It is, in fact, only a different mode of doing the same thing. Every citizen of a State may emigrate, and thus destroy the State; in that event, the United States could not take possession of the soil. The Federal Government cannot, in the abstract, admit of secession; nor can a State admit in the abstract the right of emigration, unless covenanted for, as in Connecticut. Yet if a State will secede, and a citizen will emigrate, there is no way to prevent them, but by the exercise of such arbitrary power as will shock the moral sense of a people accustomed to live in a free Government. To make war on a State to keep her in the Union, would be but the extension of the right of hanging a man to prevent his emigration. The States must keep their citizens by wise and liberal policy, wholesome and benevolent laws; and the United States must keep the States from seceding in the same way. The use of force may show the tyrant, but cannot prevent the act.

After all, this ordinance can be considered only in the nature of a lease entry, and ouster, to try title with the manufacturers.

I have thus attempted to prove that our ordinance does not, in any one instance, violate the constitution of the United States.

I had intended to comment on the provisions of this bill, but I will content myself by simply stating the positions. Other gentlemen have discussed them. I will only remark that the precedents referred to are laws requiring the use of force without the body of any State, and which in one instance the President refused to enter, because it was at war with the rights of the State and the first principles of liberty; I mean the Indian intercourse law in the case of Georgia.

The bill is unconstitutional, because it confers the war power on the President.—1st and 8th section of the constitution.

It subjects a citizen to punishment when he has been guilty of no crime, by seizing his property, and compelling him to pay cash duties.—5th article of amendment.

It violates the rights of the people of the State, so far as to give a preference to other ports.—9th section.

It deprives the citizens of South Carolina of the same rights as citizens of other States.—5th section.

It places the military of the United States above the civil authority of a State.

It confers on the President legislative powers to shut up the port of Charleston.

It gives federal courts jurisdiction of cases which do not arise under the laws and constitution.—2d section, 3d article.

It subjects, without trial or process of law, citizens to be arrested and deprived of their liberty.

It punishes the freedom of speech and of the press.

It authorizes the President to consider the Legislature of a State as a mob, and, by issuing his proclamation, to disperse them by force.

It imposes cruel and unjust fines, and indirectly forfeits the office of State officers, who must obey their own laws, or be disfranchised.

It substitutes armed force for the judicial tribunals of the country. It makes a district court an appellate court over the State courts, as to habeas corpus.

It compels persons to prosecute suits in the federal courts, where the court must only nonsuit the party for want of jurisdiction, or take jurisdiction upon the suggestion of a defendant, not warranted by law; thereby making the jurisdiction of the court to depend on the error or wickedness of all defendants.

I have attempted to prove that a State has a right to judge in the last resort of a violation of the constitution; that the proceedings of the State of South Carolina violate no provision of the constitution; that the means resorted to to protect her reserved rights are for her judgment alone; that, strong as they appear, they are warranted by the usurpations of this Government; that the questions presented to the descendants of a glorious ancestry, are liberty or slavery; the constitution with the Union, or the Union without a constitution; that we do not propose to secede, except this Government treats us as a public enemy, and drives us to the necessity of choosing between the halter and the bayonet; that you have the physical right, not the moral one, to pass the bill now under consideration; that it is the assertion of your rights by force against an organized Government, and is therefore war; that, in utter contempt of the fundamental principles of the Government, in derogation of the theory of federalism itself, you substitute force for law, the sword for the ermine; that the sacred principles of justice require you to reduce the taxes, and relieve a patriotic and a suffering people from poverty and oppression.

Knowing as I do (and which is too well attested by the events of the day for any honorable Senator to be ignorant of) that a deep and settled sense of discontent pervades the great mass of the people of South Carolina; that the sober, calm, patriotic population of Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, revolt at this system of protection, as an invasion of their constitutional rights, I cannot help expressing a deep solicitude that this bill, in its present offensive form, may not receive the sanction of the present Congress.

I shall not run any parallel between this controversy and the revolutionary struggle. The doctrine upon which we rest our rights do not involve such principles. Sir, I regret that suspicions of the personal hatred of the President towards the people of South Carolina should, in the opinion of her public authorities, have rendered it necessary to arm in protection of their personal rights, as well as in defence of their fundamental laws.

Sir, placing myself in a purely selfish position, there is no honorable Senator who has higher motives to preserve the peace and good order of society. I have nothing to gain, every thing to lose by civil commotion.

Modification of the Tariff—Compromise Bill.

[SENATE.]

If the first clause of this bill is retained and passed, I have substantial, well-grounded fears of the consequences. The exception in the last clause in the ordinance is a very extensive one, yet I am not prepared to say this bill will make a case without the exception. If the Senator from Pennsylvania, or any other Senator, supposes that both or either of the representatives of South Carolina on this floor hold that State in the palm of their hands, it is a great mistake. Non nostrum tantas componere lites. The political power of that State is now in the hands of intelligent and independent planters, who think for themselves, and act accordingly. What course will be taken upon the passage of this bill, and omission to modify the tariff, I am not prepared to say. From an article in the leading paper at the capital of that State, one exercising much influence, and reflecting a respectable portion of public opinion, it seems but little attention will be paid to the interference of Virginia, at least in the opinion of that writer. This article, although written with great ability, I am sure does injustice to the motives of our elder and much respected sister. Be that as it may, every motive of benevolence, justice, and prudence, urge us to abstain from rash or unskilful legislation. Who will try the strength of the diamond by the hammer and the anvil? To that impertinent curiosity which wishes to test the virtue of the Union, I would refer to the fate of Anselmo. Believe, me sir, the experiment is a useless, and may prove a fatal one.

I fear interested and malevolent persons have lent themselves to the basest and most profligate purposes, in misrepresenting both the President and the dominant party in South Carolina to each other. I know that a very strong conviction prevails that the Chief Magistrate mixes up personal with public considerations on this topic; that he seeks to indulge in the passion of revenge, and imbrue his hands in the blood of some of the public men of that State. And I know, moreover, that before this shall happen, a generous and spirited population will come to their rescue. The people will not permit their public functionaries, acting under their command, and clothed with the panoply of their power, to be led like criminals to the charnel-house. Before this will take place, many a brave man will perish. What Senator can desire to see the States pass under the yoke? How long since this body has surrendered their independence to the high behests of the Executive? Balfour and Rawdon have not contended, in the pages of history, for the honor of the execution of Hayne. If blood and carnage flow from this bill, the Senate, in after times, will not be emulous of the share they had in passing it.

Sir, I do not deny the power to pass such a bill. Cain had the power to kill his brother. Elizabeth had the power to take the life of the unfortunate Mary. The regicide court had the power to overrule the plea to its jurisdiction, by Charles the First. Bonaparte had the power to poison his prisoners at Jaffa. The question I make is, as to your right—moral right—by force, to compel the people of South Carolina to disobey their oaths and violate their most sacred obligations to their State Government.

It may be asked, if this bill be passed, what rights are left to South Carolina? She has the right to slink from her position, and, like a thievish slave, submit to the lash of a master. Nay, she has the further right left her—that right which Lucretia had, after she was dishonored. She has the right left her, which Virginius had, after the decree was pronounced which made his daughter a slave. She has the right which Leonidas had, to dispute the passage of the Persian army at the Straits of Thermopylæ. She has the right to resist unconstitutional taxation, as her fathers did; and she has the reserved right, which no Government can take away, nor tyranny destroy—the glorious right to live free or die.

Adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 12.

Modification of the Tariff—Compromise Bill.

Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the Senate to the following effect:

I yesterday, sir, gave notice that I should ask leave to introduce a bill to modify the various acts imposing duties on imports. I, at the same time added, that I should, with the permission of the Senate, offer an explanation of the principle on which that bill is founded. I owe, sir, an apology to the Senate for this course of action, because, although strictly parliamentary, it is nevertheless out of the usual practice of this body; but it is a course which I trust that the Senate will deem to be justified by the interesting nature of the subject. I rise, sir, on this occasion, actuated by no motives of a private nature, by no personal feelings, and for no personal objects; but exclusively in obedience to a sense of the duty which I owe to my country. I trust, therefore, that no one will anticipate on my part any ambitious display of such humble powers as I may possess. It is sincerely my purpose to present a plain, unadorned, and naked statement of facts connected with the measure which I shall have the honor to propose, and with the condition of the country. When I survey, sir, the whole face of our country, I behold all around me evidences of the most gratifying prosperity—a prospect which would seem to be without a cloud upon it, were it not that through all parts of the country there exist great dissensions and unhappy distinctions, which, if they can possibly be relieved and reconciled by any broad scheme of legislation adapted to all interests, and regarding the feelings of all sections, ought to be quieted; and, leading to which object, any measure ought to be well received.

In presenting the modification of the tariff laws which I am now about to submit, I have two great objects in view. My first object looks to the tariff. I am compelled to express the opinion, formed after the most deliberate reflection, and on a full survey of the whole country, that, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the tariff stands in imminent danger. If it should even be preserved during this session, it must fall at the next session. By what circumstances, and through what causes, has arisen the necessity for this change in the policy of our country, I will not pretend now to elucidate. Others there are who may differ from the impressions which my mind has received upon this point. Owing, however, to a variety of concurrent causes, the tariff, as it now exists, is in imminent danger; and if the system can be preserved beyond the next session, it must be by some means not now within the reach of human sagacity. The fall of that policy, sir, would be productive of consequences calamitous indeed. When I look to the variety of interests which are involved, to the number of individuals interested, the amount of capital invested, the value of the buildings erected, and the whole arrangement of the business for the prosecution of the various branches of the manufacturing art which have sprung up under the fostering care of this Government, I cannot contemplate any evil equal to the sudden overthrow of all those interests. History can produce no parallel to the extent of the mischief which would be produced by such a disaster. The repeal of the edict of Nantes itself was nothing in comparison with it. That condemned to exile and brought to ruin a great number of persons. The most respectable portion of the population of France were condemned to exile and ruin by that measure. But in my opinion, sir, the sudden repeal of the tariff policy would bring ruin and destruction on the whole people of this country. There is no evil, in my opinion, equal to the consequences which would result from such a catastrophe.

What, sir, are the complaints which unhappily divide the people of this great country? On the one hand, it is said by those who are opposed to the tariff, that it unjustly taxes a portion of the people, and paralyzes their industry; that it is to be a perpetual operation; that there is to be no end to the system, which, right or wrong, is to be urged to their inevitable ruin. And what is the just complaint, on the other hand, of those who support the tariff? It is, that the policy of the Government is vacillating and uncertain, and that there is no stability in our legislation. Before one set of books are fairly opened, it becomes necessary to close them, and to open a new set. Before a law can be tested by experiment, another is passed. Before the present law has gone into operation, before it is yet nine months old, passed as it was under circumstances of extraordinary deliberation, the fruit of nine months' labor—before we know any thing of its experimental effects, and even before it commences its operations, we are required to repeal it. On one side we are urged to repeal a system which is fraught with ruin; on the other side, the check now imposed on enterprise, and the state of alarm in which the public mind has been thrown, render all prudent men desirous, looking ahead a little way, to adopt a state of things, on the stability of which they may have reason to count. Such is the state of feeling on the one side and on the other. I am anxious to find out some principle of mutual accommodation, to satisfy, as far as practicable, both parties; to increase the stability of our legislation; and at some distant day, but not too distant, when we take into view the magnitude of the interests which are involved, to bring down the rate of duties to that revenue standard for which our opponents have so long contended. The basis on which I wish to found this modification, is one of time; and the several parts of the bill to which I am about to call the attention of the Senate, are founded on this basis. I propose to give protection to our manufactured articles, adequate protection, for a length of time, which, compared with the length of human life, is very long, but which is short in proportion to the legitimate discretion of every wise and parental system of government; securing the stability of legislation, and allowing time for a gradual reduction on one side, and on the other proposing to reduce the rate of duties to that revenue standard for which the opponents of the system have so long contended. I will now proceed to lay the provisions of this bill before the Senate, with a view to draw their attention to the true character of the bill.

Mr. C. then proceeded to read the first section of the bill. According to this section, he said, it would be perceived that it was proposed to come down to the revenue standard at the end of little more than nine years and a half, giving a protection to our own manufactures, which he hoped would be adequate, during the intermediate time. Mr. C. recapitulated the provisions of the sections, and showed by various illustrations, how they would operate.

Mr. C. then proceeded to read the comment at great length upon the second section of the bill. It would be recollected, he said, that at the last session of Congress, with a view to make a concession to the Southern section of the country, low priced woollens, (those supposed to enter into the consumption of slaves and the poorer classes of persons,) were taken out of the general class of duties on woollens, and the duty of them reduced to five per cent. It would be also recollected that at that time the gentlemen from the South had said that this concession was of no consequence, and they did not care for it; and he believed that they did not now consider it of any greater importance. As, therefore, it had failed of the purpose for which it was taken out of the common class, he thought it ought to be brought back again, and placed by the side of other descriptions of woollens, and made subject to the same reduction of duty as proposed by this section.

Modification of the Tariff—Compromise Bill.

Having next read through the third section of the bill, Mr. C. said, that, after the expiration of a term of years, this section laid down a rule by which the duties were to be reduced to the revenue standard which had been so long and so earnestly contended for. Until otherwise directed, and in default of provision being made for the wants of the Government in 1842, a rule was thus provided for the rate of duties thereafter: Congress being, in the mean time, authorized to adopt any other rule which the exigencies of the country or its financial condition might require. That is to say, if, instead of the duty of 20 per cent. proposed, 15 or 17 per cent. of duty was sufficient, or 25 per cent. should be found necessary, to produce a revenue to defray the expenses of an economical administration of the Government, there was nothing to prevent either of those rates, or any other, from being fixed upon; whilst the rate of 20 per cent. was introduced to guard against any failure on the part of Congress to make the requisite provision in due season.

This section of the bill, Mr. C. said, contained also another clause, suggested by that spirit of harmony and conciliation which he prayed might preside over the councils of the Union at this trying moment. It provided (what those persons who are engaged in manufactures have so long anxiously required for their security) that duties shall be paid in ready money; and we shall thus get rid of the whole of that credit system into which an inroad was made in regard to woollens, by the act of the last session. This section further contained a proviso, that nothing in any part of this act should be construed to interfere with the freest exercise of the power of Congress to lay any amount of duties, in the event of war breaking out between this country and any foreign Power.

Mr. C. having then read the fourth section of the bill, said that one of the considerations strongly urged for a reduction of the tariff at this time was, that the Government was likely to be placed in a dilemma by having an overflowing revenue; and this apprehension was the ground of an attempt totally to change the protective policy of the country. The section which he had read, Mr. C. said, was an effort to guard against this evil, by relieving altogether from duty a portion of the articles of import now subject to it. Some of these, he said, would, under the present rate of duty upon them, produce a considerable revenue; the article of silks alone would probably yield half a million of dollars per annum. If it were possible to pacify present dissensions, and let things take their course, he believed that no difficulty need be apprehended. If, said he, the bill which this body passed at the last session of Congress, and has again passed at this session, shall pass the other House, and become a law, and the gradual reduction of duties shall take place which is contemplated by the first section of this bill, we shall have settled two (if not three) of the great questions which have agitated this country—that of the tariff, of the public lands, and, I will add, of internal improvement also. For, if there should still be a surplus revenue, that surplus might be applied, until the year 1842, to the completion of the works of internal improvement already commenced; and, after 1842, a reliance for all funds for purposes of internal improvement should be placed upon the operation of the land bill, to which he had already referred.

It was not his object, Mr. C. said, in referring to that measure in connection with that which he was about to propose, to consider them as united in their fate, being desirous, partial as he might be to both, that each should stand or fall upon its own intrinsic merits. If this section of the bill, adding to the number of free articles, should become law, along with the reduction of duties proposed by the first section of the bill, it was by no means sure that we should have any surplus revenue at all. He had been astonished, indeed, at the process of reasoning by which the Secretary of the Treasury had arrived at the conclusion that we should have a surplus revenue at all, though he admitted that such a conclusion could be arrived at in no other way. But what was this process? Duties of a certain rate now exist; the amount which they produce is known; the Secretary, proposing a reduction of the rate of duty, supposes that the duties will be reduced in proportion to the amount of the reduction of the duty. Now, Mr. C. said, no calculation could be more uncertain than that.

Mr. C. would now take a view of some of the objections which would be made to the bill. It might be said that the act was prospective; that it bound our successors; and that we had no power thus to bind them. It was true that the act was prospective, and so was almost every act which we ever passed; but we could repeal it the next day. It was the established usage to give all acts a prospective operation. In every tariff law there were some provisions which go into operation immediately, and others at a future time. Each Congress legislated according to their own views of propriety; their acts did not bind their successors, but created a species of public faith which would not rashly be broken. But, if this bill should go into operation, as he hoped, even against hope, that it might, he had not a doubt that it would be adhered to by all parties. There was but one contingency which would render a change necessary, and that was the intervention of a war, which was provided for in the bill. The hands of Congress were left untied in this event, and they would be at liberty to resort to any mode of taxation which they might propose. But, if we suppose peace to continue, there would be no motive for disturbing the arrangement, but, on the contrary, every motive to carry it into effect. In the next place, it will be objected to the bill, by the friends of the protective policy, (of whom he held himself to be one, for his mind was immutably fixed in favor of that policy,) that it abandoned the power of protection. But, he contended, in the first place, that a suspension of the exercise of the power was not an abandonment of it; for the power was in the constitution according to our theory; was put there by its framers, and could only be dislodged by the people. After the year 1842, the bill provided that the power should be exercised in a certain mode. There were four modes by which the industry of the country could be protected: First, the absolute prohibition of rival foreign articles. That was totally unattempted by the bill; but it was competent to the wisdom of the Government to exert the power whenever they wished. Second, the imposition of duties in such a manner as to have no reference to any object but revenue. When we had a large public debt, in 1816, the duties yielded thirty-seven millions, and paid so much more of the public debt; and subsequently, they yielded but eight or ten millions, and paid so much less of the debt. Sometimes we had to trench on the sinking fund. Now, we had no public debt to absorb the surplus revenue, and no motive for continuing the duties. No man can look at the condition of the country, and say that we can carry on this system, with accumulating revenue, and no practicable way of expending it. The third mode was attempted last session, in a resolution which he had the honor to submit last year, and which, in fact, ultimately formed the basis of the act which finally passed both Houses. This was to raise as much revenue as was wanted for the use of the Government, and no more; but to raise it from the protected, and not from the unprotected articles. He would say, that he regretted, most deeply, that the greater part of the country would not suffer this principle to prevail. It ought to prevail; and the day, in his opinion, would come, when it would be adopted as the permanent policy of the country. Shall we legislate for our own wants, or those of a foreign country? To protect our own interests, in opposition to foreign legislation, was the basis of this system. The fourth mode in which protection could be afforded to domestic industry was, to admit, free of duty, every article which aided the operations of the manufacturers. These were the four modes for protecting our industry; and to those who say that the bill abandons the power of protection, he would reply, that it did not touch that power; and that the fourth mode, so far from being abandoned, is extended and upheld by the bill. The most that can be objected to the bill by those with whom he had co-operated to support the protective system was, that, in consideration of nine and a half years of peace, certainty, and stability, the manufacturers relinquished some advantages which they now enjoyed. Mr. C. concluded with asking leave to introduce his bill.

Mr. FORSYTH presumed, he said, that the motion for leave, in its present stage, was a subject of discussion; if so, he begged leave to say a word or two in opposition to it. He opposed the introduction of the bill as a revenue measure, and upon it demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. HOLMES confessed that this was the first time but one that he ever heard an objection made to a motion of leave. Common courtesy required that any Senator should have leave to introduce any bill he pleased. He did not know whether he should like the principles of this bill, but he would like to have it on the table, and see whether he would approve of it.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that if the Senator from Kentucky had not explained the provisions of the bill, and shown them to be unconstitutional, he should have no objections to its introduction.

Mr. POINDEXTER returned his hearty thanks to the Senator from Kentucky for introducing this bill, and he hoped he would have leave.

Mr. CALHOUN would make but one or two observations. Entirely approving of the object for which this bill was introduced, he should give his vote in favor of the motion for leave to introduce it. He who loves the Union must desire to see this agitating question brought to a termination. Until it should be terminated, we could not expect the restoration of peace or harmony, or a sound condition of things, throughout the country. He believed that to the unhappy divisions which had kept the Northern and Southern States apart from each other, the present entirely degraded condition of the country (for entirely degraded he believed it to be) was solely attributable. The general principles of this bill received his approbation. He believed that if the present difficulties were to be adjusted, they must be adjusted on the principles embraced in the bill, of fixing ad valorem duties, except in the few cases in the bill to which specific duties were assigned. He said that it had been his fate to occupy a position as hostile as any one could, in reference to the protective policy; but if it depended on his will, he would not give his vote for the prostration of the manufacturing interest. A very large capital had been invested in manufacturers, which had been of great service to the country; and he would never give his vote to suddenly withdraw all those duties by which that capital was sustained in the channel into which it had been directed. But he would only vote for the ad valorem system of duties, which he deemed the most beneficial and the most equitable. At this time, he did not rise to go into a consideration of any of the details of this bill, as such a course would be premature, and contrary to the practice of the Senate. There were some of the provisions which had his entire approbation, and there were some to which he objected. But he looked upon these minor points of difference as points in the settlement of which no difficulty would occur, when gentlemen met together in that spirit of mutual compromise which, he doubted not, would be brought into their deliberations, without at all yielding the constitutional question as to the right of protection.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that as, by its title, the bill appeared to be merely a bill to modify the existing revenue laws, it could hardly be rejected as a bill for raising revenue, which ought to originate in the other House, since there are many particulars in which all the existing revenue laws might be modified, without raising more or less revenue. As the bill has not been read, (said Mr. W.,) we seem to know no more of it, regularly, than its title purports. That title describes a bill, which may constitutionally originate in the Senate: I shall, therefore, vote for the leave.

But I feel it my duty, Mr. President, to say a word or two upon the measure itself. It is impossible that this proposition of the honorable member from Kentucky should not excite in the country a very strong sensation; and in the relation in which I stand to the subject, I am anxious, at an early moment, to say, that as far as I understand the bill, from the gentleman's statement of it, there are principles in it to which I do not at present see how I can ever concur. If I understand the plan, the result will be a well-understood surrender of the power of discrimination, or a stipulation not to use that power, in the laying duties on imports, after the eight or nine years have expired. This appears to me to be matter of great moment.

Mr. FORSYTH expressed regret that he should have created so much discussion. He did not oppose the object of the bill; he would not have raised his voice on the subject, if the motion did not call on him to violate a provision of the Constitution of the United States. A bill of this character, however, ought to pass first under the consideration of the immediate representatives of the people. He refused leave to introduce this bill, because the constitution forbids that the first action on a bill of this character should be in the Senate.

The call for the yeas and nays was then, with the assent of the Senate, withdrawn.

The question was then taken on granting leave to introduce the bill; which was decided in the affirmative, and the bill read the first time.

Mr. FORSYTH moved that the bill be now read a second time, with a view to its commitment.

This motion requires the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. DICKINSON objected, on the ground that it was too important a bill to be hurried through its stages.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the bill was ordered to be printed.

Revenue Collection Bill.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

The question being on the motion of Mr.

FORSYTH to strike out the 3d section of the bill—

It was decided by yeas 5, nays 28.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

Tariff Resolutions.

Mr. WEBSTER rose, and stated that, in pursuance of the notice which he had given yesterday, he wished now to lay on the table some resolutions, expressive of his opinions on the important subjects in relation to which a bill was presented to the Senate yesterday.

The resolutions were then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the annual revenues of the country ought not to be allowed to exceed a just estimate of the wants of the Government; and that as soon as it shall be ascertained, with reasonable certainty, that the rates of duties on imports, as established by the act of July, 1832, will yield an excess over those wants, provision ought to be made for their reduction; and that, in making this reduction, just regard should be had to the various interests and opinions of different parts of the country, so as most effectually to preserve the integrity and harmony of the Union, and to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare of the whole.

But, whereas it is certain that the diminution of the rates of duties on some articles would increase, instead of reducing, the aggregate amount of revenue on such articles; and whereas, in regard to such articles as it has been the policy of the country to protect, a slight reduction on one might produce essential injury, and even distress, to large classes of the community, while another might bear a larger reduction without any such consequences; and whereas, also, there are many articles the duties on which might be reduced, or altogether abolished, without producing any other effect than the reduction of revenue: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in reducing the rates of duties imposed on imports by the act of the 14th of July aforesaid, it is not wise or judicious to proceed by way of an equal reduction per centum on all articles; but that as well the amount as the time of reduction ought to be fixed, in respect to the several articles distinctly, having due regard, in each case, to the questions whether the proposed reduction will affect revenue alone, or how far it will operate injuriously on those domestic manufactures hitherto protected; especially such as are essential in time of war, and such, also, as have been established on the faith of existing laws; and, above all, how far such proposed reduction will affect the rates of wages and the earnings of American manual labor.

Resolved, That it is unwise and injudicious, in regulating imports, to adopt a plan, hitherto equally unknown in the history of this Government, and in the practice of all enlightened nations, which shall, either immediately or prospectively, reject all discrimination on articles to be taxed, whether they be articles of necessity or of luxury, of general consumption or of limited consumption; and whether they be, or be not, such as are manufactured and produced at home; and which shall confine all duties to one equal rate per centum on all articles.

Resolved, That since the people of the United States have deprived the State Governments of all power of fostering manufactures, however indispensable in peace or in war, or however important to national independence, by commercial regulations, or by laying duties on imports, and have transferred the whole authority to make such regulations, and to lay such duties, to the Congress of the United States, Congress cannot surrender or abandon such power, compatibly with its constitutional duty, and therefore,

Resolved, That no law ought to be passed on the subject of imposts, containing any stipulation, express or implied, or giving any pledge or assurance, direct or indirect, which shall tend to restrain Congress from the full exercise, at all times hereafter, of all its constitutional powers, in giving reasonable protection to American industry, countervailing the policy of foreign nations, and maintaining the substantial independence of the United States.

On motion of Mr. DALLAS, the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Tariff Bill.

The bill to modify the act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports, was read a second time.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. GRUNDY said he would move the reference to a select committee of seven, and expressed his hope that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] would be placed at the head of that committee.

Mr. CLAY expressed indifference as to the committee to which the bill should be referred. He would be willing to send it to the Committee on Manufactures, with whom, he took pleasure in saying, he had always acted harmoniously, and for the members of which he felt so much personal respect; yet, for the reasons which had been urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, he considered that it would be most expedient to send the subject to the committee for which that gentleman had moved. This did not seem to be a measure for the benefit of any exclusive interest, but for the promotion of the general harmony. He concluded with seconding the motion for a select committee.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his gratification that the gentleman from Tennessee had made the motion, and that the gentleman from Kentucky had acquiesced in it. The subject belonged to no existing committee whatever. It was a project for restoring peace and harmony to the country; and he hoped that the motion for a select committee would prevail.

The motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Manufactures, was decided by yeas 12, nays 26.

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

Presidential Election—Counting the Votes.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that the House was ready to proceed to the counting of the votes given for President and Vice President, and were waiting to receive the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the Senate proceed to the House of Representatives, for the purpose of performing the duties referred to in the message; which motion having been agreed to,

The Senate, preceded by the President, pro tempore, attended the hall of the House of Representatives; and, after having performed the duties which called them there, returned, at twenty minutes past two o'clock, to their seats in the Senate; when

Mr. GRUNDY offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed, to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the House, to wait on ANDREW JACKSON, of Tennessee, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; and also, to notify MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, that he has been duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing on the fourth day of March next.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

Mr. MOORE said, he rose to make a few remarks on the bill. He rose with no hypocritical pretence of an extraordinary attachment to the Union. As members of this body, said he, we have all sworn to support the constitution, and I concede to each as earnest a desire to fulfil this duty as I know that I myself feel. I, sir, am proud to be an American citizen; I am proud to be a citizen of the State of Alabama; I am proud of the honor of a seat in this Senate. But much as I prize this name, and proud as I am of the honor assigned to me by the partiality and indulgence of my fellow-citizens, I should be false to them, to their interests, and to myself, if I could permit this bill to become a law without having done all in my power to prevent it.

Much has been said about the course which South Carolina has adopted. I do not feel called upon to defend either her principles or her action; that task will be performed by those to whom she has assigned that duty.

In my opinion this bill presents another issue, which involves directly the rights, the interests, and the liberty of my constituents. It proposes to clothe the President of the United States with dictatorial and discretionary powers. It does more; it proposes to place the issue of civil war upon the discretion of a captain of a revenue cutter, the caprice of a young lieutenant fresh from school, or the folly of a tide-waiter.

It makes the President of the United States a national dictator, and converts the agents who may be intrusted with the execution of his supreme discretion into petty chieftains, who are required to trample upon the judicial authorities of the States. You see it places the military above the civil authority, and substitutes a military despotism for the peaceful administration of the laws.

But we are told by the honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill, (Mr. WILKINS,) that "we may safely intrust these extraordinary powers to the hands of Andrew Jackson, because he assures us Andrew Jackson never has abused power." I congratulate the honorable gentleman upon the extent of his faith. It is at least equal to "the grain of mustard seed," and it may yet accomplish miracles. The honorable gentleman should remember that this bill proposes to authorize the President to transfer these extraordinary powers to his agents. Great as the President is, powerful as we all know him to be, he must employ agents to execute his will; and it necessarily follows that that discretion with which you clothe the President must be by him transferred to his agents, to the commanders of his army and his navy, to the collectors of the revenue, to his marshals and his bailiffs. I am not disposed to make a question with the gentleman about his faith in the President; but I would ask him, are you prepared to grant such powers on the faith which you repose in such agents as these? But, sir, away with such solemn trifling. I consider this a question of liberty, and not of faith; and I can assure him, that if his constituents, the free laborers, of which we have heard so much, permit their representatives to bring their liberties as a faith offering, a propitiation to conciliate the good will of the President, those of whom I am an unworthy representative place theirs above all price. Sir, the people of Alabama are as much devoted to this Union, as established by our fathers, as the people of any other State can be; they are devoted to the Union, but they are devoted to it, not as the means of oppression, not as the source of civil war, but as the palladium of liberty. I have said, sir, that I am not called upon to defend either the principles or the action of South Carolina. I have said that this bill makes another issue, which involves directly the rights, interests, and liberty of my constituents. The gentleman tells us about the free labor of the North; and they tell us that they never will consent that this free labor of the North shall be reduced to the same condition as the slave labor of the South. Do gentlemen forget that there are free laborers in the South as well as in the North? Do gentlemen forget that the object of this constitution and of our Union was to secure equal rights, peace, and happiness to all our citizens? If they concede this, (and none will be so lost to all sense of propriety as to deny the truth of the assertion,) what right has the free laborer of the North to demand that his labor shall be protected at the expense of the free labor, or even the slave labor of the South? Yes, sir, I say of the slave labor of the South. For, sir, with us, labor is labor; it matters not whether it be of the slave or of the free, of the bondsman or his master; in fact, there can be none in theory, but in the minds of those hypocritical pretenders in philanthropy, who would emancipate our slaves under the pretence that "all men are born free and equal," and butcher their masters with mercenary bayonets; but as the gentleman from Pennsylvania who spoke last (Mr. DALLAS) does not like the word mercenary, I will say the bayonets of power; because we insist that it never was intended by the framers of the constitution to tax the slave labor of the South for the purpose of protecting "the free labor of the North." Your northern gentlemen have a holy horror at holding a fellow-creature in bondage, but they feel no horror at the idea of sending an army to compel the owners of these slaves to pay over all the profits of these slaves into the pockets of the northern manufacturers and capitalists. They consider slavery a most heinous offence against God and man; yet they call upon us, in the name of all that is dear in religion and morals, to authorize them to overrun South Carolina with fire and sword, unless she will pay over to them the profits of her slave labor. Or, in other words, they are too pious, too benevolent, to own slaves themselves; but they ask us very modestly, sir, to convert the owners of slaves in South Carolina into their overseers, superintending cotton fields and rice plantations for their benefit.

Yes, Mr. President, disguise this matter as you will, this is the question. We have long seen the tendency and object of the tariff policy. We deny your right to protect the free labor of the North, at the expense of the slave labor of the South. With us there is no distinction between the labor of the slave and the labor of the free, of the bondsman and his master.

The God of nature, nor the constitution, which alone has the right to determine what shall be law upon this subject, has made no distinction, and we will not permit this Government to do it; to yield such a power would be to permit the free laborers of the North to convert the masters of our slaves into the slaves of Northern masters. And it is because I believe the bill involves this question, and because I know the people of Alabama have a common interest with the people of South Carolina in resisting this oppression, that I am opposed to this bill.

We hear gentlemen loud in the praises of the constitution, vociferous in their professions of attachment to the Union. I can tell them, nay, they have been told again and again, how they can maintain the constitution and preserve the Union. Reject this bill, and modify the tariff; do justice, and the necessity for force will cease.

But some gentlemen seem to think they must support the President. I can understand why the Senators representing manufacturing States, and particularly those who never had any constitutional scruples upon the question of power, should support this bill. Although we are told this measure originated with the Executive, I can find no apology in that suggestion, which could justify me as a Senator representing a Southern State—yes, sir, a slave-holding, anti-tariff State—if I were so far to sacrifice their interest as to vote for this bill. I know, sir, that the President has a commanding popularity among my people; the honest, unsuspecting planters and laborers of Alabama gave him their confidence when he was a plain unpretending planter like themselves. But they voted for Andrew Jackson to be the President of a free people, subject to all the restraints of the constitution; they did not expect that he would ask to be clothed with dictatorial powers, much less that he would march at the head of a standing army for the purpose of enforcing, at the point of the bayonet, the collection of odious, unjust, unequal, and unconstitutional taxes.

But I warn gentlemen to pause. Who is it that are now so anxious to clothe the President with these new, undefined powers? Are they not his old enemies? Are they not his late opponents? But, sir, I give them my thanks. I am the representative of a brave, generous, and, therefore, a confiding people. Yet, there are in Alabama, as there are in all other States, "waiters upon Providence"—men whose highest ambition it is to worship power.

The policy of our adversaries has been to purchase these false guides, and weaken our resistance by internal dissensions.

If gentlemen will disregard all our entreaties; if, instead of claiming the promise made the peacemakers, they still persist in the exercise of injustice and oppression; if, instead of reducing the duties and giving us peace, harmony, strength, and brotherly love, they force upon us this bill, they will do us one favor, they will force us to be united; they will unbind the eyes of our people; they will then see who it is that "have sung peace, peace, when there was no peace." I again would say to those gentlemen who suppose they are to reap a golden harvest of profit or of honors from this measure, "You may have the power to pass your bill through this House; you may have the physical strength and the same generous majority by which you have passed your tariffs; but you cannot enforce it. I defy you, with all the sycophants, hirelings, and office-seekers now waiting for command. You may sweep the streets of your cities, and empty your workshops and manufacturing establishments; at this enlightened hour, and in this free country, you cannot enforce it. We know our rights, and, knowing them, dare maintain and defend them."

THURSDAY, February 14.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification—Vindication of the Virginia Resolutions of 1798-'99.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. RIVZ, of Virginia, said, the proceedings of my State, on another occasion of far higher importance, have been so frequently referred to in the course of this debate, as an example to justify the present proceedings of South Carolina, that I may be excused for saying something of them. What, then, was the conduct of Virginia in the memorable era of '98 and '99? She solemnly protested against the alien and sedition acts, as "palpable and alarming infractions of the constitution;" she communicated that protest to the other States of the Union, and earnestly appealed to them to unite with her in a like declaration, that this deliberate and solemn expression of the opinion of the States, as parties to the constitutional compact, should have its proper effect on the councils of the nation in procuring a revision and repeal of the obnoxious acts. This was "the head and front of her offending"—no more. The whole object of the proceedings was, by the peaceful force of public opinion, embodied through the organ of the State Legislatures, to obtain a repeal of the laws in question, not to oppose or arrest their execution while they remained unrepealed. That this was the true spirit and real purpose of the proceeding, is abundantly manifested by the whole of the able debate which took place in the Legislature of the State on the occasion. All the speakers, who advocated the resolutions which were finally adopted, distinctly placed them on that legitimate, constitutional ground. I need only refer to the emphatic declaration of John Taylor, of Carolina, the distinguished mover and able champion of the resolutions. He said "the appeal was to public opinion; if that is against us, we must yield." The same sentiment was avowed and maintained by every friend of the resolutions throughout the debate.

But, sir, the real intentions and policy of Virginia were proved, not by declarations and speeches merely, but by facts. If there ever was a law odious to a whole people by its daring violation of the fundamental guaranties of public liberty, the freedom of speech and freedom of the press, it was the sedition law to the people of Virginia. Yet, amid all this indignant dissatisfaction, after the solemn protest of the legislature in '98, and the renewal of that protest in '99, this most odious and arbitrary law was peaceably carried into execution in the capital of the State, by the prosecution and punishment of Callender, who was fined and imprisoned for daring to canvass the conduct of our public men, (as Lyon and Cooper had been elsewhere,) and was still actually imprisoned when the Legislature assembled in December, 1800. Notwithstanding the excited sensibility of the public mind, no popular tumult, no legislative interference, disturbed, in any manner, the full and peaceable execution of the law. The Senate will excuse me, I trust, for calling their attention to a most forcible commentary on the true character of the Virginia proceedings of '98 and

'99, (as illustrated in this transaction,) which was contained in the official communication of Mr. Monroe, then Governor of the State, to the Legislature, at its assembling in December, 1800. After referring to the distribution which had been ordered to be made among the people of Mr. Madison's celebrated report of '99, he says: "In connection with this subject, it is proper to add, that, since your last session, the sedition law, one of the acts complained of, has been carried into effect in this commonwealth by the decision of a federal court. I notice this event, not with a view of censuring or criticizing it. The transaction has gone to the world, and the impartial will judge of it as it deserves. I notice it for the purpose of remarking that the decision was executed with the same order and tranquil submission on the part of the people, as could have been shown by them, on a similar occasion, to any the most necessary, constitutional, and popular acts of the Government." "The General Assembly and the good people of this commonwealth have acquitted themselves to their own consciences, and to their brethren in America, in support of a cause which they deem a national one, by the stand which they made, and the sentiments they expressed of these acts of the General Government; but they have looked for a change, in that respect, to a change in the public opinion, which ought to be free, not to measures of violence, discord, and disunion, which they abhor."

It is thus, sir, that the men of '98 and '99 then understood their own proceedings, and that the honored few, who survive, still understand them. Let us now, sir, look at the language of the proceedings themselves, and see if that fairly warrants any other construction. The proceedings of the Legislature of Virginia in '98 consisted of a series of resolutions, eight in number. The third resolution, which is the one that has been most frequently appealed to, asserts the right of the States, as parties to the compact, in cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise by the General Government of powers not granted by the compact, "to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them." The seventh resolution, after expressing the warm attachment of the people of Virginia to the Union and the constitution, proceeds: "The General Assembly doth solemnly appeal to the like dispositions in the other States, in confidence that they will concur with this commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the acts aforesaid" (the alien and sedition acts) "are unconstitutional, and that the necessary and proper measures will be taken by each for co-operating with this State in maintaining unimpaired the authorities, rights, and liberties reserved to the States respectively or to the people." Now, sir, it is a fundamental rule of interpretation, in regard to acts and documents of every description, that, in order to arrive at their true sense and meaning, the whole must be taken together; the parts must be construed in reference to each other. The two resolutions just cited, then, must be considered in connection with each other. The former asserts the right of the States to interpose for maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to the respective States. But in what manner, by what measures, are these rights and liberties of the States to be maintained? The latter of the two resolutions gives the answer: "by necessary and proper measures to be taken by each for co-operating with Virginia in maintaining unimpaired the authorities, rights, and liberties reserved," &c. The measures were to be not only necessary and proper, but such as admitted of co-operation; measures to be "taken by each for co-operating with Virginia in maintaining," &c. This language obviously excludes all measures which have their full and complete effect within the limits of the respective States. Kentucky could not, for example, co-operate with Virginia in an act by which Virginia should nullify a law of the United States within her own limits; because, there, the measure would receive its full and complete effect by the separate and independent action of Virginia. Such measures, therefore, must have been contemplated by the resolutions of Virginia, as, although adopted separately by each of the States in the inception, were yet to have their final effect beyond their respective limits, in being directed to a common object, for the attainment of which the States could co-operate with each other. That object in the case of the alien and sedition acts, was the repeal of the obnoxious laws; and the measures by which it was to be sought were to be legislative protests against their unconstitutionality, instructions to the representatives of the States in Congress, direct remonstrance to Congress, and such other modes of interposition as might be deemed most eligible to bring the public opinions of the States to bear, with united weight, on the councils of the Union.

The important question which has arisen on the Virginia resolutions of '98, is not what modes of redress might be justifiable in extreme cases, and on the principles of natural right, but what measures of State interposition were deemed to be consistent with the constitution itself. Besides the evidence on this point furnished by a proper attention to the resolutions themselves, as just explained, the question is conclusively settled by the subsequent report of '99, which is known to have been drawn by the pen of Mr. Madison, then a member of the Virginia Legislature, as the previous resolutions of '98 were also from him, though he was not then a member of that body. The report, in reviewing that part of the 7th resolution already cited, which refers to the necessary and proper measures to be taken by the States for co-operating with each other in maintaining their rights, specifies the various measures of that sort which are deemed to be "within the limits of the constitution." After insisting that a declaration by a State Legislature of the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress, and an appeal to other States to concur in the declaration, is a measure of State interposition "within the limits of the constitution," the report also mentions, as being of a like character, a direct remonstrance of the Legislatures of the States to Congress, instructions to their respective Senators to propose an explanatory amendment of the constitution, and applications from themselves to Congress for the call of a convention. At the end of this specification, the report adds: "These several means, though not equally eligible in themselves, nor probably to the States, were all constitutionally open for consideration." As the occasion called for a full exposition of the measures of State interposition, deemed to be "within the limits of the constitution," the specification here made must be considered, according to a well-known rule of interpretation, as excluding in the minds of the writer and those who adopted the report, all others not specified from the class of constitutional modes of State interposition. If there be passages in the report, or expressions in the resolutions, then, which seem to contemplate other modes of redress not resolvable into these, they must be considered as referring to those extreme cases of governmental abuse or usurpation, which would justify a resort to original rights, paramount to all constitutions.

Sir, it has been sometimes tauntingly said, that if the Virginia resolutions meant nothing more than to assert a right of interposition on the part of the States, by declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional, and founding thereon appeals to the other States, as well as to the General Government, the able reasoning of Mr. Madison's report was very uselessly expended in maintaining a right which no one would contest. But, sir, this right was formally and explicitly contested by all the States which returned answers to the resolutions of Virginia, with the exception of Kentucky only. Let gentlemen look at the answers given by the Legislatures of Delaware, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, and they will see that this right was boldly denied by them all; that they all contended that the right of pronouncing on the constitutionality of acts of the General Government was exclusively vested in the Federal Judiciary; and that a declaration by a State Legislature, such as Virginia had made, of the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress, was an unwarrantable interference with the constituted authorities of the Union.

Attempts have also been made, sir, to decry this right as utterly idle and worthless in practice. I have already had occasion to remark that the exercise of this right in '98 and '99, by rallying public opinion to the true principles of the constitution, and embodying its expression in imposing organized forms, was found adequate, not only to correct the particular usurpations of the alien and sedition acts, but to produce an entire and fundamental revolution in the administration of the Government. The striking and still progressive changes of public opinion in various quarters of the Union on the subject of the tariff, which I have also had occasion to notice, bear continued testimony to the efficacy of the same constitutional remedies. Sir, in a system like ours, founded on the moral force of public opinion, it is remedies of this sort, I am persuaded, that will be found most effectual; while violent and unconstitutional modes of redress, like that of South Carolina, will ever be attended with danger of reaction, excite prejudice, confirm the obstinacy of power, and raise up new obstacles in the way of relief.

Sir, I would appeal to gentlemen from the South, who profess attachment to the constitutional doctrines which are cherished in that quarter of the Union, and ask when was there ever less occasion to despair of the moral power and ultimate ascendancy of a sound public opinion? When have more triumphs been won for the cause of State rights and of limited constitutional construction, than during the last four years, by the patriotic Chief Magistrate, in whom the public opinion of this country has found a firm and unflinching organ? Has he not, sir, by a courageous exercise of a power which had hitherto almost lain dormant in the constitution, annihilated the earliest encroachment of federal power? Has he not, in like manner, arrested the wasteful torrent of public expenditure for unconstitutional objects? And has he not nobly used, as he is still using, the high influence with which the confidence of his country has invested him, to relieve every portion of that country from the burdens of the unequal and oppressive system of taxation of which we complain? Sir, I refer to these topics with no wish to awaken any unpleasant recollections of past contests here or elsewhere, but simply to remind gentlemen, who come from that portion of the country where the political principles to which I have alluded so generally prevail, of the rapid progress which those principles have made, under the auspices of the present Chief Magistrate, towards a settled ascendancy in the public councils; and to ask them if there ever was less reason for the friends of those principles to distrust the peaceful influence of opinion, and, by flying to extremities, to hazard not only their triumph, but the existence of our institutions themselves?

I will proceed now, Mr. President, to state, very briefly, my ideas of what we are called upon to do, in the present circumstances of the country. If we were to separate without doing something, and something effectual too, to vindicate the despised authority of the laws, the Government and the Union would be thenceforward virtually dissolved. Our oaths to support the constitution—our highest duties to our country (which, having a right to equal laws,

FEBRUARY, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

is entitled also to an equal execution of them) demand, at our hands, proper and effectual provisions for the execution of the laws in question. My plan, then, would be simply this: I would take up this new code of nullification, I would examine it in all its inventions, and apply to every one of its devices an effectual counteraction. Whereas nullification provides that goods held for the payment of duties shall be taken out of the hands of the collector or marshal, under color of a fraudulent process of replevin, designed for the sole purpose of defeating the laws of the United States, I would say, as the bill now under consideration says, on well settled principles of jurisprudence, that goods thus in the custody of the law are irrepleviable, and shall be given up only in obedience to the order or decree of a court of the United States. Nullification, while it subjects officers of the United States to heavy penalties and damages for discharging their duties, provides that all controversies, civil or criminal, which may arise under its ordinance, shall be drawn exclusively to the State Courts, the judges and jurors of which are to be bound by a solemn oath to carry the ordinance into execution, prohibits, under high penalties, appeals from their decisions to the courts of the United States; and forbids, in like manner, the furnishing of any copy of a record to prosecute such an appeal. These provisions also should be effectually counteracted. The judicial power of the United States, which is expressly declared to extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, would, indeed, be a mischievous mockery if it could not be made to reach cases of this description. I would, therefore, declare, as the bill declares, that the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States shall extend to all cases arising under the revenue laws of the United States; that all suits or controversies of that character may be removed, as the third section of the bill provides, from the State to the United States courts on the petition of the defendant; and that if a copy of the record be refused, it may be supplied by other means or secondary evidence. In regard to those clauses of the bill which provide for the removal of the custom-house, as has been significantly and properly said, out of harm's way, and for requiring payment of duties in cash, deducting interest, where it is apprehended that the payment of the bonds would be sought to be prevented, and thus cutting off in their source controversies of a very delicate and dangerous character, they are conceived in a laudable spirit of peace, and I can see no well-founded objection to them. The provisions are in general terms, applying alike to all portions of the country, in case of unlawful obstructions to the collection of the revenue. Whenever and wherever such obstructions shall arise, the law applies its remedy. If, in point of fact, it should, at present, apply to South Carolina only, the fault will be hers, in opposing unlawful obstructions which exist nowhere else, and not that of the law, which is equal and general in its provisions.

FRIDAY, February 15.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

Mr. CALHOUN said, having now corrected some of the prominent misrepresentations as to the nature of this controversy, and given a rapid sketch of the movement of the State in reference to it, he would next proceed to notice some objections connected with the ordinance and the proceedings under it.

The first and most prominent of these is directed against what is called the test oath, which an effort has been made to render odious. So far from deserving the denunciation which had been levelled against it, he viewed this provision of the ordinance as but the natural result of the doctrine entertained by the State, and the position which she occupies. The people of that State believed that the Union is a union of States, and not of individuals; that it was formed by the States; and that the citizens of the several States were bound to it through the acts of their several States; that each State ratified the constitution for itself, and that it was only by such ratification of a State that any obligation was imposed upon the citizens. Thus believing, it was the opinion of the people of Carolina that it belonged to the State which had imposed the obligation to declare, in the last resort, the extent of that obligation, as far as her citizens were concerned; and this, upon the plain principles which exist in all analogous cases of compact between sovereign or political bodies. On this principle, the people of the State, acting in their sovereign capacity in convention, precisely as they had adopted their own and the federal constitutions, had declared, by the ordinance, that the acts of Congress which had imposed duties under the authority to lay imposts, were acts, not for revenue, as intended by the constitution, but for protection, and therefore null and void. The ordinance, thus enacted by the people of the State themselves acting as a sovereign community, was, to all intents and purposes, a part of the constitution of the State; and though of a peculiar character, was as obligatory on the citizens of that State as any portion of the constitution. In prescribing, then, the oath to obey the ordinance, no more was done than to prescribe an oath to obey the constitution. It was, in fact, but a particular oath of allegiance, and in every respect similar to that which is prescribed under the Constitution of the United States to be administered to all officers of the State and Federal Governments; and was no more deserving the harsh and bitter epithets which had been heaped upon it, than that or any similar oath.

It ought to be borne in mind, that, according to the opinion which prevailed in Carolina, the right of resistance to the unconstitutional laws of Congress belongs to the State, and not to her individual citizens; and that, though the latter may, in a mere question of meum and tuum, resist, through the courts, an unconstitutional encroachment upon their rights, yet the final stand against usurpation rests not with them, but with the State of which they are members; and that such act of resistance by a State binds the conscience and allegiance of the citizen. But there appeared to be a general misapprehension as to the extent to which the State had acted under this part of the ordinance. Instead of sweeping every officer, by a general proscription of the minority, as has been represented in debate, as far as the knowledge of Mr. C. extends, not a single individual had been removed. The State had, in fact, acted with the greatest tenderness, all circumstances considered, towards citizens who differed from the majority; and, in that spirit, had directed the oath to be administered only in cases of some official act directed to be performed, in which obedience to the ordinance was involved.

It had been further objected that the State had acted precipitately. What! precipitately! after making a strenuous resistance for twelve years, by discussion here and in the other House of Congress; by essays in all forms; by resolutions, remonstrances, and protests on the part of her Legislature; and, finally, by attempting an appeal to the judicial power of the United States! He said attempting, for they had been prevented from bringing the question fairly before the court, and that by an act of that very majority in Congress which now upbraids them for not making that appeal; of that majority, who, on a motion of one of the members in the other House, from South Carolina, refused to give to the act of 1828 its true title, that it was a protective, and not a revenue act. The State has never, it is true, relied upon that tribunal, the Supreme Court, to vindicate its reserved rights; yet they have always considered it as an auxiliary means of defence, of which they would gladly have availed themselves to test the constitutionality of protection, had they not been deprived of the means of doing so by the act of the majority.

Notwithstanding this long delay of more than ten years, under this continued encroachment of the Government, we now hear it on all sides, by friends and foes, gravely pronounced that the State has acted precipitately—that her conduct has been rash! That such should be the language of an interested majority, who, by means of this unconstitutional and oppressive system, are annually extorting millions from the South to be bestowed upon other sections, was not at all surprising. Whatever impedes the course of avarice and ambition will ever be denounced as rash and precipitate; and had South Carolina delayed her resistance fifty instead of twelve years, she would have heard from the same quarter the same language; but it was really surprising that those who were suffering in common with herself, and who have complained equally loud of their grievances, who had pronounced the very acts which she had asserted within her limits to be oppressive, unconstitutional, and ruinous, after so long a struggle—a struggle longer than that which preceded the separation of these States from the mother country—longer than the period of the Trojan war—should now complain of precipitancy! No, it is not Carolina which has acted precipitately, but her sister States, who have suffered in common with her, that have acted tardily. Had they acted as she has done, had they performed their duty with equal energy and promptness, our situation this day would be very different from what we now find it. Delays are said to be dangerous, and never was the maxim more true than in the present case—a case of monopoly. It is the very nature of monopolies to grow. If we take from one side a large portion of the proceeds of its labor, and give it to the other, the side from which we take must constantly decay, and that to which we give must prosper and increase. Such is the action of the protective system. It exacts from the South a large portion of the proceeds of its industry, which it bestows upon the other sections, in the shape of bounties to manufacturers and appropriations in a thousand forms—pensions, improvement of rivers and harbors, roads and canals, and in every shape that wit or ingenuity can devise. Can we, then, be surprised that the principle of monopoly grows, when it is so amply remunerated at the expense of those who support it! And this is the real reason of the fact which we witness: that all acts for protection pass with small minorities, but soon come to be sustained by great and overwhelming majorities. Those who seek the monopoly endeavor to obtain it in the most exclusive shape; and they take care, accordingly, to associate only a sufficient number of interests barely to pass it through the two Houses of Congress, on the plain principle that the greater the number from whom the monopoly takes, and the fewer on whom it bestows, the greater is the advantage to the monopolists. Acting in this spirit, we have often seen with what exact precision they count, adding wool to wools, associating lead and iron, feeling their way until a bare majority is obtained, when the bill passes, connecting just as many interests as are sufficient to insure its success, and no more. In a short time, however, we have invariably found that this lean becomes a decided majority, under the certain operation which compels individuals to desert the pursuits which the monopoly has rendered unprofitable, that they may participate in those pursuits which it has rendered profitable. It is against this dangerous and growing disease that South Carolina has acted—a disease whose cancerous action would soon spread to every part of the system, had it not been speedily arrested.

The very point at issue between the two parties there was, whether nullification was a peaceful and an efficient remedy against an unconstitutional act of the General Government,

FEBRUARY, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

and which might be asserted as such through the State tribunals? Both parties agree that the acts against which it was directed are unconstitutional and oppressive. The controversy was only as to the means by which our citizens might be protected against the acknowledged encroachments on their rights. This being the point at issue between the parties, and the very object of the majority being an efficient protection of the citizens through the State tribunals, the measures adopted to enforce the ordinance of course received the most decisive character. We were not children; to act by halves. Yet, for acting thus efficiently, the State is denounced, and this bill reported, to overrule, by military force, the civil tribunals and civil process of the State! Sir, (said Mr. C.) I consider this bill, and the arguments which have been urged on this floor in its support, as the most triumphant acknowledgment that nullification is peaceful and efficient, and so deeply entrenched in the principles of our system, that it cannot be assailed but by prostrating the constitution, and substituting the supremacy of military force in lieu of the supremacy of the laws. In fact, the advocates of this bill refute their own argument. They tell us that the ordinance is unconstitutional, that it infracts the constitution of South Carolina; although to him the objection appears absurd, as it was adopted by the very authority which adopted the constitution itself. They also tell us that the Supreme Court is the appointed arbiter of all controversies between a State and the General Government. Why, then, do they not leave this controversy to that tribunal? Why do they not confide to them the abrogation of the ordinance, and the laws made in pursuance of it, and the assertion of that supremacy which they claim for the laws of Congress? The State stands pledged to resist no process of the court. Why, then, confer on the President the extensive and unlimited powers provided in this bill? Why authorize him to use military force to arrest the civil process of the State? But one answer can be given. That, in a contest between the State and the General Government, if the resistance be limited on both sides to the civil process, the State, by its inherent sovereignty, standing upon its reserved powers, will prove too powerful in such a controversy, and must triumph over the Federal Government, sustained by its delegated and limited authority; and, in this answer, we have an acknowledgment of the truth of those great principles for which the State has so firmly and nobly contended.

Having made these remarks, the great question is now presented—has Congress the right to pass this bill?—which he would next proceed to consider. The decision of this question involves the inquiry into the provisions of the bill. What are they? It puts at the disposal of the President the army and navy, and the entire militia of the country. It enables him, at his pleasure, to subject every man in the United States, not exempt from militia duty, to martial law; to call him from his ordinary occupation to the field, and, under the penalty of fine and imprisonment inflicted by a court-martial, to imbrue his hand in his brother's blood. There is no limitation on the power of the sword, and that over the purse is equally without restraint; for, among the extraordinary features of the bill, it contains no appropriation; which, under existing circumstances, is tantamount to an unlimited appropriation. The President may, under its authority, incur any expenditure, and pledge the national faith to meet it. He may create a new national debt, at the very moment of the termination of the former—a debt of millions, to be paid out of the proceeds of the labor of that section of the country whose dearest constitutional rights this bill prostrates!—thus exhibiting the extraordinary spectacle, that the very section of the country which is urging this measure, and carrying the sword of devastation against us, are at the same time incurring a new debt, to be paid by those whose rights are violated; while those who violate them are to receive the benefits, in the shape of bounties and expenditures.

The bill violates the constitution, plainly and palpably, in many of its provisions, by authorizing the President, at his pleasure, to place the different ports of this Union on an unequal footing, contrary to that provision of the constitution which declares that no preference should be given to one port over another. It also violates the constitution by authorizing him, at his discretion, to impose cash duties in one port, while credit is allowed in others; by enabling the President to regulate commerce, a power vested in Congress alone; and by drawing within the jurisdiction of the United States courts powers never intended to be conferred on them. As great as these objections were, they became insignificant in the provisions of a bill which, by a single blow, by treating the States as a mere lawless mass of individuals, prostrates all the barriers of the constitution. He would pass over the minor considerations, and proceed directly to the great point. This bill proceeds on the ground that the entire sovereignty of this country belongs to the American people, as forming one great community; and regards the States as mere fractions or counties, and not as an integral part of the Union, having no more right to resist the encroachments of the Government than a county has to resist the authority of a State; and treating such resistance as the lawless acts of so many individuals, without possessing sovereign or political rights. It has been said that the bill declares war against South Carolina. No; it decrees a massacre of her citizens! War has something ennobling about it, and, with all its horrors, brings into action the highest qualities, intellectual and moral. It was, perhaps, in the order of Providence that it should be permitted for that very purpose. But this bill declares no war, except, indeed, it be that which savages wage—a war not against the community, but the citizens of whom that community is composed. But he regarded it as worse than savage warfare—as an attempt to take away life under the color of law, without the trial by jury, or any other safeguard which the constitution has thrown around the life of the citizen! It authorizes the President, or even his deputies, when they may suppose the law to be violated, without the intervention of a court or jury, to kill without mercy or discrimination!

It was said by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Grundy] to be a measure of peace! Yes, such peace as the wolf gives to the lamb; the kite to the dove. Such peace as Russia gives to Poland; or death to its victim! A peace, by extinguishing the political existence of the State; by awing her into an abandonment of the exercise of every power which constitutes her a sovereign community. It is to South Carolina a question of self-preservation; and I proclaim it, that, should this bill pass, and an attempt be made to enforce it, it will be resisted at every hazard, even that of death itself. Death is not the greatest calamity; there are others still more terrible to the free and brave; and among them may be placed the loss of liberty and honor. There are thousands of her brave sons who, if need be, are prepared cheerfully to lay down their lives in defence of the State, and the great principles of constitutional liberty for which she is contending. God forbid that this should become necessary! It never can be, unless this Government is resolved to bring the question to extremity, when her gallant sons will stand prepared to perform their last duty—to die nobly.

I go (said Mr. C.) on the ground that this constitution was made by the States; that it is a federal union of the States, in which the several States still retain their sovereignty. If these views be correct, he had not characterized the bill too strongly, which presents the question, whether they be or be not. He would not enter into the discussion of that question now. He would rest it for the present on what he had said on the introduction of the resolutions now on the table, under a hope that another opportunity would be afforded for more ample discussion. He would for the present confine his remarks to the objections which had been raised to the views which he had presented when he introduced them. The authority of Luther Martin had been adduced by the Senator from Delaware, to prove that the citizens of a State, acting under the authority of a State, were liable to be punished as traitors by this Government. As eminent as Mr. Martin was as a lawyer, and as high as his authority might be considered on a legal point, he could not accept it in determining the point at issue. The attitude which he occupied, if taken into view, would lessen, if not destroy, the weight of his authority. He had been violently opposed, in convention, to the constitution; and the very letter from which the Senator has quoted was intended to dissuade Maryland from its adoption. With this view, it was to be expected that every consideration calculated to effect that object should be urged; that real objections should be exaggerated; and that those having no foundation except mere plausible deductions, should be presented. It is to this spirit that he attributed the opinion of Mr. Martin, in reference to the point under consideration. But if his authority is good on one point, it must be admitted to be equally so on another. If his opinion be sufficient to prove that a citizen of the State may be punished as a traitor when acting under allegiance to the State, it is also sufficient to show that no authority was intended to be given, in the constitution, for the protection of manufactures by the General Government; and that the provision in the constitution, permitting a State to lay an impost duty with the consent of Congress, was intended to reserve the right of protection to the States themselves, and that each State should protect its own industry. Assuming his opinion to be of equal authority on both points, how embarrassing would be the attitude in which it would place the Senator from Delaware, and those with whom he was acting—that of using the sword and the bayonet to enforce the execution of an unconstitutional act of Congress. He must express his surprise that the slightest authority in favor of power should be received as the most conclusive evidence, while that which is at least equally strong in favor of right and liberty is wholly overlooked or rejected.

But to return to the bill. It is said that the bill ought to pass, because the law must be enforced. The law must be enforced! The imperial edict must be executed. It is under such sophistry, couched in general terms, without looking to the limitations which must ever exist in the practical exercise of power, that the most cruel and despotic acts ever have been covered. It was such sophistry as this that cast Daniel into the lion's den, and the three innocents into the fiery furnace. Under the same sophistry, the bloody edicts of Nero and Caligula were executed. The law must be enforced! Yes, the "tea tax must be executed." This was the very argument which impelled Lord North and his administration in that mad career which forever separated us from the British crown. Under a similar sophistry, "that religion must be protected," how many massacres have been perpetrated! and how many martyrs have been tied to the stake? What! acting on this vague abstraction, are you prepared to enforce a law, without considering whether it be just or unjust, constitutional or unconstitutional? Will you collect money when it is acknowledged that it is not wanted? He who earns the money, who digs it from the earth with the sweat of his brow, has a just title to it against the universe. No one has a right to touch it without his consent except his Government, and it only to the extent of its legitimate wants. To take more is robbery; and you propose by this bill to enforce the robbery by murder. Yes, to this result you must come by this miserable sophistry, this vague abstraction, of enforcing the law without a regard to the fact whether the law be just or unjust, constitutional or unconstitutional.

In the same spirit we are told that the Union must be preserved, without regard to the means. And how is it proposed to preserve the Union? By force! Does any man in his senses believe that this beautiful structure, this harmonious aggregate of States produced by the joint consent of all, can be preserved by force? Its very introduction will be certain destruction of this Federal Union. No, no; you cannot keep the States united in their constitutional and federal bonds by force. Force may, indeed, hold the parts together; but such union would be the bond between master and slave; a union of exaction on one side, and of unqualified obedience on the other. That obedience which we are told by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] is the Union! Yes, exaction on the side of the master; for this very bill is intended to collect what can be no longer called taxes, (the voluntary contribution of a free people,) but tribute, tribute to be collected under the mouths of the cannon! Your custom-house is already transferred to a garrison, and that garrison with its batteries turned, not against the enemy of your country, but on subjects, (I will not say citizens,) on whom you propose to levy contributions. Has reason fled from our borders? Have we ceased to reflect? It is madness to suppose that the Union can be preserved by force. I tell you plainly that the bill, should it pass, cannot be enforced. It will prove only a blot upon your statute book, a reproach to the year, and a disgrace to the American Senate. I repeat that it will not be executed; it will rouse the dormant spirit of the people, and open their eyes to the approach of despotism. The country has sunk into avarice and political corruption, from which nothing could arouse it but some measure, on the part of the Government, of folly and madness, such as that now under consideration.

Disguise it as you may, the controversy is one between power and liberty; and he would tell the gentlemen who are opposed to him, that, strong as might be the love of power on their side, the love of liberty is still stronger on ours. History furnishes many instances of similar struggles, where the love of liberty has prevailed against power, under every disadvantage; and, among them, few more striking than that of our own revolution; where, strong as was the parent country, and feeble as were the colonies, yet, under the impulse of liberty and the blessing of God, they gloriously triumphed in the contest. There were, indeed, many and striking analogies between that and the present controversy;

they both originated substantially in the same cause, with this difference, that, in the present case, the power of taxation is converted into that of regulating industry; in that, the power of regulating industry, by the regulation of commerce, was attempted to be converted into the power of taxation. Were he to trace the analogy further, we would find that the perversion of the taxing power, in one case, has given precisely the same control to the northern section over the industry of the southern section of the Union, which the power to regulate commerce gave to Great Britain over the industry of the colonies; and that the very articles in which the colonies were permitted to have a free trade, and those in which the mother country had a monopoly, are almost identically the same as those under which the Southern States are permitted to have a free trade by the act of 1832, and of which the Northern States have, by the same act, secured a monopoly; the only difference is in the means. In the former, the colonies were permitted to have free trade with all countries south of Cape Finisterre, a cape in the northern part of Spain; while north of that the trade of the colonies was prohibited, except through the mother country, by means of her commercial regulations. If we compare the products of the country north and south of Cape Finisterre, we will find them almost identical with the list of the protected and unprotected articles contained in the act of last year. Nor does the analogy terminate here. The very arguments resorted to at the commencement of the American revolution, and the measures adopted, and the motives assigned to bring on that contest, (to enforce the law,) are almost identically the same.

Mr. C. said that, in reviewing the ground over which he had passed, it would be apparent that the question in controversy involved that most deeply important of all political questions, whether ours was a federal or a consolidated government—a question on the decision of which depends, as he solemnly believed, the liberty of the people, their happiness, and the place which we are destined to hold in the moral and intellectual scale of nations. Never was there a controversy in which more important consequences were involved, not excepting that between Persia and Greece, decided by the battles of Marathon, Platea, and Salamis, which gave ascendancy to the genius of Europe over that of Asia, and which, in its consequences, has continued to affect the destiny of so large a portion of the world, even to this day. There is, (said Mr. C.,) often close analogies between events apparently very remote, which is strikingly illustrated in this case. In the great contest between Greece and Persia, between European and Asiatic polity and civilization, the very questions between the federal and consolidated form of government was involved. The Asiatic Governments, from the remotest time, with some exceptions on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, have been based on the principle of consolidation, which considers the whole community as but a unit; and consolidates its powers in a central point. The opposite principle has prevailed in Europe Greece, throughout all her States, was based on a federal system. All were united in one common but loose bond, and the Governments of the several States partook, for the most part, of a complex organization, which distributed political power among different members of the community. The same principles prevailed in ancient Italy; and, if we turn to the Teutonic race, our great ancestors, the race which occupies the first place in power, civilization, and science, and which possess the largest and the fairest part of Europe, we will find that their Governments were based on the federal organization, as has been clearly illustrated by a recent and able writer on the British constitution, (Mr. Palgrave,) from whose writings he introduced the following extract:

"In this manner the first establishment of the Teutonic States was effected. They were assemblages of sects, clans, and tribes; they were confederated hosts and armies, led on by princes, magistrates, and chieftains, each of whom was originally independent, and each of whom lost a portion of his pristine independence in proportion as he and his compeers became united under the supremacy of a sovereign, who was superinduced upon the State first as a military commander, and afterwards as a king. Yet, notwithstanding this political connection, each member of the State continued to retain a considerable portion of the rights of sovereignty. Every ancient Teutonic monarchy must be considered as a federation; it is not a unit, of which the smaller bodies politic therein contained are the fractions, but they are the integers, and the State is the multiple which results from them. Dukedoms and counties, burghs and baronies, towns and townships, and shires, form the kingdom—all, in a certain degree, strangers to each other, and separate in jurisdiction, though all obedient to the supreme executive authority. This general description, though not always strictly applicable in terms, is always so substantially and in effect; and hence it becomes necessary to discard the language which has been very generally employed in treating on the English constitution. It has been supposed that the kingdom was reduced into a regular and gradual subordination of government, and that the various legal districts of which it is composed arose from the divisions and subdivisions of the country. But this hypothesis, which tends greatly to perplex our history, cannot be supported by fact; and instead of viewing the constitution as a whole, and then proceeding to its parts, we must examine it synthetically, and assume that the supreme authorities of the State were created by the concentration of the powers originally belonging to the members and corporations of which it is composed."

He had stated, also, in his remarks on this point, that there was a striking analogy between this and the great struggle between Persia and Greece, which had been decided by the battles of Marathon, Plataea, and Salamis, and which had immortalized the names of Miltiades and Themistocles. He had illustrated this analogy, by showing that centralism, or consolidation, with the exception of a few nations along the eastern border of the Mediterranean, had been the pervading principle in the Asiatic Governments; while the federal principle, or, what is the same in principle, that system which organizes a community in reference to its parts, had prevailed in Europe.

Among the few exceptions in the Asiatic nations, the Government of the twelve tribes of Israel, in its early period, was the most striking. Their Government, at first, was a mere confederation, without any central power, till a military chieftain, with the title of King, was placed at its head, without, however, merging the original organization of the twelve distinct tribes. This was the commencement of that central action among that peculiar people, which, in three generations, terminated in a permanent division of their tribes. It is impossible even for a careless reader to peruse the history of that event without being forcibly struck with the analogy in the causes which led to their separation and those which now threaten us with a similar calamity. With the establishment of the central power in the King commenced a system of taxation, which, under King Solomon, was greatly increased, to defray the expense of rearing the temple, of enlarging and embellishing Jerusalem, the seat of the central Government, and the other profuse expenditures of his magnificent reign. Increased taxation was followed by its natural consequences—discontent and complaint, which before his death began to excite resistance. On the succession of his son, Rehoboam, the ten tribes, headed by Jeroboam, demanded a reduction of the taxes; the temple being finished, and the embellishment of Jerusalem completed, and the money which had been raised for that purpose being no longer required; or, in other words, the debt being paid, they demanded a reduction of the duties—a repeal of the tariff. The demand was taken under consideration, and, after consulting the old men, (the counsellors of '98,) who advised a reduction, he then took the opinion of the younger politicians, who had since grown up, and knew not the doctrines of their fathers. He hearkened unto their counsel, and refused to make the reduction; and the secession of the ten tribes, under Jeroboam, followed. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which had received the disbursements, alone remained to the house of David.

But to return to the point immediately under consideration. He knew that it was not only the opinion of a large majority of our country, but it might be said to be the opinion of the age, that the very beau idéal of a perfect Government was the Government of a majority, acting through a representative body, without check or limitation in its power; yet if we may test this theory by experience and reason, we will find that, so far from being perfect, the necessary tendency of all Governments based upon the will of an absolute majority, without constitutional check or limitation of power, is to faction, corruption, anarchy, and despotism; and this whether the will of the majority be expressed directly through an assembly of the people themselves, or by their representatives. I know (said Mr. C.) that in venturing this assertion I utter that which is unpopular, both within and without these walls; but, where truth and liberty are concerned, such considerations should not be regarded. He would place the decision of this point on the fact, that no Government of the kind, among the many attempts which had been made, had ever endured for a single generation; but, on the contrary, had invariably experienced the fate which he had assigned to them. Let a single instance be pointed out and he would surrender his opinion. But, if we had not the aid of experience to direct our judgment, reason itself would be a certain guide. The view which considers the community as a unit, and all its parts as having a similar interest, is radically erroneous. However small the community may be, and however homogeneous its interests, the moment that Government is put into operation, as soon as it begins to collect taxes, and to make appropriations, the different portions of the community must, of necessity, bear different and opposing relations in reference to the action of the Government. There must inevitably spring up two interests—a direction and a stockholder interest; an interest profiting by the action of the Government, and interested in increasing its powers and action; and another at whose expense the political machine is kept in motion. He knew how difficult it was to communicate distinct ideas on such a subject, through the medium of general propositions, without particular illustration; and, in order that he might be distinctly understood, though at the hazard of being tedious, he would illustrate the important principle which he had ventured to advance by examples.

Let us, then, suppose a small community of five persons, separated from the rest of the world; and, to make the example strong, let us suppose them all to be engaged in the same pursuit, and to be of equal wealth. Let us further suppose that they determine to govern the community by the will of a majority; and, to make the case as strong as possible, let us suppose that the majority, in order to meet the expenses of the Government, lay an equal tax, say of one hundred dollars, on each individual of this little community. Their treasury would contain five hundred dollars. Three are a majority; and they, by supposition, have contributed three hundred as their portion, and the other two, (the minority,) two hundred. The three have the right to make the appropriations as they may think proper. The question is, how would the principle of the absolute and unchecked majority operate, under these circumstances, in this little community? If the three be governed by a sense of justice; if they should appropriate the money to the objects for which it was raised, the common and equal benefit of the five, then the object of the association would be fairly and honestly effected, and each would have a common interest in the Government. But, should the majority pursue an opposite course, should they appropriate the money in a manner to benefit their own particular interests without regard to the interest of the two; (and that they will so act, unless there be some efficient check, he who best knows human nature will least doubt,) who does not see that the three and the two would have directly opposite interests, in reference to the action of the Government? The three, who contribute to the common treasury but three hundred dollars, could, in fact, by appropriating the five hundred to their own use, convert the action of the Government into the means of making money; and, of consequence, would have a direct interest in increasing the taxes. They put in three hundred, and take out five; that is, they take back to themselves all that they had put in; and, in addition, that which was put in by their associates; or, in other words, taking taxation and appropriation together, they have gained, and their associates have lost, two hundred dollars by the fiscal action of the Government. An opposite interest, in reference to the action of the Government, is thus created between them; the one having an interest in favor and the other against the taxes; the one to increase, and the other to decrease the taxes; the one to retain the taxes when the money is no longer wanted, and the other to repeal them when the objects for which they were levied have been executed.

Let us now suppose this community of five to be raised to twenty-four individuals, to be governed in like manner by the will of a majority. It is obvious that the same principle would divide them into two interests; into a majority and a minority, thirteen against eleven, or in some other proportion; and that all the consequences which he had shown to be applicable to the small community of five, would be equally applicable to the greater; the cause not depending upon the number, but resulting necessarily from the action of the Government itself. Let us now suppose that, instead of governing themselves directly in an assembly of the whole, without the intervention of agents, they should adopt the representative principle; and that, instead of being governed by a majority of themselves, they should be governed by a majority of their representatives. It is obvious that the operation of the system would not be affected by the change; the representatives, being responsible to those who choose them, would conform to the will of their constituents, and would act as they would do were they present and acting for themselves; and the same conflict of interest which we have shown would exist in one case would equally exist in the other. In either case, the inevitable result would be a system of hostile legislation on the part of the majority, or the stronger interest, against the minority, or the weaker interest; the object of which, on the part of the former, would be to exact as much as possible from the latter, which would necessarily be resisted by all the means in their power. Warfare, by legislation, would thus be commenced between the parties, with the same object, and not less hostile, than that which is carried on between distinct and rival nations; the only distinction would be in the instruments and the mode. Enactments, in the one case, would supply what could only be effected by arms in the other; and the inevitable operation would be to engender the most hostile feelings between the parties, which would immerse every feeling of patriotism—that feeling which embraces the whole—and substitute in its place the most violent party attachment; and, instead of having one common centre of attachment, around which the affections of the community might rally, there would, in fact, be two; the interests of the majority, to which those who constitute that majority would be more attached than they would be to the whole, and that of the minority, to which they in like manner would also be more attached than to the interests of the whole. Faction would thus take the place of patriotism; and, with the loss of patriotism, corruption must necessarily follow; and, in its train, anarchy; and, finally, despotism, or the establishment of absolute power in a single individual, as a means of arresting the conflict of hostile interests; on the principle that it is better to submit to the will of a single individual, who, by being made lord and master of the whole community, would have an equal interest in the protection of all the parts.

Let us next suppose that, in order to avert the calamitous train of consequences, this little community should adopt a written constitution, with limitations restricting the will of the majority, in order to protect the minority against the oppressions which he had shown would necessarily result without such restrictions. It is obvious that the case would not be in the slightest degree varied, if the majority be left in possession of the right of judging exclusively of the extent of its powers, without any right on the part of the minority to enforce the restrictions imposed by the constitution on the will of the majority. The point is almost too clear for illustration. Nothing can be more certain than that when a constitution grants power, and imposes limitations on the exercise of that power, whatever interests may obtain possession of the Government will be in favor of extending the power at the expense of the limitation; and that, unless those in whose behalf the limitations were imposed have, in some form or mode, the right of enforcing them, the power will ultimately supersede the limitation, and the Government must operate precisely in the same manner as if the will of the majority governed without constitution or limitation of power.

He had thus presented all possible modes in which a Government bound upon the will of an absolute majority would be modified; and had demonstrated that, in all its forms, whether in a majority of the people, as in a mere democracy, or in a majority of their representatives, without a constitution, or with a constitution, to be interpreted as the will of the majority, the result would be the same—two hostile interests would inevitably be created by the action of the Government, to be followed by hostile legislation, and that by faction, corruption, anarchy, and despotism.

The great and solemn question here presented itself: Is there any remedy for these evils? on the decision of which depends the question, whether the people can govern themselves! which has been so often asked, with so much scepticism and doubt. There is a remedy, and but one, the effects of which, whatever may be the form, is to organize society in reference to this conflict of interests, which springs out of the action of Government; and which can only be done by giving to each part the right of self-protection; which, in a word, instead of considering the community of twenty-four as a single community, having a common interest, and to be governed by the single will of an entire majority, shall, upon all questions tending to bring the parts into conflict, the thirteen against the eleven, take the will, not of the twenty-four as a unit, but that of the thirteen and that of the eleven separately, the majority of each governing the parts; and, where they concur, governing the whole; and where they disagree, arresting the action of the Government. This he would call the concurring, as distinct from the absolute majority. It would not be, as was generally supposed, a minority governing a majority. In either way the number would be the same, whether taken as the absolute, or as the concurring majority. Thus, the majority of the thirteen is seven, and of the eleven six, and the two together make thirteen, which is the majority of twenty-four. But though the number is the same, the mode of counting is essentially different; the one representing the stronger interest, and the other the weaker interest of the community. The first mistake was, in supposing that the Government of the absolute majority is the Government of this people; that beau idéal of a perfect Government, which had been so enthusiastically entertained in every age, by the generous and patriotic, where civilization and liberty had made the smallest progress. There could be no greater error; the Government of the people is the Government of the whole community; of the twenty-four; the self-government of all the parts; too perfect to be reduced to practice in the present, or any past stage of human society. The Government of the absolute majority, instead of the Government of the people, is but the Government of the strongest interests; and when not efficiently checked, is the most tyrannical and oppressive that can be devised. Between this ideal perfection on one side, and despotism on the other, none other can be devised but that which considers society, in reference to its parts, as differently affected by the action of the Government, and which takes the sense of each part separately, and thereby the sense of the whole in the manner already illustrated.

Against the view of our system which he had presented, and the right of the State to interpose, it was objected that it would lead to anarchy and dissolution. He considered the objection as without the slightest foundation; and that, so far from tending to weakness or disunion, it was the source of the highest power and of the strongest cement. Nor was its tendency in this respect difficult of explanation. The Government of an absolute majority, unchecked by efficient constitutional restraint, though apparently strong, was in reality an exceedingly feeble Government. That tendency to conflict between the parts, which he had shown to be inevitable in such Governments, wasted the powers of the State in the hostile action of contending factions, which left very little more power than the excess of the strength of the majority over the minority. But a Government based upon the principle of the concurring majority, where each great interest possessed within itself the means of self-protection, which ultimately requires the mutual consent of all the parts, necessarily causes that unanimity in counsel, and ardent attachment of all the parts to the whole, which gives an irresistible energy to a Government so constituted.

He might appeal to history for the truth of these remarks, of which the Roman furnished the most familiar and striking. It was a well known fact, that, from the expulsion of the Tarquins to the time of the establishment of the tribunarian power, the Government fell into a state of the greatest disorder and distraction, and, he might add, corruption. How did this happen? The explanation will throw important light on the subject under consideration. The community was divided into two parts, the patricians and the plebeians, with the powers of the State principally in the hands of the former, without adequate check to protect the rights of the latter. The result was as might be expected. The patricians converted the powers of the Government into the means of making money, to enrich themselves and their dependants. They, in a word, had their American system, growing out of the peculiar character of the Government and condition of the country. This requires explanation. At that period, according to the laws of nations, when one nation conquered another, the lands of the vanquished belonged to the victors; and, according to the Roman law, the lands thus acquired were divided into parts, one allotted to the poorer class of the people, and the other assigned to the use of the treasury, of which the patricians had the distribution and administration. The patricians abused their power, by withholding from the people that which ought to have been allotted to them, and by converting to their own use that which ought to have gone to the treasury. In a word, they took to themselves the entire spoils of victory, and they had thus the most powerful motive to keep the State perpetually involved in war, to the utter impoverishment and oppression of the people. After resisting the abuse of power by all peaceable means, and the oppression becoming intolerable, the people at last withdrew from the city; they, in a word, seceded; and, to induce them to reunite, the patricians conceded to the plebeians, as the means of protecting their separate interests, the very power which he contended is necessary to protect the rights of the States, but which is now represented as necessarily leading to disunion. They granted to the people the right of choosing three tribunes from among themselves, whose persons should be sacred, and who should have the right of interposing their veto, not only against the passage of laws, but even against their execution; a power which those who take a shallow insight into human nature would pronounce inconsistent with the strength and unity of the State, if not utterly impracticable. Yet, so far from that being the effect, from that day the Genius of Rome became ascendant, and victory followed her steps till she had established an almost universal dominion.

But to return to the General Government. We have now sufficient experience to ascertain that the tendency to conflict in its action is between southern and other sections. The latter, having a decided majority, must habitually be possessed of the powers of the Government, both in this and in the other House; and, being governed by that instinctive love of power so natural to the human breast, they must become the advocates of the power of Government, and in the same degree opposed to the limitations; while the other and weaker section is as necessarily thrown on the side of the limitations. In one word, the one section is the natural guardian of the delegated powers, and the other of the reserved; and the struggle on the side of the former will be to enlarge the powers, while that on the opposite side will be to restrain them within their constitutional limits. The contest will, in fact, be a contest between power and liberty, and such he considered the present; a contest in which the weaker section, with its peculiar labor, productions, and situation, has at stake all that can be dear to free-men. Should they be able to maintain in their full vigor their reserved rights, liberty and prosperity will be their portion; but if they yield, and permit the stronger interest to consolidate within itself all the powers of the Government, then will its fate be more wretched than that of the aborigines whom they have expelled—or of their slaves. In this great struggle between the delegated and reserved powers, so far from repining that his lot and that of those whom he represented is cast on the side of the latter, he rejoiced that such is the fact; for though we participate in but few of the advantages of the Government, we are compensated, and more than compensated, in not being so much exposed to its corruption. Nor did he repine that the duty, so difficult to be discharged, as the defence of the reserved powers against, apparently, such fearful odds, had been assigned to them. To discharge successfully this high duty requires the highest qualities, moral and intellectual; and, should we perform it with a zeal and ability in proportion to its magnitude, instead of being mere planters, our section will become distinguished for its patriots and statesmen. But, on the other hand, if we prove unworthy of this high destiny, if we yield to the steady encroachment of power, the severest and most debasing calamity and corruption will overspread the land. Every Southern man, true to the interests of his section, and faithful to the duties which Providence has allotted him, will be forever excluded from the honors and emoluments of this Government, which will be reserved for those only who have qualified themselves, by political prostitution, for admission into the Magdalen Asylum.

SATURDAY, February 16.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of this bill,

Mr. WEBSTER said: The gentleman from South Carolina has admonished us to be mindful of the opinions of those who shall come after us. We must take our chance, sir, as to the light in which posterity will regard us. I do not decline its judgment, nor withhold myself from its scrutiny. Feeling that I am performing my public duty with singleness of heart, and to the best of my ability, I fearlessly trust myself to the country, now and hereafter, and leave both my motives and my character to its decision.

The gentleman has terminated his speech in a tone of threat and defiance towards this bill, even should it become a law of the land, altogether unusual in the halls of Congress. But I shall not suffer myself to be excited into warmth by his denunciation of the measure which I support. Among the feelings which at this moment fill my breast, not the least is that of regret at the position in which the gentleman has placed himself. Sir, he does himself no justice. The cause which he has espoused finds no basis in the constitution; no succor from public sympathy; no cheering from a patriotic community. He has no foothold on which to stand, while he might display the powers of his acknowledged talents. Every thing beneath his feet is hollow and treacherous. He is like a strong man struggling in a morass; every effort to extricate himself only sinks him deeper and deeper. And I fear the resemblance may be carried still further; I fear that no friend can safely come to his relief, that no one can approach near enough to hold out a helping hand, without danger of going down himself, also, into the bottomless depths of this Serbonian bog.

The honorable gentleman has declared that on the decision of the question now in debate may depend the cause of liberty itself. I am of the same opinion; but then, sir, the liberty which I think is staked on the contest is not political liberty, in any general and undefined character, but our own, well understood, and long enjoyed American liberty.

Sir, I love liberty no less ardently than the gentleman, in whatever form she may have appeared in the progress of human history. As exhibited in the master states of antiquity, as breaking out again from amidst the darkness of the middle ages, and beaming on the formation of new communities in modern Europe, she has always and everywhere charms for me. Yet, sir, it is our own liberty, guarded by constitutions and secured by union; it is that liberty which is our paternal inheritance, it is our established, dear-bought, peculiar American liberty, to which I am chiefly devoted, and the cause of which I now mean, to the utmost of my power, to maintain and defend.

Mr. President, if I considered the constitutional question now before us as doubtful as it is important, and if I supposed that this decision, either in the Senate or by the country, was likely to be in any degree influenced by the manner in which I might now discuss it, this would be to me a moment of deep solicitude. Such a moment has once existed. There has been a time, when, rising in this place, on the same question, I felt, I must confess, that something for good or evil to the constitution of the country might depend on an effort of mine. But circumstances are changed. Since that day, sir, the public opinion has become awakened to this great question; it has grasped it, it has reasoned upon it, as becomes an intelligent and patriotic community; and has settled it, or now seems in the progress of settling it, by an authority which none can disobey—the authority of the people themselves.

I shall not, Mr. President, follow the gentleman, step by step, through the course of his speech. Much of what he has said he has deemed necessary to the just explanation and defence of his own political character and conduct. On this I shall offer no comment. Much, too, has consisted of philosophical remark upon the general nature of political liberty and the history of free institutions; and of other topics, so general in their nature, as to possess, in my opinion, only a remote bearing on the immediate subject of this debate.

But the gentleman's speech made some days ago, upon introducing his resolutions, those resolutions themselves, and parts of the speech now just concluded, may probably be justly regarded as comprising the whole South Carolina doctrine. That doctrine it is my purpose

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

now to examine, and to compare it with the Constitution of the United States. I shall not consent, sir, to make any new constitution, or to establish another form of government. I will not undertake to say what a constitution for these United States ought to be. That question the people have decided for themselves; and I shall take the instrument as they have established it, and shall endeavor to maintain it, in its plain sense and meaning, against opinions and notions which, in my judgment, threaten its subversion.

The resolutions introduced by the gentleman were apparently drawn up with care, and brought forward upon deliberation. I shall not be in danger, therefore, of misunderstanding him, or those who agree with him, if I proceed at once to these resolutions, and consider them as an authentic statement of those opinions, upon the great constitutional question, by which the recent proceedings in South Carolina are attempted to be justified.

These resolutions are three in number.

The third seems intended to enumerate, and to deny, the several opinions expressed in the President's proclamation, respecting the nature and powers of this Government. Of this third resolution, I propose at present to take no particular notice.

The first two resolutions of the honorable member affirm these propositions, viz.:

1. That the political system under which we live, and under which Congress is now assembled, is a compact, to which the people of the several States, as separate and sovereign communities, are the parties.

2. That these sovereign parties have a right to judge, each for itself, of any alleged violation of the constitution by Congress; and, in case of such violation, to choose, each for itself, its own mode and measure of redress.

The first resolution declares that the people of the several States "acceded" to the constitution, or to the constitutional compact, as it is called. This word "accede," not found either in the constitution itself, or in the ratification of it by any one of the States, has been chosen for use here, doubtless not without a well considered purpose.

The natural converse of accession is secession; and, therefore, when it is stated that the people of the States acceded to the Union, it may be more plausibly argued that they may secede from it. If, in adopting the constitution, nothing was done but acceding to a compact, nothing would seem necessary, in order to break it up, but to secede from the same compact. But the term is wholly out of place. Accession, as a word applied to political associations, implies coming into a league, treaty, or confederacy, by one hitherto a stranger to it; and secession implies departing from such league or confederacy. The people of the United States have used no such form of expression in establishing the present Government. They do not say that they accede to a league, but they declare that they ordain and establish a constitution. Such are the very words of the instrument itself; and in all the States, without an exception, the language used by their conventions was, that they "ratified the constitution;" some of them employing the additional words "assented to" and "adopted," but all of them "ratifying." There is more importance than may at first sight appear in the introduction of this new word by the honorable mover of these resolutions. Its adoption and use are indispensable to maintain those premises from which his main conclusion is to be afterwards drawn.

If, Mr. President, in drawing these resolutions, the honorable member had confined himself to the use of constitutional language, there would have been a wide and awful hiatus between his premises and his conclusions. Leaving out the words "compact" and "accession," which are not constitutional modes of expression, and stating the matter precisely as the truth is, his first resolution would have affirmed that the people of the several States ratified this constitution or form of government. These are the very words of South Carolina herself in her own act of ratification. Let, then, his first resolution tell the exact truth; let it state the fact precisely as it exists; let it say that the people of the several States ratified a constitution, or form of government; and then, sir, what will become of his inference in his second resolution, which is in these words, viz.: "That, as in all other cases of compact among sovereign parties, each has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of the infraction as of the mode and measure of redress?" It is obvious, is it not, sir? that this conclusion requires for its support quite other premises; it requires premises which speak of accession and of compact between sovereign powers, and, without such premises, it is altogether unmeaning.

The necessary import of the resolutions, therefore, is, that the United States are connected only by a league; that it is in the good pleasure of every State to decide how long she will choose to remain a member of this league; that any State may determine the extent of her own obligations under it, and accept or reject what shall be decided by the whole; that she may also determine whether her rights have been violated, what is the extent of the injury done her, and what mode and measure of redress her wrongs may make it fit and expedient for her to adopt. The result of the whole is, that any State may secede at pleasure; that any State may resist a law which she herself may choose to say exceeds the power of Congress; and that, as a sovereign power, she may redress her own grievances by her own arm, at her own discretion; she may make reprisals; she may cruise against the property of other members of the league; she may authorize captures, and make open war.

If, sir, this be our political condition, it is time the people of the United States understood it. Let us look for a moment to the practical consequences of these opinions. One State, holding an embargo law unconstitutional, may declare her opinion, and withdraw from the Union. She secedes. Another, forming and expressing the same judgment on a law laying duties on imports, may withdraw also. She secedes. And as, in her opinion, money has been taken out of the pockets of her citizens illegally, under pretence of this law, and as she has power to redress their wrongs, she may demand satisfaction; and, if refused, she may take it with a strong hand. The gentleman has himself pronounced the collection of duties, under existing laws, to be nothing but robbery. Robbers, of course, may be rightfully dispossessed of the fruits of their flagitious crimes; and, therefore, reprisals, impositions on the commerce of other States, foreign alliances against them, or open war, are all modes of redress justly open to the discretion and choice of South Carolina; for she is to judge of her own rights, and to seek satisfaction for her own wrongs, in her own way.

But, sir, a third State is of opinion, not only that these laws of impost are constitutional, but that it is the absolute duty of Congress to pass and to maintain such laws; and that, by omitting to pass and maintain them, its constitutional obligations would be grossly disregarded. She relinquished the power of protection, she might allege, and allege truly, herself, and gave it up to Congress, on the faith that Congress would exercise it. If Congress now refuse to exercise it, Congress does, as she may insist, break the condition of the grant, and thus manifestly violate the constitution; and for this violation of the constitution, she may threaten to secede also. Virginia may secede, and hold the fortresses in the Chesapeake. The Western States may secede, and take to their own use the public lands. Louisiana may secede, if she choose, form a foreign alliance, and hold the mouth of the Mississippi. If one State may secede, ten may do so—twenty may do so—twenty-three may do so. Sir, as these secessions go on, one after another, what is to constitute the United States? Whose will be the army? Whose the navy? Who will pay the debts? Who fulfil the public treaties? Who perform the constitutional guaranties? Who govern this District and the Territories? Who retain the public property?

Mr. President, every man must see that these are all questions which can arise only after a revolution. They presuppose the breaking up of the Government. While the constitution lasts, they are repressed; they spring up to annoy and startle us only from its grave.

The constitution does not provide for events which must be preceded by its own destruction. Secession, therefore, since it must bring these consequences with it, is revolutionary. And nullification is equally revolutionary. What is revolution? Why, sir, that is revolution which overturns, or controls, or successfully resists the existing public authority; that which arrests the exercise of the supreme power; that which introduces a new paramount authority into the rule of the State. Now, sir, this is the precise object of nullification. It attempts to supersede the supreme legislative authority. It arrests the arm of the Executive Magistrate. It interrupts the exercise of the accustomed judicial power. Under the name of an ordinance, it declares null and void, within the State, all the revenue laws of the United States. Is not this revolutionary? Sir, so soon as this ordinance shall be carried into effect, a revolution will have commenced in South Carolina. She will have thrown off the authority to which her citizens have heretofore been subject. She will have declared her own opinions and her own will to be above the laws, and above the power of those who are intrusted with their administration. If she makes good these declarations, she is revolutionized. As to her, it is as distinctly a change of the supreme power as the American revolution of 1776. That revolution did not subvert Government in all its forms. It did not subvert local laws and municipal administrations. It only threw off the dominion of a power claiming to be superior, and to have a right, in many important respects, to exercise legislative authority. Thinking this authority to have been usurped or abused, the American colonies, now the United States, bade it defiance, and freed themselves from it by means of a revolution. But that revolution left them with their own municipal laws still, and the forms of local government. If Carolina now shall effectually resist the laws of Congress, if she shall be her own judge, take her remedy into her own hands, obey the laws of the Union when she pleases, and disobey them when she pleases, she will relieve herself from a paramount power as distinctly as did the American colonies in 1776. In other words, she will achieve, as to herself, a revolution.

Such are the inevitable results of this doctrine. Beginning with the original error, that the constitution of the United States is nothing but a compact between sovereign States; asserting, in the next step, that each State has a right to be its own sole judge of the extent of its own obligations, and, consequently, of the constitutionality of laws of Congress; and, in the next, that it may oppose whatever it sees fit to declare unconstitutional, and that it decides for itself on the mode and measure of redress, the argument arrives at once at the conclusion that what a State dissents from, it may nullify; what it opposes, it may oppose by force; what it decides for itself, it may execute by its own power; and that, in short, it is, itself, supreme over the legislation of Congress, and supreme over the decisions of the national judicature; supreme over the constitution of the country, supreme over the supreme law of the land. However it seeks to protect itself against these plain inferences, by saying that an unconstitutional law is no law, and that it only opposes such laws as are unconstitutional, yet this does not, in the slightest degree, vary the result; since it insists on deciding this question for itself; and, in opposition to reason and argument, in opposition to practice and experience, in opposition to the judgment of others, having an equal right to judge, it says, only, "Such is my opinion, and my opinion shall be my law, and I will support it by my own strong hand. I denounce the law; I declare it unconstitutional; that is enough; it shall not be executed. Men in arms are ready to resist its execution. An attempt to enforce it shall cover the land with blood. Elsewhere, it may be binding; but here, it is trampled under foot."

This, sir, is practical nullification.

And now, sir, against all these theories and opinions, I maintain—

1. That the constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact, between the people of the several States in their sovereign capacities; but a Government proper, founded on the adoption of the people, and creating direct relations between itself and individuals.

2. That no State authority has power to dissolve these relations; that nothing can dissolve them but revolution; and that, consequently, there can be no such thing as secession without revolution.

3. That there is a supreme law, consisting of the Constitution of the United States, acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and treaties; and that, in cases not capable of assuming the character of a suit in law or equity, Congress must judge of, and finally interpret, this supreme law, so often as it has occasion to pass acts of legislation; and, in cases capable of assuming, and actually assuming, the character of a suit, the Supreme Court of the United States is the final interpreter.

4. That an attempt by a State to abrogate, annul, or nullify an act of Congress, or to arrest its operation within her limits, on the ground that, in her opinion, such law is unconstitutional, is a direct usurpation on the just powers of the General Government, and on the equal rights of other States; a plain violation of the constitution, and a proceeding essentially revolutionary in its character and tendency.

Whether the constitution be a compact between States in their sovereign capacities, is a question which must be mainly argued from what is contained in the instrument itself. We all agree that it is an instrument which has been, in some way, clothed with power. We all admit that it speaks with authority. The first question then is, what does it say of itself? What does it purport to be? Does it style itself a league, confederacy, or compact between sovereign States? It is to be remembered, sir, that the constitution began to speak only after its adoption. Until it was ratified by nine States, it was but a proposal, the mere draught of an instrument. It was like a deed, drawn, but not executed. The convention had framed it; sent it to Congress, then sitting under the confederation; Congress had transmitted it to the State Legislatures; and by these last it was laid before conventions of the people in the several States. All this while it was inoperative paper. It had received no stamp of authority, no sanction; it spoke no language. But when ratified by the people in their respective conventions, then it had a voice, and spoke authentically. Every word in it had then received the sanction of the popular will, and was to be received as the expression of that will. What the constitution says of itself, therefore, is as conclusive as what it says on any other point. Does it call itself a compact? Certainly not. It uses the word "compact" but once, and that is when it declares that the States shall enter into no compact. Does it call itself a league, a confederacy, a subsisting treaty between the States? Certainly not. There is not a particle of such language in all its pages. But it declares itself a constitution. What is a constitution? Certainly not a league, compact, or confederacy, but a fundamental law. The fundamental regulation which determines the manner in which the public authority is to be executed, is what forms the constitution of a State. Those primary rules which concern the body itself, and the very being of the political society, the form of Government, and the manner in which power is to be exercised; all, in a word, which form together the constitution of a State—these are the fundamental laws. This, sir, is the language of the public writers. But do we need to be informed, in this country, what a constitution is? Is it not an idea perfectly familiar, definite, and well settled? We are at no loss to understand what is meant by the constitution of one of the States; and the constitution of the United States speaks of itself as being an instrument of the same nature. It says, this constitution shall be the law of the land, any thing in any State constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. And it speaks of itself, too, in plain contradistinction from a confederation; for it says that all debts contracted, and all engagements entered into by the United States, shall be as valid under this constitution as under the confederation. It does not say as valid under this compact, or this league, or this confederation, as under the former confederation; but as valid under this constitution.

There is no language in the whole constitution applicable to a confederation of States. If the States be parties, as States, what are their rights, and what their respective covenants and stipulations? And where are their rights, covenants, and stipulations expressed? The States engage for nothing, they promise nothing. In the articles of confederation they did make promises, and did enter into engagements, and did plight the faith of each State for their fulfilment; but in the constitution there is nothing of that kind. The reason is, that in the constitution it is the people who speak, and not the States. The people ordain the constitution, and therein address themselves to the States, and to the Legislatures of the States, in the language of injunction and prohibition. The constitution utters its behests in the name and by the authority of the people, and it exacts not from States any plighted public faith to maintain it. On the contrary, it makes its own preservation depend on individual duty and individual obligation. Sir, the States cannot omit to appoint Senators and Electors. It is not a matter resting in State discretion or State pleasure. The constitution has taken better care of its own preservation. It lays its hand on individual conscience and individual duty. It incapacitates any man to sit in the Legislature of a State, who shall not first have taken a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States. From the obligation of this oath no State power can discharge him. All the members of all the State Legislatures are as religiously bound to support the Constitution of the United States, as they are to support their own State constitution. Nay, sir, they are as solemnly sworn to support it, as we ourselves are, who are members of Congress.

Can any thing be conceived more preposterous than that any State should have power to nullify the proceedings of the General Government respecting peace and war? When war is declared by a law of Congress can a single State nullify that law, and remain at peace? And yet she may nullify that law as well as any other. If the President and Senate make peace, may one State, nevertheless, continue the war? And yet, if she can nullify a law, she may quite as well nullify a treaty.

The truth is, Mr. President, and no ingenuity of argument, no subtlety of distinction, can evade it, that, as to certain purposes, the people of the United States are one people. They are one in making war, and one in making peace; they are one in regulating commerce, and one in laying duties of impost. The very end and purpose of the constitution was to make them one people in these particulars; and it has effectually accomplished its object. All this is apparent on the face of the constitution itself. I have already said, sir, that to obtain a power of direct legislation over the people, especially in regard to imposts, was always prominent as a reason for getting rid of the confederation, and forming a new constitution. Among the innumerable proofs of this, before the assembling of the convention, allow me to refer only to the report of the committee of the old Congress, July, 1785.

The people, sir, in every State, live under two Governments. They owe obedience to both. These Governments, though distinct, are not adverse. Each has its separate sphere, and its peculiar powers and duties. It is not a contest between two sovereigns for the same power, like the wars of the rival houses in England; nor is it a dispute between a Government de facto and a Government de jure. It is the case of a division of powers between two Governments, made by the people, to which both are responsible. Neither can dispense with the duty which individuals owe to the other; neither can call itself master of the other; the people are masters of both. This division of power, it is true, is in a great measure unknown in Europe. It is the peculiar system of America; and, though new and singular, is not incomprehensible. The State constitutions are established by the people of the States. This constitution is established by the people of all the States: How, then, can a State secede? How can a State undo what the whole people have done? How can she absolve her citizens from their obedience to the laws of the United States? How can she annul their obligations and oaths? How can the members of her Legislature renounce their own oaths? Sir, secession, as a revolutionary right, is intelligible; as a right to be proclaimed amidst civil commotions, and asserted at the head of armies, I can understand it. But as a practical right, existing under the constitution, and in conformity with its provisions, it seems to me to be nothing but a plain absurdity; for it supposes resistance to Government, under the authority of Government itself; it supposes dismemberment, without violating the principles of union; it supposes opposition to law, without crime; it supposes the violation of oaths, without responsibility; it supposes the total overthrow of Government, without revolution.

The constitution, sir, regards itself as perpetual and immortal. It seeks to establish a union among the people of the States, which shall last through all time. Or, if the common fate of things human must be expected, at some period, to happen to it, yet that catastrophe is not anticipated.

The instrument contains ample provisions for its amendment, at all times; none for its abandonment, at any time. It declares that new States may come into the Union, but it does not declare that old States may go out. The Union is not a temporary partnership of States. It is the association of the people, under a constitution of Government, uniting their power, joining together their highest interests, cementing their present enjoyments, and blending, in one indivisible mass, all their hopes for the future. Whatsoever is steadfast in just political principles, whatsoever is permanent in the structure of human society, whatsoever there is which can derive an enduring character from being founded on deep-laid principles of constitutional liberty, and on the broad foundations of the public will—all these unite to entitle this instrument to be regarded as a permanent constitution of Government.

In the next place, Mr. President, I contend that there is a supreme law of the land, consisting of the constitution, acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and the public treaties. This will not be denied, because such are the very words of the constitution. But I contend further, that it rightfully belongs to Congress, and to the courts of the United States, to settle the construction of this supreme law, in doubtful cases. This is denied; and here arises the great practical question, who is to construe finally the Constitution of the United States? We all agree that the constitution is the supreme law; but who shall interpret the law? In our system of the division of powers between different Governments, controversies will necessarily sometimes arise respecting the extent of the powers of each. Who shall decide these controversies? Does it rest with the General Government, in all or any of its departments, to exercise the office of final interpreter? Or may each of the States, as well as the General Government, claim this right of ultimate decision? The practical result of this whole debate turns on this point. The gentleman contends that each State may judge for itself of any alleged violation of the constitution, and may finally decide for itself, and may execute its own decisions by its own power. All the recent proceedings in South Carolina are founded on this claim of right. Her convention has pronounced the revenue laws of the United States unconstitutional; and this decision she does not allow any authority to the United States to overrule or reverse. Of course, she rejects the authority of Congress, because the very object of the ordinance is to reverse the decision of Congress; and she rejects, too, the authority of the courts of the United States, because she expressly prohibits all appeal to those courts. It is in order to sustain this asserted right of being her own judge, that she pronounces the Constitution of the United States to be but a compact, to which she is a party, and a sovereign party. If this be established, then the inference is supposed to follow, that, being sovereign, there is no power to control her decision, and her own judgment on her own compact is and must be conclusive.

I have already endeavored, sir, to point out the practical consequences of this doctrine, and to show how utterly inconsistent it is with all ideas of regular government, and how soon its adoption would involve the whole country in revolution and absolute anarchy. I hope it is easy now to show, sir, that a doctrine, bringing such consequences with it, is not well founded; that it has nothing to stand upon but theory and assumption; and that it is refuted by plain and express constitutional provisions. I think the Government of the United States does possess, in its appropriate departments, the authority of final decision on questions of disputed power. I think it possesses this authority, both by necessary implication and by express grant.

It will not be denied, sir, that this authority naturally belongs to all governments. They all exercise it from necessity, and as a consequence of the exercise of other powers. The State Governments themselves possess it, except in that class of questions which may arise between them and the General Government, and in regard to which they have surrendered it, as well by the nature of the case as by clear constitutional provisions. In other and ordinary cases, whether a particular law be in conformity to the constitution of the State, is a question which the State Legislature or the State Judiciary must determine. We all know that these questions arise daily in the State Governments, and are decided by those Governments; and I know no Government which does not exercise a similar power.

Upon general principles, then, the Government of the United States possesses this authority; and this would hardly be denied, were it not that there are other Governments. But since there are State Governments, and since these, like other Governments, ordinarily construe their own powers, if the Government of the United States construes its own powers also, which construction is to prevail, in the case of opposite constructions? And again, as in the case now actually before us, the State Governments may undertake, not only to construe their own powers, but to decide directly on the extent of the powers of Congress. Congress has passed a law, as being within its just powers; South Carolina denies that this law is within its just powers, and insists that she has the right so to decide this point, and that her decision is final. How are these questions to be settled?

In my opinion, sir, even if the Constitution of the United States had made no express provision for such cases, it would yet be difficult to maintain that, in a constitution existing over four-and-twenty States, with equal authority over all, one could claim a right of construing it for the whole. This would seem a manifest impropriety; indeed, an absurdity. If the constitution is a Government existing over all the States, though with limited powers, it necessarily follows that, to the extent of those powers, it must be supreme. If it be not superior to the authority of a particular State, it is not a National Government. But as it is a Government, as it has a legislative power of its own, and a judicial power coextensive with the legislative, the inference is irresistible, that this Government, thus created by the whole and for the whole, must have an authority superior to that of the particular Government of any one part. Congress is the legislature of all the people of the United States; the Judiciary of the General Government is the Judiciary of all the people of the United States. To hold, therefore, that this Legislature and this Judiciary are subordinate in authority to the Legislature and Judiciary of a single State, is doing violence to all common sense, and overturning all established principles. Congress must judge of the extent of its own powers, so often as it is called on to exercise them, or it cannot act at all; and it must act also independent of State control, or it cannot act at all.

The right of State interposition strikes at the very foundation of the legislative power of Congress. It possesses no effective legislative power, if such right of State interposition exists; because it can pass no law not subject to abrogation. It cannot make laws for the Union, if any part of the Union may pronounce its enactments void and of no effect. Its form of legislation would be an idle ceremony, if, after all, any one of four-and-twenty States might bid defiance to its authority. Without express provision in the constitution, therefore, sir, this whole question is necessarily decided by those provisions which create a legislative power and a judicial power. If these exist in a Government intended for the whole, the inevitable consequence is, that the laws of this legislative power, and the decisions of this judicial power, must be binding on and over the whole. No man can form the conception of a Government existing over four-and-twenty States, with a regular legislative and judicial power, and of the existence, at the same time, of an authority, residing elsewhere, to resist, at pleasure or discretion, the enactments and the decisions of such a Government. I maintain, therefore, sir, that, from the nature of the case, and as an inference wholly unavoidable, the acts of Congress, and the decisions of the national courts, must be of higher authority than State laws and State decisions. If this be not so, there is, there can be, no General Government.

But, Mr. President, the constitution has not left this cardinal point without full and explicit provisions. First, as to the authority of Congress. Having enumerated the specific powers conferred on Congress, the constitution adds, as a distinct and substantive clause, the following, viz.: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." If this means any thing, it means that Congress may judge of the true extent and just interpretation of the specific powers granted to it; and may judge also of what is necessary and proper for executing those powers. If Congress is to judge of what is necessary for the execution of its powers, it must, of necessity, judge of the extent and interpretation of those powers.

And in regard, sir, to the Judiciary, the constitution is still more express and emphatic. It declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the constitution, laws of the United States, and treaties; that there shall be one Supreme Court; and that this Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction of all these cases subject to such exceptions as Congress may make. It is impossible to escape from the generality of these words. If a case arises under the constitution, that is, if a case arises depending on the construction of the constitution, the judicial power of the United States extends to it. It reaches the case, the question; it attaches the power of the national judicature to the case itself, in whatever court it may arise or exist;

and in this case the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction over all courts whatever. No language could provide, with more effect and precision than is here done, for subjecting constitutional questions to the ultimate decision of the Supreme Court. And, sir, this is exactly what the convention found it necessary to provide for, and intended to provide for. It is, too, exactly what the people were universally told was done, when they adopted the constitution. One of the first resolutions adopted by the convention was in these words, viz.: "That the jurisdiction of the National Judiciary shall extend to cases which respect the collection of the national revenue, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony." Now, sir, this either had no sensible meaning at all, or else it meant that the jurisdiction of the National Judiciary should extend to these questions, with a paramount authority. It is not to be supposed that the convention intended that the power of the National Judiciary should extend to these questions, and that the judicatures of the States should also extend to them with equal power of final decision. This would be to defeat the whole object of the provision. There were thirteen judicatures already in existence. The evil complained of, or the danger to be guarded against, was contradiction and repugnance in the decisions of these judicatures. If the framers of the constitution meant to create a fourteenth, and yet not to give it power to revise and control the decisions of the existing thirteen, then they only intended to augment the existing evil and the apprehended danger, by increasing still further the chances of discordant judgments. Why, sir, has it become a settled axiom in politics, that every Government must have a judicial power coextensive with its legislative power? Certainly, there is only this reason, viz.: that the laws may receive a uniform interpretation and a uniform execution. This object can be no otherwise attained. A statute is what it is judiciously interpreted to be; and if it be construed one way in New Hampshire, and another way in Georgia, there is no uniform law. One Supreme Court, with appellate and final jurisdiction, is the natural and only adequate means, in any Government, to secure this uniformity. The convention saw all this clearly; and the resolution which I have quoted, never afterwards rescinded, passed through various modifications, till it finally received the form which the article now wears in the constitution. It is undeniably true, then, that the framers of the constitution intended to create a national judicial power, which should be permanent, on national subjects. And after the constitution was framed, and while the whole country was engaged in discussing its merits, one of its most distinguished advocates (Mr. Madison) told the people that it was true that, in controversies relating to the boundary between the two jurisdictions, the tribunal which is ultimately to decide is to be established under the General Government. Mr. Martin, who had been a member of the convention, asserted the same thing to the Legislature of Maryland, and urged it as a reason for rejecting the constitution. Mr. Pinckney himself, also a leading member of the convention, declared it to the people of South Carolina. Everywhere it was admitted, by friends and foes, that this power was in the constitution. By some it was thought dangerous, by most it was thought necessary; but by all it was agreed to be a power actually contained in the instrument. The convention saw the absolute necessity of some control in the National Government over State laws. Different modes of establishing this control were suggested and considered. At one time it was proposed that the laws of the States should, from time to time, be laid before Congress, and that Congress should possess a negative over them. But this was thought inexpedient and inadmissible; and in its place, and expressly as a substitute for it, the existing provision was introduced; that is to say, a provision by which the courts federal should have authority to overrule such State laws as might be in manifest contravention of the constitution. The writers of the Federalist, in explaining the constitution, while it was yet pending before the people, and still unadopted, give this account of the matter in terms, and assign this reason for the article as it now stands. By this provision, Congress escaped from the necessity of any revision of State laws, left the whole sphere of State legislation quite untouched, and yet obtained a security against any infringement of the constitutional power of the General Government. Indeed, sir, allow me to ask again, if the National Judiciary was not to exercise a power of revision, on constitutional questions, over the judicatures of the States, why was any national judicature erected at all? Can any man give a sensible reason for having a judicial power in this Government, unless it be for the sake of maintaining a uniformity of decision on questions arising under the constitution and laws of Congress, and insuring its execution? And does not this very idea of uniformity necessarily imply that the construction given by the national courts is to be the prevailing construction? How else, sir, is it possible that uniformity can be preserved?

Nullification, sir, is as distinctly revolutionary as secession; but I cannot say that the revolution which it seeks is one of so respectable a character. Secession would, it is true, abandon the constitution altogether; but then it would profess to abandon it. Whatever other inconsistencies it might run into, one, at least, it would avoid. It would not belong to a Government, while it rejected its authority. It would not repel the burden, and continue to enjoy the benefits. It would not aid in passing laws which others are to obey, and yet reject their authority as to itself. It would not undertake to reconcile obedience to public authority, with an asserted right of command over that same authority. It would not be in the Government, and above the Government, at the same time. But however more respectable a mode secession may be, it is not more truly revolutionary than the actual execution of the doctrines of nullification. Both, and each, resist the constitutional authorities; both, and each, would sever the Union, and subvert the Government.

Mr. President, having detained the Senate so long already, I will now examine, at length, the ordinance and laws of South Carolina. These papers are well drawn for their purpose. Their authors understood their own objects. They are called a peaceable remedy, and we have been told that South Carolina, after all, intends nothing but a lawsuit. A very few words, sir, will show the nature of this peaceable remedy, and of the lawsuit which South Carolina contemplates.

In the first place, the ordinance declares the law of last July, and all other laws of the United States laying duties, to be absolutely null and void, and makes it unlawful for the constituted authorities of the United States to enforce the payment of such duties. It is, therefore, sir, an indictable offence, at this moment, in South Carolina, for any person to be concerned in collecting revenue, under the laws of the United States. It being declared unlawful to collect these duties by what is considered a fundamental law of the State, an indictment lies, of course, against any one concerned in such collection; and he is, on general principles, liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment. The terms, it is true, are, that it is unlawful "to enforce the payment of duties;" but every custom-house officer enforces payment when he detains the goods in order to obtain such payment. The ordinance, therefore, reaches everybody concerned in the collection of the duties.

This is the first step in the prosecution of the peaceable remedy. The second is more decisive. By the act commonly called the replevin law, any person, whose goods are seized or detained by the collector for the payment of duties, may sue out a writ of replevin, and, by virtue of that writ, the goods are to be restored to him. A writ of replevin is a writ which the sheriff is bound to execute, and for the execution of which he is bound to employ force, if necessary. He may call out the posse, and must do so, if resistance be made. This posse may be armed or unarmed. It may come forth with military array, and under the lead of military men. Whatever number of troops may be assembled in Charleston, they may be summoned, with the Governor or commander-in-chief at their head, to come in aid of the sheriff. It is evident then, sir, that the whole military power of the State is to be employed, whenever necessary, in dispossessing the custom-house officers, and in seizing and holding the goods without paying the duties. This is the second step in the peaceable remedy.

Sir, whatever pretences may be set up to the contrary, this is the direct application of force, and of military force. It is unlawful, in itself, to replevy goods into the custody of the collectors. But this unlawful act is to be done, and it is to be done by power. Here is a plain interposition, by physical force, to resist the laws of the Union. The legal mode of collecting duties is to detain goods till such duties are paid or secured. But force comes and overpowers the collector and his assistants, and takes away the goods, leaving the duties unpaid. There cannot be a clearer case of forcible resistance to law. And it is provided that the goods thus seized shall be held against any attempt to retake them, by the same force which seized them.

Having thus dispossessed the officers of the Government of the goods, without payment of duties, and seized and secured them by the strong arm of the State, only one thing more remained to be done, and that is, to cut off all possibility of legal redress; and that, too, is accomplished, or thought to be accomplished. The ordinance decrees, that all judicial proceedings founded on the revenue laws (including, of course, proceedings in the courts of the United States) shall be null and void. This nullifies the judicial power of the United States. Then comes the test oath act. This requires all State judges and jurors in the State courts to swear that they will execute the ordinance, and all acts of the Legislature passed in pursuance thereof. The ordinance declares that no appeal shall be allowed from the decision of the State courts to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the replevin act makes it an indictable offence for any clerk to furnish a copy of the record, for the purpose of such appeal.

The two principal provisions on which South Carolina relies, to resist the laws of the United States, and nullify the authority of this Government, are, therefore, these:

1. A forcible seizure of goods before the duties are paid or secured, by the power of the State, civil and military.

2. The taking away, by the most effectual means in her power, of all legal redress in the courts of the United States; the confining all judicial proceedings to her own State tribunals; and the compelling of her judges and jurors of these her own courts to take an oath beforehand that they will decide all cases according to the ordinance, and the acts passed under it; that is, that they will decide the cause one way. They do not swear to try it on its own merits; they only swear to decide it as nullification requires.

The character, sir, of these provisions defies comment. Their object is as plain as their means are extraordinary. They propose direct resistance, by the whole power of the State, to laws of Congress; to cut off, by methods deemed adequate, any redress by legal and judicial authority. They arrest legislation, defy the executive, and banish the judicial power of this Government. They authorize and command acts to be done, and done by force, both of numbers and of arms, which, if done, and done by force, are clearly acts of rebellion and treason.

Such, sir, are the laws of South Carolina; such, sir, is the peaceable remedy of nullification. Has not nullification reached, sir, even thus early, that point of direct and forcible resistance to law, to which I intimated, three years ago, it plainly tended?

And now, Mr. President, what is the reason for passing laws like these? What are the oppressions experienced under the Union, calling for measures which thus threaten to sever and destroy it? What invasions of public liberty, what ruin to private happiness, what long list of rights violated, or wrongs unredressed, are to justify to the country, to posterity, and to the world, this assault upon the free Constitution of the United States, this great and glorious work of our fathers? At this very moment, sir, the whole land smiles in peace, and rejoices in plenty. A general and a high prosperity pervades the country; and, judging by the common standard, by increase of population and wealth; or judging by the opinions of that portion of her people not embarked in those dangerous and desperate measures, this prosperity overspreads South Carolina herself.

Thus, happy at home, our country, at the same time, holds high the character of her institutions, her power, her rapid growth, and her future destiny, in the eyes of all foreign States. One danger only creates hesitation; one doubt only exists to darken the otherwise unclouded brightness of that aspect, which she exhibits to the view and to the adoration of the world. Need I say that that doubt respects the permanency of our Union? and need I say that that doubt is now caused, more than by any thing else, by these very proceedings of South Carolina? Sir, all Europe is, at this moment, beholding us, and looking for the issue of this controversy; those who hate free institutions, with malignant hope; those who love them, with deep anxiety and shivering fear.

The cause, then, sir, the cause! Let the world know the cause which has thus induced one State of the Union to bid defiance to the power of the whole, and openly to talk of secession.

Sir, the world will scarcely believe that this whole controversy, and all the desperate measures which its support requires, have no other foundation than a difference of opinion, upon a provision of the constitution, between a majority of the people of South Carolina, on one side, and a vast majority of the whole people of the United States on the other. It will not credit the fact, it will not admit the possibility, that, in an enlightened age, in a free, popular republic, under a Government where the people govern, as they must always govern, under such systems, by majorities, at a time of unprecedented happiness, without practical oppression, without evils, such as may not only be pretended, but felt and experienced,—evils not slight or temporary, but deep, permanent, and intolerable,—a single State should rush into conflict with all the rest, attempt to put down the power of the Union by her own laws, and to support those laws by her military power, and thus break up and destroy the world's last hope. And well the world may be incredulous. We, who hear and see it, can ourselves hardly yet believe it. Even after all that had preceded it, this ordinance struck the country with amazement. It was incredible and inconceivable, that South Carolina should thus plunge headlong into resistance to the laws, on a matter of opinion, and on a question in which the preponderance of opinion, both of the present day and of all past time, was so overwhelmingly against her. The ordinance declares that Congress has exceeded its just power, by laying duties on imports, intended for the protection of manufactures. This is the opinion of South Carolina; and on the strength of that opinion she nullifies the laws. Yet has the rest of the country no right to its opinions also? Is one State to sit sole arbitress? She maintains that those laws are plain, deliberate, and palpable violations of the constitution; that she has a sovereign right to decide this matter; and that, having so decided, she is authorized to resist their execution by her own sovereign power; and she declares that she will resist it, though such resistance should shatter the Union into atoms.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the propriety of these laws at large; but I will ask, how are they shown to be thus plainly and palpably unconstitutional? Are they quite new in the history of the Government? Have they no countenance at all in the constitution itself? Are they a sudden and violent usurpation on the rights of the States? Sir, what will the civilized world say, what will posterity say, when they learn that similar laws have existed from the very foundation of the Government; that for thirty years the power never was questioned; and that no State in the Union has more freely and unequivocally admitted it than South Carolina herself?

To lay and collect duties and imposts is an express power, granted by the constitution to Congress. It is also an exclusive power; for the constitution as expressly prohibits all the States from exercising it themselves. This express and exclusive power is unlimited in the terms of the grant, but it is attended with two specific restrictions: first, that all duties and imposts shall be equal in all the States; second, that no duties shall be laid on exports. The power, then, being granted, and being attended with these two restrictions, and no more, who is to impose a third restriction on the general words of the grant? If the power to lay duties, as known among all other nations, and as known in all our history, and as it was perfectly understood when the constitution was adopted, includes a right of discriminating, while exercising the power, and of laying some duties heavier and some lighter, for the sake of encouraging our own domestic products, what authority is there for giving to the words used in the constitution a new, narrow, and unusual meaning? All the limitations which the constitution intended, it has expressed; and what it has left unrestricted, is as much a part of its will as the restraints which it has imposed.

But these laws, it is said, are unconstitutional on account of the motive. How, sir, can a law be examined on any such ground? How is the motive to be ascertained? One House, or one member, may have one motive; the other House, or another member, another. One motive may operate to-day, and another to-morrow. Upon any such mode of reasoning as this, one law might be unconstitutional now, and another law, in exactly the same words, perfectly constitutional next year. Besides, articles may only be taxed for the purpose of protecting home products, but other articles may be left free, for the same purpose, and with the same motive. A law, therefore, would become unconstitutional from what it omitted as well as from what it contained. Mr. President, it is a settled principle, acknowledged in all legislative halls, recognized before all tribunals, sanctioned by the general sense and understanding of mankind, that there can be no inquiry into the motives of those who pass laws, for the purpose of determining on their validity. If the law be within the fair meaning of the words in the grant of power, its authority must be admitted until it is repealed. This rule, everywhere acknowledged, everywhere admitted, is so universal, and so completely without exception, as that even an allegation of fraud in the majority of a Legislature is not allowed as a ground to set aside a law.

But, sir, is it true that the motive for these laws is such as is stated? I think not. The great object of all these laws is, unquestionably, revenue. If there were no occasion for revenue, the laws would not have been passed; and it is notorious that almost the entire revenue of the country is derived from them. And, as yet, we have collected none too much revenue. The treasury has not been more exhausted for many years than at this moment. All that South Carolina can say is, that in passing the laws which she now undertakes to nullify, particular articles were taxed from a regard to the protection of domestic articles, higher than they would have been had no such regard been entertained. And she insists that, according to the constitution, no such discrimination can be allowed; that duties should be laid for revenue, and revenue only; and that it is unlawful to have reference, in any case, to protection. In other words, she denies the power of discrimination. She does not, and cannot, complain of excessive taxation; on the contrary, she professes to be willing to pay any amount for revenue, merely as revenue; and up to the present moment there is no surplus of revenue. Her grievance, then, that plain and palpable violation of the constitution which she insists has taken place, is simply the exercise of the power of discrimination. Now, sir, is the exercise of this power of discrimination plainly and palpably unconstitutional? I have already said the power to lay duties is given by the constitution in broad and general terms. There is also conferred on Congress the whole power of regulating commerce in another distinct provision. Is it clear and palpable, sir—can any man say it is a case beyond doubt—that under these two powers Congress may not justly discriminate in laying duties for the purpose of countervailing the policy of foreign nations, or of favoring our own home productions? Sir, what ought to conclude this question forever, as it would seem to me, is, that the regulation of commerce, and the imposition of duties, are, in all commercial nations, powers avowedly and constantly exercised for this very end.

Mr. President, if the friends of nullification should be able to propagate their opinions, and give them practical effect, they would, in my judgment, prove themselves the most skilful "architects of ruin," the most effectual extinguishers of high-raised expectation, the greatest blasters of human hopes, which any age has produced. They would stand up to proclaim, in tones which would pierce the ears of half the human race, that the last great experiment of representative government had failed. They would send forth sounds, at the hearing of which the doctrine of the divine right of kings would feel, even in its grave, a returning sensation of vitality and resuscitation. Millions of eyes, of those who now feed their inherent love of liberty on the success of the American example, would turn away from beholding our dismemberment, and find no place on earth whereon to rest their gratified sight. Amidst the incantations and orgies of nullification, secession, disunion, and revolution, would be celebrated the funeral rites of constitutional and republican liberty.

But, sir, if the Government do its duty; if it act with firmness and with moderation, these opinions cannot prevail. Be assured, sir, be assured, that, among the political sentiments of this people, the love of union is still uppermost. They will stand fast by the constitution, and by those who defend it. I rely on no temporary expedients—on no political combination—but I rely on the true American feeling, the genuine patriotism of the people, and the imperative decision of the public voice. Disorder and confusion, indeed, may arise; scenes of commotion and contest are threatened, and perhaps may come. With my whole heart I pray for the continuance of the domestic peace and quiet of the country. I desire most ardently the restoration of affection and harmony to all its parts. I desire that every citizen of the whole country may look to this Government with no other sentiments but those of grateful respect and attachment. But I cannot yield, even to kind feelings, the cause of the constitution, the true glory of the country, and the great trust which we hold in our hands for succeeding ages. If the constitution cannot be maintained without meeting these scenes of commotion and contest, however unwelcome, they must come. We cannot, we must not, we dare not, omit to do that which, in our judgment, the safety of the Union requires. Not regardless of consequences, we must yet meet consequences; seeing the hazards which surround the discharge of public duty, it must yet be discharged. For myself, sir, I shun no responsibility justly devolving on me, here or elsewhere, in attempting to maintain the cause. I am tied to it by indissoluble bands of affection and duty, and I shall cheerfully partake in its fortunes and its fate. I am ready to perform my own appropriate part whenever and wherever the occasion may call on me, and take my chance among those upon whom blows may fall first and fall thickest. I shall exert every faculty I possess in aiding to prevent the constitution from being nullified, destroyed, or impaired; and even should I see it fall, I will still, with a voice, feeble, perhaps, but earnest as ever issued from human lips, and with fidelity and zeal which nothing shall extinguish, call on the PEOPLE to come to its rescue.

MONDAY, February 18.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. POINDEXTER, who was entitled to the floor, rose and said he was compelled to decline any participation in the debate at this time, on account of the state of his health. If the subject should be postponed, he hoped to be able at another time to address the Senate in relation to it.

The CHAIR having stated the question to be, "Shall this bill be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?"

Mr. CALHOUN said he had not anticipated this question for this morning. When it was put, he hoped there would be a full Senate. He moved the postponement of the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER hoped the postponement would not take place, as the session was drawing to a close. He had a desire to address the Senate on the question before it, but was not disposed to do it to-day. He had come here this morning, expecting to hear the honorable Senator from Mississippi. He would suggest that, if no additional amendments were to be offered, the bill should be passed to a third reading, and discussed on its passage.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The third reading of a bill, as the Senator knows, is the most trying question.

FEBRUARY, 1833.]

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties—Compromise Bill.

[SENATE.]

Having a solemn conviction of the importance of the question, I wish it to be taken in full Senate. He had no other object, than to procure a full discussion of the measure, and he regretted the inability of the Senator from Mississippi to proceed at present. If any gentleman wished to offer an amendment, or to address the Senate, he would withdraw his motion to postpone.

The motion having been withdrawn,

Mr. FORSYTH commenced a series of observations, which he continued until three o'clock. His argument, commencing with the precise motion before the Senate, gradually expanded into a view of the whole subject under debate. As regarded the exciting question of nullification, that doctrine he held was untenable. No individual State possessed the right of nullification from any sovereignty residing in her. Sovereignty, he contended, did not exist in the States, separately or individually, since the Union. Since that period, it resided in the United States as a whole; and by them alone could it be exercised, and in the mode defined by the constitution. Much ingenuity had been called forth in support of nullification; but mystify it as they pleased, it could not stand the test of argument. The doctrine was preposterous; it was a mere web of sophism and casuistry. And the arguments in its favor, if analyzed, and put through the alembic, would result in the double distilled essence of nonsense. But having thus denounced nullification he would admit that the position which South Carolina had taken had served one good purpose, that of opening the eyes of the country to the injustice done to the South by an odious and oppressive tariff. As regarded the tariff, the whole South were with South Carolina, in the general principle of resistance to it; but they differed from her in the mode which she had thought fit to adopt. But if the tariff was odious, and must finally be put an end to, neither could the course of South Carolina be defended, or tolerated, with safety to the Union. He looked forward in anticipation to the period as nigh at hand, when the protective system must expire, and, in like manner, when nullification would sink into the grave. He hoped soon to see them buried in the same tomb; and willingly would he then pronounce their funeral oration, and inscribe on their monument the epitaph—“requiescat in pace.”

[After some further discussion, and after the offering and rejection of a number of amendments to the bill:]

The Chair put the question, “Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?” which was decided in the affirmative, 32 to 8, by the following vote:

YEA.—Messrs. Bell, Buckner, Chambers, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright—32.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Calhoun, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Troup, Tyler—8.

The Senate then, at half after 11 o'clock P. M., adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 19.

The Tariff.

Mr. CLAY, from the Select Committee to which was referred the bill to modify the several acts imposing duties on imports, reported the bill with various amendments.

Mr. C. then stated, that he was also authorized to say that at a proper time another amendment would be offered on the subject of the valuation of goods, which would be calculated to conciliate the conflicting opinions which had prevailed in reference to that point. He was happy to say that, although there was so short an interval for the action of the two Houses on this bill, the committee entertained strong hopes that it would be found practicable to effect some accommodation of this question before the close of the present session. He was directed to move that the amendments be printed, and further to move that the bill and amendments be made the special order for to-morrow, with the understanding that if the measure now pending before the Senate should not be disposed of by that time, the bill now reported would not be pressed to interfere with that discussion.

The amendments were then ordered to be printed, and the bill and amendments were made the special order for to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 21.

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties—Compromise Bill.

Mr. CLAY moved to take up the special order, being the bill “to modify the act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports;” which being agreed to, the bill was then taken up in Committee of the Whole, as amended by the select committee to whom it was referred, as follows:

[The bill omitted. Its leading provisions were: a periodical annual reduction of one-tenth of the present duties for seven years, after which all the remaining duty above 20 percentum on the value should be equally divided into two parts, and part struck off at the end of one year thereafter, and the other half at the end of another year, so that at the end of nine years all duties should be reduced to 20 percentum on the value, with a list of free articles, and no more revenue to be raised than necessary for the economical support of the Government. The act to be permanent.]

Mr. CLAY now rose to propose the amendment of which he had previously given notice.

The object was, that after the period prescribed by the bill, all duties should thereafter be assessed on a valuation made at the port in which the goods are first imported, and under "such regulations as may be prescribed by law." Mr. C. said it would be seen by this amendment, that in place of having foreign valuation, it was intended to have a home one. It was believed by the friends of the protective system, that such a regulation was necessary. It was believed by many of the friends of the system, that after the period of nine and a half years, the most of our manufactures will be sufficiently grown to be able to support themselves under a duty of twenty per cent. if properly laid; but that under a system of foreign valuation, such would not be the case. They say that it would be more detrimental to their interests than the lowest scale of duties that could be imposed; and you propose to fix a standard of duties. They are willing to take you at your word, provided you regulate this in a way to do them justice.

Mr. SMITH opposed the amendment, on the ground that it would be an increase of duties; that it had been tried before; that it would be impracticable, unequal, unjust, and productive of confusion, inasmuch as imported goods were constantly varying in value, and were well known to be, at all times, cheaper in New York than in the commercial cities south of it. This would have the effect of drawing all the trade of the United States to New York.

Mr. CALHOUN said he regretted, exceedingly, that the Senator from Kentucky had felt it his duty to move the amendment. According to his present impressions, the objections to it were insurmountable; and, unless these were removed, he should be compelled to vote against the whole bill should the amendment be adopted. The measure proposed was, in his opinion, unconstitutional. The constitution expressly provided that no preference should be given, by any regulation of commerce, to the ports of one State over those of another; and this would be the effect of adopting the amendment. Thus, great injustice and inequality must necessarily result from it; for, the price of goods being cheaper in the northern than in the southern cities, a home valuation would give to the former a preference in the payment of duties. Again, the price of goods being higher at New Orleans and Charleston than at New York, the freight and insurance also being higher, together with the increased expenses of a sickly climate, would give such advantages in the amount of duties to the northern city, as to draw to it much of the trade of the southern ones. In his view of the subject, this was not all. He was not merchant enough to say what would be the extent of duties under this system of home valuation; but, as he understood it, they must, of consequence, be progressive. For instance, an article is brought into New York, value there 100 dollars. Twenty per cent. on that would raise the value of the article to one hundred and twenty dollars, on which value a duty of twenty per cent. would be assessed at the next importation, and so on. It would, therefore, be impossible to say to what extent the duties would run up. He regretted the more that the Senator from Kentucky had felt it his duty to offer this amendment, as he was willing to leave the matter to the decision of a future Congress, though he did not see how they could get over the insuperable constitutional objections he had glanced at. Mr. C. appealed to the Senator from Kentucky, whether, with these views, he would press his amendment, when he had eight or nine years in advance before it could take effect. He understood the argument of the Senator from Kentucky to be an admission that the amendment was not now absolutely necessary. With respect to the apprehension of frauds on the revenue, Mr. C. said that every future Congress would have the strongest disposition to guard against them. The very reduction of duties, he said, would have that effect; it would strike at the root of the evil. Mr. C. said he agreed with the Senator from Kentucky, that this bill will be the final effort at conciliation and compromise; and he, for one, was not disposed, if it passed, to violate it by future legislation.

Mr. CLAYTON could not vote for this bill without this amendment, nor would he admit any idea of an abandonment of the protective system; while he was willing to pass this measure, as one of concession from the stronger to the weaker party, he never could agree that twenty per cent. was adequate protection to our domestic manufactures. He had been anxious to do something to relieve South Carolina from her present perilous position; though he had never been driven by the taunts of southern gentlemen to do that, which he now did, for the sake of conciliation.

Mr. DALLAS was opposed to the proposition from the committee, and agreed with Mr. CALHOUN. He would state briefly his objection to the proposition of the committee. Although he was from a State strongly disposed to maintain the protective policy, he labored under an impression, that if any thing could be done to conciliate the Southern States, it was his duty to go for a measure for that purpose; but he should not go beyond it. He could do nothing in this way, as representing his particular district of the country, but only for the general good. He could not agree to incorporate in the bill any principle which he thought erroneous or improper. He would sanction nothing in the bill as an abandonment of the principle of protection. Mr. D. then made a few remarks on home and foreign valuation, to show the ground of his objections to the amendment of Mr. CLAY, though it did not prevent his strong desire to compromise and conciliation.

Mr. FORBATH was opposed to the Senate deciding a question for their successors. He was opposed to putting any thing into the bill which was bad in theory; but he thought no pledges could be given with regard to the future action of Congress.

Mr. KANE objected to the home valuation, as necessarily at variance with the clause in the constitution, which requires that no preference should be made of one port over another.

Mr. SIMS entered largely into the details of the subject, and objected to the adoption of a system now, which would go into operation eight years hence.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he listened with great care to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, and other gentlemen, who had advocated the same side, in hopes of having his objection to the mode of valuation proposed in the amendment removed; but he must say, that the difficulties he first expressed still remained. Passing over what seemed to him to be a constitutional objection, he would direct his observation to what appeared to him to be its unequal operation. If by the home valuation be meant the foreign price, with the addition of freight, insurance, and other expenses at the port of destination, it is manifest that as these are unequal between the several ports in the Union—for instance, between the ports of New York and New Orleans—the duty must also be unequal in the same degree, if laid on value thus estimated. But if, by the home valuation, he meant the prices current at the place of importation, then, in addition to the inequality already stated, there would have to be added the additional inequality resulting from the different rates of profits, and other circumstances, which must necessarily render prices very unequal in the several ports of this widely extended country. There would, in the same view, be another and a stronger objection, which he alluded to in his former remarks, which remained unanswered—that the duties themselves constitute part of the elements of the current prices of the imported articles; and that, to impose a duty on a valuation ascertained by the current prices, would be to impose, in reality, a duty upon a duty, and must necessarily produce that increased progression in duties, which he had already attempted to illustrate.

Mr. CLAYTON said, this point had been discussed in the committee; and it was because this amendment was not adopted that he had withheld his assent from the bill. They had now but seven business days of this session remaining; and it would require the greatest unanimity, both in that body and in the other House, to pass any bill on this subject. Were gentlemen coming from the opposite extremes of the Union, and representing opposite interests, to agree to combine together, there would hardly be time to pass this bill into a law; yet if he saw that it could be done, he would gladly go on with the consideration of the bill, and with the determination to do all that could be done. The honorable member from South Carolina had found insuperable obstacles where he

(Mr. C.) had found none. On their part, if they agreed to this bill, it would only be for the sake of conciliation; if South Carolina would not accept the measure in that light, then their motive for arrangement was at an end. He (Mr. C.) apprehended, however, that good might result from bringing the proposition forward at that time. It would be placed before the view of the people, who would have time to reflect and make up their minds upon it against the meeting of the next Congress. He did not hold any man as pledged by their action at this time. If the arrangement was found to be a proper one, the next Congress might adopt it. But, for the reasons he had already stated, he had little hope that any bill would be passed at this session; and, to go on debating it, day after day, would only have the effect of defeating the many private bills and other business which were waiting the action of Congress. He would therefore propose to lay the bill for the present on the table; if it were found, at a future period, before the expiration of the session, that there was a prospect of overcoming the difficulties which now presented themselves, and of acting upon it, the bill might be again taken up. If no other gentleman wished to make any observations on the amendment, he would move to lay the bill on the table.

The Senate then, at half-past four o'clock, adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 22.

The Tariff.

The Senate having resumed the bill to modify the act of 14th July, 1832, and all other laws imposing duties on imports, the question being on Mr. CLAY's amendment, providing that the proposed rate of duty payable after 1842 should be computed upon the value of merchandise at the port of importation,

Mr. HILL regretted very much that the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) after having gratuitously extended the olive branch, after having been complimented by gentlemen who represented the "aggrieved South," and who could there allay the storm that had been raised by ambitious politicians for mercenary purposes, as a "pacificator" and "mediator," should snatch the cup from the lips of the friends of the Union by interposing an amendment. What is the object of this amendment? So far from affecting the present rate of duties, it does not touch an article for nearly ten years! Nor is it at all binding on any future Congress, let the principle be declared as it will. I could not, were I in any other place, believe gentlemen to be in earnest when they were contending for the points of difference between the bill as it stands, and the bill as it will stand when amended. It can be of no consequence here to discuss the point, whether the public interest will be better consulted by a "home valuation," ten years hence, or the valuation as now made. I consider the present valuation as virtually a home valuation: if not so, where is the use of appraisers in the several ports as now provided by law? If by the amendment the price of freight is to be added at the several ports; if the prices are to fluctuate from week to week, and from month to month, as goods are plenty or scarce, the amendment ought to be rejected, and no future Congress will regard our mandate for enforcing the adoption of its principles. If it intends the raising of the duties five, ten, or twenty per cent., the people will never suffer any Congress to adopt it.

Mr. WEBSTER held the home valuation to be, to any extent, impracticable; and that it was unprecedented and unknown in any legislation. Both the home and foreign valuation ought to be excluded as far as possible, and specific duties should be resorted to. This keeping out of view specific duties, and turning us back to the principle of a valuation, was, in his view, the great vice of this bill. In England five out of six, or nine out of ten articles, pay specific duties, and the valuation is on the remnant. Among the articles which pay ad valorem duties in England are silk goods, which are imported either from India, whence they are brought to one port only; or from Europe, in which case there is a specific and an ad valorem duty; and the officer has the option to take either the one or the other. He suggested that the Senate, before they adopted the ad valorem principle, should look to the effects on the importation of the country.

He took a view of the iron trade, to show that evil would result to that branch from a substitution of the ad valorem for the specific system of duties. He admitted himself to be unable to comprehend the elements of a home valuation, and mentioned cases where it would be impossible to find an accurate standard of valuation of this character. The plan was impracticable and illusory.

Mr. BENSON objected to the home valuation, as tending to a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and cited the following clause: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." All uniformity of duties and imposts, he contended, would be destroyed by this amendment. No human judgment could fix the value of the same goods at the same rate in all the various ports of the United States. If the same individual valued the goods in every port, and every cargo in every port, he would commit innumerable errors and mistakes in the valuation; and, according to the diversity of these errors and mistakes, would be the diversity in the amount of duties and imposts laid and collected in the different ports. But it would not be the judgment of one individual that would make all these valuations, but the judgments of hundreds would be required. New York alone would require scores; other ports a number proportionate to their business; and no port could be trusted with less than two, however insignificant its importations might be. Admitting every appraiser to be skilful, diligent, and honest, it would be impossible but that the grossest variations, in assessing the values of the same goods, must take place in the different ports of the United States, and even in the same ports on different days and different cargoes. But it would be impossible that all the appraisers should be skilful, and especially that they should be skilled in the value of all the infinite variety of commodities which the genius of the artist fabricates in the four quarters of the globe, and which the enterprise of the merchant brings into the United States. So far from this universal, and almost miraculous skill, in all the appraisers, it would turn out, in practice, that many of them would be mere ignoramuses, worked into office by the power and influences of friends, and totally destitute of the knowledge which the place required. Even those who were skilful in one class of commodities might be ignorant of another; the man who was a judge of cotton goods might know nothing of woollens; he that was acquainted with brandies might know nothing of wines; the nice critic in fancy goods might be wholly ignorant of hardware; and so on throughout the whole list of the importations. With or without skill, it would be impossible that every appraiser, in so large a number, should be diligent and faithful. Some may be too indolent and indifferent to take upon themselves the laborious examinations which are indispensable to the formation of correct judgment; some may lack principle, and take a douceur from the importer to value his goods low, and depress the duty; or take the same douceur from the manufacturers, to value them high, and enhance the duties. Some may take one rule, and some another, for fixing valuations; some may consult invoices; some may go to auctioneers; some to men in business; others to men out of business; and some may consult nobody, but rely upon the view of their own eyes, the touch of their own fingers, and the taste of their own tongues, for the quality and value of every thing that comes in their way. Such must be the appraisers; and in such hands an infinite diversity of values must be placed upon the same goods in different ports, and a corresponding diversity must accrue in the amount of duties and imposts levied and collected upon them.

Mr. B. objected to the home valuation, because it would destroy the effect, and turn into a mere illusion the ultimate reduction to twenty per cent., which the bill proposed, and which was the only inducement with anti-tariff members for bearing with the heavy duties which are to be kept up for the first seven years which the bill had to run. He did not believe the reduction would ever come down to twenty per cent.; but if it should, the home valuation attached immediately, and converted that twenty into about thirty! The difference of the home and the foreign value would be about one-third in the northern ports, and one-half in the southern ports; consequently, the basis of calculation would be enlarged one-third, or one-half; but the difference, in fact, would be still greater. It is openly, publicly, repeatedly, and ostentatiously proclaimed on this floor, by the friends of the bill, that twenty per cent. upon the home valuation is more than thirty per cent. on the value! Assume it at thirty, and what will be the result? On one hundred millions of importations, the Government will receive thirty millions of revenue instead of twenty; on every hundred dollars' worth of goods, the consumer will pay thirty dollars tax instead of twenty! Both as a reduction of revenue to the Government and as a reduction of tax to the consumer, the valuation contradicts the ultimate point and main object of the bill, and renders it wholly deceptive and illusory.

Mr. B. objected to the home valuation, because it would be injurious, and almost fatal to the southern ports. He confined his remarks to New Orleans. The standard of valuation would be fifteen or twenty per cent. higher in New Orleans than in New York, and other northern ports. All importers will go to the northeastern cities, to evade high duties at New Orleans; and that great emporium of the West will be doomed to sink into a mere exporting city, while all the money which it pays for exports must be carried off and expended elsewhere for imports. Without an import trade no city can flourish, or even furnish a good market for exports. It will be drained of its effective cash, and deprived of its legitimate gains, and must languish far in the rear of what it would be if enriched with the profits of an import trade. As an exporter, it will buy; as an importer, it will sell. All buying and no selling must impoverish cities as well as individuals. New Orleans is now a great exporting city; she exports more domestic productions than any city in the Union; her imports have been increasing for some years; and, with fair play, would soon become next to New York, and furnish the whole valley of the Mississippi with its immense supplies of foreign goods; but, under the influence of a home valuation, it must lose a greater part of the import trade which it now possesses. In that loss its wealth must decline; its capacity to purchase produce for exportation must decline; and as the western produce must go there at all events, every western farmer will suffer a decline in the value of his own productions in proportion to the decline of the ability of New Orleans to purchase it. It was as a western citizen that he pleaded the cause of New Orleans, and objected to this measure of home valuation, which was to have the most baleful effects upon her prosperity.

Mr. B. further objected to the home valuation on account of the great additional expense it would create; the amount of patronage it would confer; the rivalry it would beget between importing cities; and the injury it would occasion to merchants from the detention and handling of their goods; and concluded with saying, that the home valuation was the most obnoxious feature ever introduced into the tariff acts; that it was itself equivalent to a separate tariff of ten per cent.; that it had always been resisted, and successfully resisted, by the anti-tariff interest in the highest and most palmy days of the American system, and ought not now to be introduced when that system is admitted to be nodding to its fall; when its death is actually fixed for the 30th day of June, 1843, and when the restoration of harmonious feelings is proclaimed to be the whole object of this bill.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked, that the question being now about to be put on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, it became necessary for him to determine whether he should vote for or against it. He must be permitted again to express his regret that the Senator had thought proper to move it. His objection still remained strong against it; but as it seemed to be admitted, on all hands, that the fate of the bill depended on the fate of the amendment, feeling as he did a solicitude to see the question terminated, he had made up his mind, not, however, without much hesitation, not to interpose his vote against the adoption of the amendment; but, in voting for it, he wished it to be distinctly understood, he did it upon two conditions: first, that no valuation would be adopted that should come in conflict with the provision in the constitution which declares that duties, excises, and imposts shall be uniform; and in the next place, that none would be adopted which would make the duties themselves a part of the element of a home valuation. He felt himself justified in concluding that none such would be adopted; as it had been declared by the supporters of the amendment that no such regulation was contemplated; and, in fact, he could not imagine that any such could be contemplated, whatever interpretation might be attempted hereafter to be given to the expression of the home market. The first could scarcely be contemplated, as it would be in violation of the constitution itself; nor the latter, as it would, by necessary consequences, restore the very duties which it was the object of this bill to reduce, and would involve the glaring absurdity of imposing duties on duties, taxes on taxes. He wished the reporters for the public press to notice particularly what he said, as he intended his declaration to be part of the proceedings.

Believing, then, for the reason which he had stated, that it was not contemplated that any regulation of the home valuation should come in conflict with the provision of the constitution which he had cited, nor involve the absurdity of laying taxes upon taxes, he had made up his mind to vote in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH said, any declaration of the views and motives under which any individual Senator might now vote could have no influence in 1842; they would be forgotten long before that time had arrived. The law must rest upon the interpretation of its words alone.

Mr. CALHOUN said he could not help that; he should endeavor to do his duty.

Mr. CLAYTON said there was certainly no ambiguity whatever in the phraseology of the amendment. In advocating it, he had desired to deceive no man; he sincerely hoped no one would suffer himself to be deceived by it.

The amendment of Mr. CLAY, fixing the principle of home valuation as a part of the bill, was then adopted by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wilkins—26.

SATURDAY, February 23.

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties—Compromise Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to modify the tariff laws; the question being on the motion of Mr. SMITH, to change the second section so as to permit the duties on plains, kerseys, and Kendal cottons, costing under thirty-five cents per square yard, to be imported at five per cent., as fixed by the act of 1832, instead of increasing the duties on those manufactures to fifty per cent., as was proposed by the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT supported the amendment. The great and leading objects for which this measure had been supported was to diminish the burdens of the South, and reduce the revenue. How either of these was to be accomplished by increasing the duty upon an article of great importance to that section from five to fifty per cent., which would add at least half a million to the revenue, he had not been able to perceive. On the other hand, it appeared to be precisely contrary to the avowed object of the friends of the bill, of whom he professed to be one. When the duty on these woollens had been reduced, the last session, to five per cent., as an act of conciliation to the South, the whole duty was taken from the wool, which entered into that description of manufacture, by way of counterpoise. To raise this duty to fifty per cent., without reinstating the corresponding duty on the raw material, he regarded as altogether impolitic.

Mr. FOOT said, this was an important feature of the bill, in which his constituents had a great interest. Gentlemen from the South had agreed to it; and they were abundantly capable of guarding their own interests.

Mr. CLAY said the whole bill was based upon the principle of compromise. The provision proposed to be struck out was an essential part of this compromise, which, if struck out, would destroy the effect of the whole.

Mr. FORSYTH was sorry to hear from the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) that he regarded this increase of the burdens of the South as an essential feature of this scheme of compromise. The Senate, in adopting the principle of home valuation, had changed the original plan, in his opinion, much for the worse; he now hoped they would change this part of the bill for the better. He regarded it as highly important to the whole South, with the exception of a small part of South Carolina.

Mr. BUCKNER advocated the interests of the West, which he said had been entirely overlooked in this compromise between the North and South. After explaining those interests at large, Mr. B. declared his intention of supporting the amendment.

Mr. BELL opposed the amendment. The passage of the bill depended upon it. If it was adopted, he should feel compelled to vote against the bill. As to the interests of the West, he believed the lead and iron were more highly protected, at least until 1841, than woollens. As to what would take place hereafter, no one could now foresee. No pledge could now be given to bind the future legislation of Congress. It was altogether futile to consider any measure in that light. We must presume that future legislation will be what it ought to be, in view of the great interests of the country.

Mr. WRIGHT had heard nothing in support of this provision of the bill, which proposed to increase the duties from five to fifty per cent., which had convinced him that it was conciliatory to the South, or effectual as a means of reducing the revenue. Upon the principles on which the bill had been placed, it certainly would be improved by striking out this provision.

Mr. CHAMBERS said it was impossible for him to vote for the bill, as a measure originating in the Senate, while it contained this provision for increasing the duties. By the constitution, the Senate could originate no such measure. If this feature were struck out, he should most cheerfully support the bill.

Mr. BENTON requested that Mr. CALHOUN, who had temporarily left his seat, might be sent for.

Mr. MOORE inquired if the gentleman wished to impeach Mr. CALHOUN?

Mr. BENTON did not. He only wanted the benefit of his testimony.

Mr. CALHOUN having taken his seat,

Mr. BENTON stated, that some years past he had introduced a bill which provided for a reduction of duties to a large extent, but increased the rate of duty upon some particular articles. It had then been decided by the presiding officer of the Senate, that, being a bill to raise revenue, it could not constitutionally originate in the Senate. He asked for the benefit of the testimony of the gentleman who then presided over the deliberations of the Senate, to bear him out in the correctness of his statement.

Mr. CALHOUN said, the constitution unquestionably provided that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. Whether the constitutional question was decided in the case referred to, or the bill went off upon a question of order, he did not distinctly recollect, though other Senators might. His impression was, that no decision was made on the constitutional question.

Mr. Foor recollected the case, and was confident that only a question of order was raised, and the constitutional question was not decided by the Chair.

Mr. BENTON then explained the provisions of the bill to which he referred, and compared them with the present. He regarded them as standing on the same ground. The question of order, if it was to be so called, was decided against that bill, upon the constitutional objection that it was not competent to introduce such a measure into the Senate.

Mr. Foor said the bill referred to proposed the commencement of a revenue system, which had not before existed, and clearly came within the constitutional objection. This bill is not intended to raise, but to reduce the revenue. The objection did not apply to this measure.

Mr. SMITH said, gentlemen seemed inclined to make the constitution support whatever might agree with their fancies.

Mr. DICKERSON said, whether the rate of duty was raised or lowered, the law was equally one for raising revenue within the constitution. The distinction was an absurdity.

Mr. CHAMBERS regarded the constitutional objection as insurmountable. With great regret he should be compelled to vote against the bill if this provision remained in it. The bill should have come from the House of Representatives.

Mr. FORSYTH had stated this objection to the introduction of the bill; but, having been overruled, and the bill having originated in the Senate notwithstanding the constitution, he could perceive no prohibition against its passage.

Mr. CHAMBERS had supposed the objection against the introduction of the bill to have been waived, for the purpose of discussing its provisions. He regarded the present as the proper time for taking the objection.

Mr. SILSBEE could not vote for the bill in the face of the constitution, which expressly prohibited its originating in the Senate.

Mr. BUCKNER could not agree with the Senator from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) that the introduction of the bill had done away the objection. For this reason, if no other, he should vote against it.

Mr. SMITH could not see how the constitutional question could be settled. If the Senate passed the bill, and the House concurred in it, there was an end of the objection. The origin of the bill could never be inquired into hereafter.

Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN regarded the constitutional difficulty as altogether insuperable. Having taken a solemn oath to support the constitution, he could not, however agreeable to his wishes, give his assent to a measure originating in the Senate, in violation of its express provisions.

Mr. BIBB considered it clear that a bill to reduce the revenue might originate in the Senate. Such a bill could not be called a bill to raise revenue; and this distinction had already been sanctioned by the Senate.

Mr. DICKERSON said a single word would destroy that distinction in the present case. If this bill passed, under what law would revenue be raised after 1842, excepting the present, which provided for duties of twenty per cent. after that period?

Mr. WILKINS moved an adjournment, which was lost—yeas 14, nays 81.

Mr. SMITH modified his proposition to amend, by moving to strike out the whole of the second section of the bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the 14th of July aforesaid, as fixes the rate of duty on all milled and fulled cloth, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or Kendal cottons, of which wool is the only material, the value whereof does not exceed thirty-five cents a square yard, at five per cent. ad valorem, shall be, and the same is, hereby repealed. And the said articles shall be subject to the same duty of fifty per cent. as is provided by the said second section for other manufactures of wool; which duty shall be liable to the same deductions as are prescribed by the first section of this act.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to this section, and, therefore, in favor of striking it out. He said it was contrary to the whole tenor and policy of the bill, and presented the strange contradiction of multiplying duties tenfold, upon an article of prime necessity, used exclusively by the laboring part of the community, while reducing duties, or abolishing them in toto, upon every article used by the rich and luxurious. Silks were to be free; cambrics and fine linens were to be free; muslins, and cassimeres, and broadcloths were to be reduced; but the coarse woollens, worn by the laborers of every color and every occupation, of every sex and of every age, bond or free—these coarse woollens, necessary to shelter them from cold and damp, are to be put up tenfold in point of tax, and the cost of procuring them doubled to the wearer. He showed the annual amount of the tax to be imposed by this section. It applied to the woollen goods costing less than thirty-five cents the square yard; the annual importation of that description of goods was shown in the custom-house returns to be one million and fifty thousand dollars' worth. The tax on that amount would be fifty thousand dollars by the bill of 1832; it will be five hundred thousand dollars if this section is retained; with the chance of coming down, by small periodical reductions, to two hundred thousand dollars in 1842. Thus, a tax on a necessary of life—on an article exclusively used by the poor and the laborer—is to be raised tenfold off hand, for the chance of coming down to fourfold in nine years. But it never will come down to fourfold. Whether the act goes into full effect, and works through its destined term of nine years, and attains its promised glory in 1842; or whether it is broken up before the period of gestation is half out, the result, in either event, will be the same to these coarse woollens. If the act is broken, the duties, in their descending course, will be stopped at thirty-five or thirty-eight per cent.; if the act is carried out, then the home valuation, provided for in this bill, will attach upon these woollens as the standard of their value. The American value, and not the foreign cost, will be the basis of computation for the twenty per cent. The difference, when all is fair, is about thirty-five per cent. in the value; so that an importation of coarse woollens, costing one million in Europe, and now to pay five per cent. on that cost, will be valued, if all is fair, at one million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and the twenty per cent. will be calculated on that sum, and will give two hundred and seventy thousand dollars, instead of two hundred thousand dollars, for the quantum of the tax. It will be near sixfold, instead of fourfold, and that if all is fair; but if there are gross errors or gross frauds in the valuation, as every human being knows there must be, the real tax may be far above sixfold. On this very floor, and in this very debate, we hear it computed, by way of recommending this bill to the manufacturers, that the twenty per cent. on the statute book will exceed thirty in the custom-house.

Mr. B. animadverted on the reason which was alleged for this extraordinary augmentation of duties in a bill which was to reduce duties. The reason was candidly expressed on this floor. There were a few small manufactories of these woollens in Connecticut; and unless these manufactories be protected by an increase of duties, certain members avow their determination to vote against the whole bill! This is the secret—no! not a secret, for it is proclaimed. Two or three little factories in Connecticut must be protected; and that by imposing an annual tax upon the wearers of these coarse woollens of four or five times the value of the fee-simple estate of the factories. Better far, as a point of economy and justice, to purchase them and burn them. The whole American system is to be given up in the year 1842; and why impose an annual tax of near five hundred thousand dollars, upon the laboring community, to prolong, for a few years, a few small branches of that system, when the whole bill has the axe to the root, and nods to its fall? But, (said Mr. B.,) these manufactories of coarse woollens, to be protected by this bill, are not even American manufactories; they are rather Asiatic establishments in America; for they get their wool from Asia, and not from America. The importation of this wool is one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds weight; it comes chiefly from Smyrna, and costs less than eight cents a pound. It was made free of duty at the last session of Congress, as an equivalent to these very manufactories for the reduction of the duty on coarse woollens to five per cent. The two measures went together, and were, each, a consideration for the other. Before that time, and by the act of 1828, this coarse wool was heavily dutied for the benefit of the home wool growers. It was subjected to a double duty, one of four cents on the pound, and the other of fifty per cent. on the value. As a measure of compromise, this double duty was abolished at the last session. The wool for these factories was admitted duty free, and, as an equivalent to the community, the woollens made out of the corresponding kind of wool were admitted at a nominal duty. It was a bargain, entered into in open Congress, and sealed with all the forms of law. Now, in six months after the bargain was made, it is to be broken. The manufacturers are to have the duty on woollens run up to fifty per cent. for protection, and are still to receive the foreign wool free of duty. In plain English, they are to retain the pay which was given them for reducing the duties on these coarse woollens, and they are to have the duties restored.

Mr. B. considered this increase of duties on this particular article as the most offensive part of the bill. It not only restored the old duty but made it higher than it ever was before, higher than it was in the acts of 1824-'28; higher than it ever had been on the American statute book; and this purely and simply for protection, as it is avowed and proclaimed on this floor.

Mr. Wabster said, the constitutional question must be regarded as important; but it was one which could not be settled by the Senate. It was purely a question of privilege, and the decision of it belonged alone to the House. The Senate, by the constitution, could not originate bills for raising revenue. It was of no consequence whether the rate of duty were increased or decreased; if it was a money bill, it belonged to the House to originate it. In the House there was a Committee of Ways and Means organized expressly for such objects. There was no such committee of the Senate. The constitutional provision was taken from the practice of the British Parliament, whose usages were well known to the framers of the constitution, with the modification that the Senate might alter and amend money bills, which was denied by the House of Commons to that of Lords. This subject belonged exclusively to the House of Representatives. The attempt to evade the question by contending that the present bill was intended for protection and not revenue, afforded no relief, for it was protection by means of revenue. It was not the less a money bill from its object being protection. After 1842 this bill would raise the revenue, or it would not be raised by existing laws. He was altogether opposed to the provisions of this bill; but this objection was one which it belonged to the House to make.

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties—Compromise Bill.

Mr. CLAY said, the question had been decided again and again that the Senate might originate a bill of such a character. The main object in the bill was not revenue, but protection. He hoped on this occasion the Senate would exercise the power it had heretofore done in favor of this bill, which was regarded on all sides as a measure of conciliation and compromise. He regretted that any objection should have arisen from any quarter to the beneficent action of the Senate upon this distracting subject. He flattered himself that the passage of this bill would again bring the citizens of the various sections of the country together like a band of brothers. Would the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) send his bill forth alone without this measure of conciliation? He hoped not. He feared such a course would not calm the agitations which now convulse the nation and threaten the integrity of the Union.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) had spoken of the bill which had been reported from the Judiciary Committee as his bill. It was no more his bill than it was that gentleman's. The Senator from Kentucky had expressed himself to be as much in favor of that bill as he had himself. The only difference between them in this particular was, that he happened to have been a member of the committee from which the bill had been reported. He had no objection to conciliation, which had been so much spoken of. He objected to this measure, not because it was a measure of conciliation, but because it was one the country would never consent to see carried out. Upon proper principles, he would go as far in favor of conciliation as any man. The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) says the object of the bill is protection, and therefore it is not a bill to raise revenue. Can such considerations be gone into in determining the constitutionality of a measure? This is the very doctrine of the South Carolina ordinance. The bill before us illustrates its absurdity. The gentleman from Kentucky supports it from one motive; others, from another motive. One, because it secures protection; another, because it destroys protection. One half of its friends vote for it with the sole view to protection; the other half because it only raises revenue. It is impossible to settle grave constitutional questions upon principles which can never be known but to the Searcher of hearts.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out the third and sixth sections of the bill, which attempt to bind all future Congresses until the year 1842, was negatived, as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wilkins, Wright—28.

Reduction of Drawback in proportion to the reduction of Duty.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by adding a new section, the object of which was to make a reduction of the drawbacks allowed on the exportation of articles manufactured in the United States from foreign materials subject to duty, in the same proportion as the reduction made in the duties by this bill.

Mr. B. said that this motion did not extend to the general system of drawbacks, but only to those special cases in which the exporter was authorized to draw from the treasury the amount of money which he had paid into it on the importation of the materials which he had manufactured. The amount of drawback to be allowed in every case had been adjusted to the amount of duty paid; and as all these duties were to be periodically reduced by the bill, it would follow, as a natural consequence, that the drawback should undergo equal reductions at the same time. Mr. B. would illustrate his motion by stating a single case—the case of refined sugar. The drawback payable on this sugar was five cents a pound. These five cents rested upon a duty of three cents, now payable on the importation of foreign brown sugar. It was ascertained that it required nearly two pounds of brown sugar to make a pound of refined sugar, and five cents was held to be the amount of duty paid on the quantity of brown sugar which made the pound of refined sugar. It was simply a reimbursement of what he had paid. By this bill the duty of foreign brown sugar will be reduced immediately to two and a half cents a pound, and afterwards will be periodically reduced until the year 1842, when it will be but six-tenths of a cent—very little more than one-sixth of the duty when five cents the pound were allowed for a drawback. Now, if the drawback is not reduced in proportion to the reduction of the duty on the raw sugar, two very injurious consequences will result to the public: first, that a large sum of money will be annually taken out of the treasury in gratuitous bounties to sugar refiners; and next, that the consumers of refined sugar will have to pay more for American refined sugar than foreigners will; for the refiners, getting a bounty of five cents a pound on all that is exported, will export all, unless the American consumer will pay the bounty also. Mr. B. could not undertake to say how much money would be drawn from the treasury, as a mere bounty, if this amendment did not prevail. It must, however, be great. The drawback was now frequently a hundred thousand dollars a year, and great frauds were committed to obtain it. Frauds to the amount of forty thousand dollars a year had been detected, and this while the inducement was small and inconsiderable; but, as fast as that inducement swells from year to year, the temptation to commit frauds must increase; and the amount drawn by fraud, added to that drawn by the letter of the law, must be enormous. Mr. B. did not think it necessary to illustrate his motion by further examples, but said there were other cases which would be as strong as that of refined sugar; and justice to the public required all to be checked at once, by adopting the amendment he had offered.

After a few words from Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. SMITH, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. FOOT, and Mr. MILLER, the question was decided by

The question was then put on the third reading of the bill, and carried, without a division being called.

MONDAY, February 25.

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties—Compromise Bill.

Mr. CLAY rose and stated, that inasmuch as it was represented that the House of Representatives had just now passed a bill, similar, if not identical, in its provisions to the one before the Senate, and it was believed it would, tomorrow, be presented to the Senate to sanction, it would obviate the reasons for a longer continuance of a laborious day's session of this body, and also supersede the objections of some Senators, who believed the Senate was not the proper place for the origin of this bill. He, therefore, moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was carried, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 26.

The Tariff.

The bill from the House of Representatives to modify the existing tariff, (Mr. CLAY's bill, which was introduced yesterday in the House, and passed to-day,) was brought into the Senate, by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, with a message from the House, requesting the concurrence of the Senate thereto; and the bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.*

Mr. CLAY then observed, that he had no disposition, without the assent of the Senate, to hasten the bill. He left it to them to say whether it should be read a second time that evening. There was no necessity, he presumed, to refer it to a committee, as the same bill, in terms, had been before a select one, and sufficiently discussed; and, indeed, the rules of the Senate did not require it. He would be satisfied with acting on it to-morrow, or the next day.

Objection being made to its second reading to-day,

The bill introduced by Mr. CLAY, to modify the tariff, which was before the Senate when it adjourned yesterday, then came up as the unfinished business, and was ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, February 27.

The Tariff.

The bill from the House of Representatives, to modify the act of the 14th of July, and other acts imposing duties on imports, was taken up, in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY moved that the bill be reported to the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY inquired if the Senator from Kentucky had examined the bill to ascertain if it was the same as the bill which had been before the Senate.

Mr. CLAY replied in the affirmative; and said, that he believed it corresponded word for word with the other bill.

The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time.

American State Papers.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to postpone the preceding orders, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution extending the subscription made to the compilation of documents, now in progress by Gales and Seaton, to the continuation of the same; which was agreed to.

The resolution was then read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HILL asked what was the cost of the documents already printed.

Mr. ROBBINS said he was not prepared to answer.

The resolution was then reported without amendment.

* This bill from the House was the compromise bill of Mr. Clay in the Senate, which, meeting a fatal objection to its origination in the Senate, on account of the clause raising revenue, was transferred to the House, to be thence sent to the Senate. Mr. Letcher, of Kentucky, proposed it as an amendment to the tariff bill then depending in the House, reported by Mr. Verplanck of New York; and being adopted, became the bill of the House, and as such went back to the Senate for concurrence.

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties—Nullification.—Compromise Bill.

[SENATE.]

The question being on the third reading of the resolution, Mr. HILL asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Grundy, Hill, King, Moore, White—9.

So the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

FRIDAY, March 1.

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties—Nullification—Compromise Bill.

The bill for modifying the duties on imports, as passed by the House of Representatives, (in effect, Mr. CLAY's bill,) being read the third time, and put on its passage—

Mr. ROBBINS said he had returned to his first impressions, which were unfavorable to this project; he doubted his own, because some friends, to whom he had been in the habit of deferring much, had different impressions. But reflection has satisfied me (said Mr. R.) that my own impressions were right; and though the amendments to the bill have weakened, they have not removed them. I cannot dissemble my dislike of the bill, notwithstanding the temporary political good effect it may, by some, be expected to produce; nor can I refrain from stating the grounds of that dislike, or at least the more prominent grounds.

The bill carries with it the idea that the protective policy is an evil in itself; an evil to be deprecated, and not to be tolerated for a moment, but to prevent a greater evil—namely, the evil of a sudden overthrow of the great establishments dependent upon it; and to be tolerated only for a few short years, to give an opportunity to those establishments to wind up their affairs, and enable them, so far as that time will enable them, to prevent the consummation of their total ruin. The bill thus considers this protective policy as a great state criminal, condemned to die, but whose sentence is respite for a few days, to give him time to arrange his affairs, repent him of his evil deeds, and prepare for death; but whose doom is fixed, and irrevocably die he must. Such an idea going out to the country, I think, must be pernicious in its effects, especially as it goes out from the professed friends, or some of them, of the policy, with its great champion at their head. It must repress the spirit of adventure; it must depreciate the value of those establishments; it must arrest the progress of the business at the point where it now is; no more capital will be invested in it; and the capital already invested will be withdrawn, as far and as fast as it can be. The tide will have reached its high-water mark; it will now turn back and fall to low ebb, perhaps never to recommence its flood. These great establishments, so widely spread over the country, with all the industry dependent upon them, will be kept in a feverish lingering state of existence, suspended between hope and fear; with much to alarm their fears, with little to animate their hopes. It cannot be but this languishing state must ensue; for we all know how feeble is the hand, when not seconded and invigorated by the impulses of the heart.

But I have risen, mainly, to contribute, so far as my poor efforts could contribute, to correct the impression given by the bill to the prejudice of this policy. The protective policy an evil in itself! I would be glad to know if any gentleman here will tell me that the immense resources of this great country are never to be developed; and, if to be developed, if they can be, without the aid of Government? And then, if this aid can be afforded by any means other than the protective policy? The boundless resources in our agriculture, with its infinite capabilities; our resources in our mineral wealth; our resources in artificial power by water and by steam; our boundless resources in the manual labor of our many and rapidly increasing millions of people; the resources in the great capital of this country; in the skill acquired and to be acquired; but, above all, in the enterprise and inventive genius of the most enterprising and inventive people that perhaps ever existed on earth—are these resources never to be developed? However we may differ in opinion as to the best means of their development, as to our interest in the object itself we cannot differ; that must be the same everywhere—in the South and in the North, in the West and in the East. All parts abound with these resources; all are interested in their development. The country is unfaithful to herself, unfaithful to her people, if she do not adopt the means necessary to their development. I ask, again, can this development be effected without the aid of Government? Will any one tell me it can be effected by a system of free trade?—a trade free on one side, and restricted on the other?—free to us by all the world, and restricted by all the world against us? And this is all the free trade we can have. Free trade to develop our resources! Were it not for the respect I bear to some respectable patrons of that opinion, I would say, that such a thesis is only fit to be maintained by school-boys, as an exercise of the schools. How it can be attempted to be maintained by men, enlightened by experience, acquainted with the state of the world, and capable of reflection, is to me incomprehensible. Let them tell me, if they can, how this free trade system can be an efficient instrument of this development? How it touches, or can be ever made to touch, a hundredth part of these resources? They might as well undertake to tell me how a settler in the woods might fell the forest around him with a penknife, and let in the sun to develop the resources of the fertile earth.

I think a little reflection will satisfy any one that our great resources must forever remain dormant if they are to wait their development from the operations of free trade. But by the aid of Government they may be rapidly and fully developed; and by means so obvious, so direct, and so adequate, that nothing appears to me so unaccountable as the struggle that is made to prevent their adoption; or to get rid of them, so far as they have been adopted. It is only to give to the industry, the capital, and the enterprise of the country, the market of the country, and the work is accomplished, or in a train of rapid accomplishment. The result is necessary; if we look into the cause, we see it must be necessary; we see there a force that must have this effect. A market is the mighty power that is to perform this mighty work; and there are no limits to this power when created by this policy. The market brings forth your resources, and your resources augment the market; the action and the reaction are reciprocal, and the reciprocal effect is as unlimited as your resources themselves. The stream does not flow with more certainty from its fountain, and roll on to the ocean, than the development of all our resources would flow, from the operation of the simple expedient of giving to the industry of the country the market of the country.

Is it wise, then, to tell this country, as this bill seems to tell them, that this policy, so benevolent in its effects, so almighty, I might almost say, in its benevolent effects, is an evil in itself; and to be got rid of as soon as it can be under existing circumstances? I think not.

Again: this bill, if it is to be the permanent system of the country, (and there is nothing in it that implies the contrary; that is what it professes to be on its face,) it does propose that the country shall take security against the country—not to pursue any further, after the 30th of June, 1842, the great work of developing her own resources; to which work a system of protection is indispensable. For I have not heard one gentleman, either friend or foe to it, say that this bill would afford a system of protection; nor is it possible that any one should say this, and speak from knowledge of the subject.

But it has only been said, in its favor, first, that it preserves the principle of protection. Now, what signifies it to preserve the principle of protection, if protection itself is not preserved? If the principle is so limited and restricted in its exercise, as it is in this bill, that it cannot give protection, it might as well be out of the bill as in it. It is nugatory as to the great object. And then, it is said that the bill, as it is, will protect some branches of industry. True, it may some—a few. I think it probable that some few fragments of the system will remain, and survive the shock of 1842; but the system itself will be gone; and with it will be gone the necessary means to the great end of developing the resources of the country, which, as I have so often said, can only be found in a system, a complete system, of protection. They never can be found in a few fragments of a system. Then, in 1842, the barriers are to be broken down, and our markets are to be thrown open to the world, while the markets of the world are to remain closed against us, as they now are. Then will commence the glorious era of free trade, and its reign, by the bill, thereafter is to be everlasting. The 30th of June, 1842, will be to England a day of jubilee, such as she has rarely witnessed; the prospect of that day will infuse a lively joy into every British bosom; for that day is to let in and give to her industry, while it takes from our own, the supply of the wants of eighteen millions of people, and on her own terms.

"What shame, what loss is this to Greece! what joy To Troy's proud monarch, and the friends of Troy!"

If we were now at war with Great Britain, and if by the fortune of that war this country was subdued, and at the mercy of Great Britain; (I ask pardon of my country for supposing an event of the contest which I know would be impossible;) in that event, the worst we should have to apprehend from our conquerors would be, that very condition which we are going to impose upon ourselves. The greatest calamity that foreign war and foreign subjugation could inflict, is going to be inflicted on the country by the country herself. What, then, Great Britain, with her thousand ships, with her Wellington, and her Wellington armies, and by a ten years' war, could not acquire to herself, she is going to secure to herself by one single act of our own folly. Her young and gigantic rival, and the only rival she now dreads, whose eagle she has seen taking his flights with many a jealous pang, that young and gigantic rival is going to relieve her from all her inquietudes, by becoming her tributary. We may, then, bid adieu to all those visions of glory in which we have so fondly indulged, as connected with our future destinies, and take an humble rank with the tributary nations of the earth; tributary to a nation who has the wisdom to adhere to a policy which we have the folly to reject, and shall have renounced forever.

I know it is said this bill is not to be what it professes to be—a permanent system for this country. But, if this system is to be adopted, and then to be destroyed, who are to destroy it? We, the friends of the policy, are to destroy it—we are to wage the war—we are to make the attack—we are to obtain the conquest over it. Now, I had rather be in a condition to have to defend our own possessions, than to have to attack and conquer those of the enemy. I do not like the idea of first giving up our possessions, and then of going to war in order to recover them back. The event of that war depends upon the uncertain contingencies of the uncertain future; and I see nothing in the hopes resting on those contingencies to countervail the force of my contrary fears, and to quiet my mind on the subject.

MARCH, 1833.] Public Lands : Distribution of the proceeds of the Sales among the States.

[SENATE.]

It is said, too, that the treasury is in danger of a plethora, from a surplus, or accumulating surpluses, of revenue; that this danger must be obviated by graduating our income to the wants of the Government. Wants of the Government! These must depend upon the objects of expenditure by the Government; and these must be determined by the wisdom and discretion of Congress, hereafter, as well as now; they cannot be prescribed and limited by us. If an overflowing treasury be an evil, it will be time enough to apply a remedy when the evil exists. At present it does not exist, nor can we know with certainty that it will exist hereafter. But is an overflowing treasury an evil? and such an evil, that all the great interests of the country, involved in the development of her great resources, must be sacrificed to its prevention? An evil! Who feels this surplus of revenue, if there should be a surplus, as a burden? From whom does it abstract one necessary of life, one comfort, one luxury? Not an individual in this country. The revenues of this country are no more felt as a burden upon them, by the people of this country, than the dews of heaven are felt as a burden upon them; they are alike unconscious of both; and no one would think of the former as a burden, but for the metaphysics employed to prove it to be a burden. What sort of burden is that which is felt only by the aid of metaphysics, and then only by the aid of imagination?

I hope we shall consider, and, if we do not, that a future Congress will consider, the great and glorious objects yet to be accomplished by this Government, and to which these surpluses will be necessary—objects of national improvement, demanded by the geographical situation of the country, and which constitute, in fact, one of her great resources yet to be developed; and the establishments, too, necessary to develop the resources of the mind of the country—if she should deem it worthy of her ambition to aspire to the most glorious of all fame, the fame which mind confers by her immortal works. Believe me, the establishments necessary to this glorious end are yet to be created. Little views to little savings, very proper for petty corporations, are not the views proper to the statesman in the American Congress. These ought to be large and prospective, and to correspond to the grandeur of the trust committed to his charge; otherwise he runs the risk of dwarfing the country born of gigantic proportions to the littleness of his little views. The prospect of these surpluses, then, far from embarrassing, rejoices me; for I see in them the means to great and desirable ends, and without occasioning a particle of grievance or inconvenience to the people.

I know it is said, too, that the dissolution of the Union is threatened, and that this bill is necessary to hold the States together. Yet it is said, in the same breath, that this bond is no bond, and is represented as frangible as the flax scorched by the fire. The tendency to fly off from the Union, I should hope, was not very strong, if it could be overcome and constrained by so frail a ligature. But to be serious: this very argument is what alarms me most as to the stability and efficiency of this Union. Here, in this body, we have seen an inherent power claimed for the States unknown to the constitution, and incompatible with it, and to be despotic over this Union. We have seen a State arm herself with this power, and put herself in an attitude to exert it. That State hath neither disarmed herself nor renounced this power. Now we offer to her this bill to induce her, not to renounce this power, but to refrain from its exercise at present. Is not this a practical recognition of this fatal power? What is to hinder this State from resuming this attitude hereafter? What is to hinder any other from assuming the same attitude, by this power to wrest from the General Government any one of its powers, or, what amounts to the same thing, prevent its exercise? In that case, by this precedent, we are either to yield the disputed power, or to buy off the Union by a compromise. If this precedent is to govern hereafter, where is the security for the stability or efficiency of this Union? I cannot see.

This bill, however, I suppose, is to pass, notwithstanding all these considerations, and the many others that have been urged with so much more ability. If it does pass, it may smother the fire now raging in one place, but I fear it will preserve the embers that one day will consume the fabric of the Union.

[Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Frelinghuysen, Mr. Dallas, Mr. Ewing of Ohio, Mr. Mangum of North Carolina, Mr. John M. Clayton of Delaware, Mr. Webster, Mr. Silsbee of Massachusetts, Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Sprague, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Silas Wright, Mr. Bibb, and Mr. Clay, made brief expositions of their personal sentiments towards the bill, or of its practical working on certain points; after which the vote was taken, and the bill passed by the following vote:]

a favorite point with him, yet as he had found that he was differing on this topic with some of his friends, and as it had been suggested that there might be difficulty in another quarter if the words struck out by the House were retained, he would move to concur in the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON expressed a hope that the question would not be pressed at this late hour, in so thin a Senate, when many were absent who are so much interested in the measure.

Mr. CLAY expressed his regret that, at this late period of the session, the Senator from Illinois should wish for delay, which might endanger the passage of the bill. It was not the fault of the members present that there are so many absentees.

He wished to take the question to-night, in order that the Executive might have time to act upon the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he should vote against the amendment. He would rather vote against the bill than take it with the amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion to concur, and decided by

And at 11 o'clock the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 2.

Evening Session.

On motion of Mr. DUDLEY, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

When the doors were re-opened, Mr. CLAY was found speaking. He was engaged in expressing his approbation of the conduct of the President pro tempore of this body. The present, he said, had been a very arduous session. He should not have voted for the present presiding officer, had he been present when he was elected; nor did he mean to say what would be his vote, if the election were now to be made. But he gave with great pleasure his testimony in favor of the faithful, and able, and impartial manner in which that officer had performed his duty. He concluded with asking leave to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to th Honorable HUGH L. WHITE, for the dignity, ability, and impartiality, with which he has discharged the duties of President pro tempore of the Senate.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

About half-past four o'clock, A. M., a committee on the part of the Senate was appointed to join such committee as the House might appoint, to wait on the President, and inform him that the two Houses were ready to adjourn.

The House having appointed a committee, the joint committee waited on the President, and returned with an answer that he had no further communication to make; whereupon,

Mr. KING moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WHITE (President pro tempore) then rose and addressed the Senate, as follows:

Before the presiding officer leaves the chair, he is desirous of saying a few words.

We met under circumstances calculated to induce us to believe that matters of high excitement would arise during our sojourn here. It was by the will of the majority of this body that I was placed in this chair, to preside over your deliberations. I looked upon the high honor thus conferred to be but temporary; for could I then have foreseen that I was to act in this capacity until now, most certainly my distrust of my experience would have induced me to shrink from undertaking the task. The duties of the Chair are at all times arduous, but the more particularly so when topics of high interest and importance are under discussion. My experience, however, has convinced me that even under these circumstances, the presiding officer may have a pleasant task to perform, when every member submits himself to be guided by the rules of this body, instead of having a law for himself.

I take pleasure in stating, that during the whole course of the session, no act has been done by any one member, and no single expression has reached my ear, calculated to give pain to the presiding officer. If, in the discharge of the duties confided to me, I have had the misfortune to injure or to wound the feelings of any individual, I trust he will do me the justice to believe that it has happened without any intention on my part. I have endeavored to act impartially towards every member of this body; and I would have them to bear in mind, that if, during the arduous duties I have had to perform, and amidst all the excitements that have existed, any thing like order has been preserved, it must be attributed more to the kindness and courtesy of Senators towards the presiding officer, than to the capacity which he was able to bring to the duties assigned him. It is not probable, in the course of human events, that we can all ever assemble in this chamber again. I shall, after putting the question, take a farewell of all who are here present, and I feel regret that I cannot exchange good wishes with those who are absent; hoping that it may be our good fortune all to meet again.

The President then put the question on adjournment, which was carried, nemine dissentiente; and

The Senate, at five o'clock, A. M., adjourned sine die.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 3, 1882.

At 12 o'clock Mr. Speaker STEVENSON took the chair, and called the House to order.

The Clerk having called over the roll, one hundred and sixty-five members answered to their names; which being a quorum, a message was ordered to be sent to the Senate announcing that the House of Representatives was organized, and ready to proceed to business.

Death of Mr. Doddridge.

Mr. MERCKE rose and observed, that it was his melancholy duty to announce to the House the decease of his lamented colleague, the Honorable PHILIP DODDRIDGE, and to offer a resolution, assuring the friends of the deceased, and the country at large, of the sense entertained by this House of the loss it had sustained. In performing this duty, Mr. M. said, that were he to indulge the feeling he possessed of the merits of his departed friend, he should find himself speedily arrested. In intellectual power, that friend had been surpassed by few in this or any other country; in integrity of motive, he was excelled by none; and in simplicity of heart, by no man he had ever known. Mr. M. then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the House of Representatives, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of PHILIP DODDRIDGE, late a member thereof from the State of Virginia, will go in mourning by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm for one month.

The resolution was agreed to.

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 4.

A message was announced from the President of the United States; and Mr. Donelson, his private secretary, delivered to the Chair the message of the President to the two Houses of Congress at the opening of the session. (See Senate Proceedings.)

The message was read, referred to the committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and 10,000 copies ordered to be printed.

Veto of the Harbor Bill.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In addition to the general views I have heretofore expressed to Congress on the subject of internal improvement, it is my duty to advert to it again in stating my objections to the bill entitled "An act for the improvement of certain harbors, and the navigation of certain rivers," which was not received a sufficient time before the close of the last session to enable me to examine it before the adjournment.

Having maturely considered that bill within the time allowed me by the constitution, and being convinced that some of its provisions conflict with the rule adopted for my guide on this subject of legislation, I have been compelled to withhold from it my signature; and it has, therefore, failed to become a law.

To facilitate as far as I can the intelligent action of Congress upon the subjects embraced in this bill, I transmit, herewith, a report from the Engineer Department, distinguishing, as far as the information in its possession would enable it, between those appropriations which do, and those which do not, conflict with the rules by which my conduct in this respect has hitherto been governed. By that report it will be seen that there is a class of appropriations in the bill for the improvement of streams, that are not navigable, that are not channels of commerce, and that do not pertain to the harbors or ports of entry designated by any law, or have any ascertained connection with the usual establishments for the security of commerce, external or internal.

It is obvious that such appropriations involve the sanction of a principle that concedes to the General Government an unlimited power over the subject of internal improvements; and that I could not, therefore, approve a bill containing them, without receding from the positions taken in my veto of the Maysville road bill, and, afterwards, in my annual message of December 7, 1830.

It is to be regretted that the rules by which this classification of the improvements in this bill has been made by the Engineer Department are not more definite and certain, and that embarrassment may not always be avoided by the observance of them; but, as neither my own reflection, nor the lights derived from other sources, have furnished me with a better guide, I shall continue to apply my best exertions to their application and enforcement. In thus employing my best faculties to exercise the powers with which I am invested, to avoid evils, and to effect the greatest attainable good for our common country, I feel that I may trust to your cordial co-operation; and the experience of the past leaves me no room to doubt the liberal indulgence and favorable consideration of those for whom we act.

The grounds upon which I have given my assent to appropriations for the construction of light-houses, beacons, buoys, public piers, and the removal of sand-bars, sawyers, and other temporary or partial impediments in our navigable rivers and harbors, and with which many of the provisions of this bill correspond, have been so fully stated, that I trust a repetition of them is unnecessary. Had there been incorporated in the bill no provisions for works of a different description, depending on principles which extend the power of making appropriations to every object which the discretion of the Government may select, and losing sight of the distinctions between national and local character, which I had stated would be my future guide on the subject, I should have cheerfully signed the bill.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Dec. 6.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the communication be laid on the table and printed; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. WICKLIFFE, who moved its reference to the Committee on Internal Improvement; which was agreed to.

Mr. OLAY, of Alabama, subsequently moved to reconsider the above vote on the ground that the question had not been understood by all the House.

After some conversation between him and Mr. WICKLIFFE, he agreed to postpone the consideration of his motion for reconsideration until to-morrow.

Mr. EVERETT offered the following resolution, which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, as far as the public service will permit, such portions as have not heretofore been communicated, of the instructions given to our ministers in France on the subject of claims for spoiliations, and of the correspondence of said ministers with the French Government, and with the Secretary of State of the United States on the same subject.

The hour appointed for proceeding to the election of a Sergeant-at-arms, having arrived, the House proceeded to the ballot: twenty-six candidates were nominated for the office. After three unsuccessful ballotings, the result on the fourth ballot stood as follows:

For William J. McCormick	-	-	35
William B. Robinson	-	-	29
William A. Gordon	-	-	25
Jonathan Nye	-	-	25
Thomas B. Randolph	-	-	25

And many scattering votes.

The House then adjourned to Monday next.

MONDAY, December 10.

Election of Sergeant-at-arms.

The House then again proceeded to ballot for a Sergeant-at-arms, to supply the vacancy in that office occasioned by the resignation of John Oswald Dunn; and, on the ninth ballot, Thomas B. Randolph, of Virginia, was elected.

TUESDAY, December 11.

Falls of the Ohio.

On motion of Mr. CARR, of Indiana, the petitions of the citizens of the State of Kentucky and Indiana, praying for an appropriation to be made to improve the Indian Chute, through the falls of the Ohio river, which were referred to the Committee on Internal Improvements at the last session of Congress, and not acted upon, are again referred to said committee. In making this motion,

Mr. C. remarked, that it was a subject in which a large portion of the commercial and agricultural community of the West felt a deep interest, and hoped that the action of the House might be had upon it during the present session.

The Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of such portions of the public lands as have been offered at public sale, and have remained unsold for the period of five years and upwards.

Resolved further, That said committee inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the respective States in which they are situated, such portions of the public lands as may have been offered at public sale, and, being subject to private entry, have remained unsold for the period of ten years.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, observed that the resolution involved a very important question—perhaps as important a one as had ever been offered to the consideration of Congress; and he wished that its consideration should be postponed to Monday next. Why was this unceasing demand heard for the relinquishment by the United States of all its public lands? For his own part, he was unable to give any good reason for it; and as he desired time to reflect on the subject of the resolution, he moved its postponement till Monday.

Mr. CLAY said that this was a species of opposition, and at a stage of the resolution, which he had not anticipated. The resolution proposed a simple inquiry, and did not go to commit the House. What injury could result from confiding such an inquiry to one of the standing committees of the House? Was the gentleman unwilling that even an inquiry should be instituted? Was he unwilling to hear a report from one of the committees of the House? He would not at present urge the considerations which in his judgment ought to induce Congress to concede to the new States all they asked on this subject. Were this the proper time, he could urge the many and great disadvantages under which the new States labored from having a large part of their territory beyond the reach of their taxation for revenue; and he was prepared to show, from the documentary evidence, that for a large portion of the public domain it was impossible that the Government should ever obtain even the minimum price allowed by law. But he should not press those topics now. He hoped the resolution would not be postponed.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied to Mr. CLAY, and was proceeding to show that the old States had as great a right to retain, as the new States to claim, the public domain; and should those lands be ceded, the old States would experience as much injury as the new States could obtain benefit; but

The CHAIR arrested the discussion, as going into the merits on a question of postponement.

Mr. WILLIAMS having demanded the yeas and nays on his motion to postpone, they were taken; and stood—Yeas 106, Nays 78.

MONDAY, December 17.

Federal Courts—Expenses.

Mr. VERPLANCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report what law or other regulation may be necessary for diminishing the annual expenses of holding the Supreme, Circuit, and District Courts of the United States, &c., including the contingent charges of the Judiciary establishment, and the expenses of suits and prosecutions chargeable to the United States.

Mr. V. said that this resolution was offered in consequence of an item in the bill just reported by himself. That bill contained an additional appropriation for the various expenses of the courts of the United States, and of suits and prosecutions chargeable to Government during the present year, in addition to the annual appropriation made for that purpose at the last session. As that appropriation was now exhausted, and as a further grant seemed absolutely necessary for the ordinary operation of the courts, the committee had no hesitation in now recommending the allowance of the sum requested by the department. But in examining the causes of the deficiency, and comparing the expenses of several years last past, they had perceived that for several years there has been a large and continual increase of these expenses; and this, so far as they could ascertain, from circumstances on which the Treasury Department could have little or no control. One large item of this increase was in the District of Columbia. The special committee who had prepared, and were about to report a code for the government of this district, (as the Committee of Ways and Means were informed,) were about to propose a remedy for this evil. The committee, in the hope that a similar remedy might be extended to the general judicial system, had determined to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the subject in a special manner.

The resolution was agreed to.

Lien Laws in behalf of Builders.

The lien bill, (giving to workmen within the District of Columbia, engaged in building a house, and those who furnished the materials, a lien upon the house when built,) having been read a second time—

Mr. WASHINGTON said that the bill had been brought forward last session. The measure which it advocated was one which had met with the universal approbation of the mechanics and tradesmen of the city of Washington. It was a bill projected for the purpose of protecting those persons, and others of the city, from a species of fraud which had been frequently practised upon them by persons, whose affairs were in a state of bankruptcy, purchasing land on mortgage, building upon it, and then selling the property, leaving the workmen and those who supplied the building materials unpaid. The bill had been prepared with great care and attention, at the unanimous request of the people of Washington city; and, in the framing of it, it was endeavored so to do it that every class might be provided for; and it was done at the instance of men of respectability. The city had been liable to great impositions. Owing to the circumstances of its being the seat of Government, and other causes, persons had come to it from all parts of the globe; adventurers had undertaken contracts which they were unable to fulfil, and thus brought ruin upon themselves and others. For the injury done the adventurers cared but little; many of them had no characters to lose; and all they had to do was to try their fortunes elsewhere; but, whilst speculators might come to the city, and undertake work, frequently absconding and leaving the demands of both the tradesman and the mechanic unsatisfied, it seemed to him to be requisite that the mechanic and tradesman should have security against this species of fraud.

Mr. ROOR said he believed the gentleman was mistaken as to one fact in what he had said relative to the operation and extent of the lien laws. The gentleman had said that the law proposed in the bill, then offered to the House, was the same as those of New York and Philadelphia. Of the existence of such a law in Philadelphia, he (Mr. R.) had heard; he did not know if it was so; but as to the State of New York, he did know that application had been made for the passage of such a law, and to apply it to the cities and villages, as well as to the city of New York; but the applicants failed of success. With the details of the present bill he was unacquainted; nor had he been able to ascertain precisely what they were, although the bill had been read by the clerk. As far as he understood, however, it was proposed to give to the laborers, as well as to those who furnished the materials, a lien on the houses which they built; which mortgage was to remain for a definite time—for two or three years; and whosoever purchased the house was bound to pay up all this variety of mortgages, from the pane of glass in the windows to the hob-nail driven into the wall. Such a law would not be for the interest either of the mechanic or the proprietor, whilst it would injure the purchaser, and stop the growth of the city, if property should be thus encumbered. Other laborers had no such security. He believed the lots of the city were sufficiently mortgaged already to admonish purchasers, without superadding mortgages on the nails, glass, and hinges, as well as the shingles and timber, with which the houses were erected. And how were the purchasers to know how many mortgages a house was encumbered with? He did not know that any provision was made in the bill for registering these mortgages. If there was not, how were purchasers to be advised as to the responsibilities they had to assume? He (Mr. R.) thought it would be an incumbrance to builders, and an objection to purchasing any house until after the lapse of the time when the purchaser might come in, secure from a mortgage on his purchase, for a pane of glass or a hundred four-penny nails.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for its third reading.

THURSDAY, December 27.

General Macomb.

The bill for the relief of General Macomb came up for its third reading.

[This bill proposes, only, in so many words, to release General Macomb from all responsibility as the security of Samuel Champlain, in a bond given by him, as paymaster in the army, bearing date 8th May, 1811; but the report accompanying the bill has reference to certain brevet pay due to General Macomb, as constituting an offset in his favor as the surety of Champlain.]

Mr. SEMMES observing that the bill contained a very important principle, desired to hear something more in explanation of its provisions, before he was prepared to vote upon it.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, agreed with Mr. SEMMES, and considered the bill as one which went to establish a principle that would, by releasing securities, if carried out, destroy the security of the Government for moneys due to the Government by principals.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, thought that, when the facts were understood, none could object to the bill. Dozens of similar cases had been provided for by special legislation. General Macomb had been security for an officer who had become a defaulter to the Government; the Government had suffered the case to remain many years without prosecuting, and, in the meanwhile, had promoted the officer. General Macomb had been ordered to a distance in his country's service, and had no opportunity of urging the officers of Government to do their duty in the case, and he ought not to suffer for the negligence of the Government.

Mr. SEMMES thought the statement given was sufficient proof that the bill ought never to have gone to the Military Committee. It was not a military subject, but more properly pertained to the Committee on Claims or that on the Judiciary.

Mr. VANCE, perceiving that there had been some misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman (Mr. WARD) who had drawn up the report, as to the views of the Military Committee, intended to have been embodied in it, moved to postpone the consideration of the bill for one week; which was agreed to.

FRIDAY, December 28.

The Tariff—Reduction of Duties.

Mr. VERPLANCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to such further reduction in the revenues as may not be required for objects of general welfare and public defence, authorized by the constitution, made a report, intended to accompany the bill (reported from the Committee of Ways and Means yesterday) to reduce and otherwise to alter the duties on imports; which report was read, and committed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved for the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the report. This motion, by rule, lies one day on the table.

Reduction of Postage.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. E. EVERETT.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the inexpediency of reducing the rates of postage on letters, pamphlets, and newspapers.

In moving this resolution, Mr. EVERETT observed that the subject had, at the last session, been presented to Congress, by petition, from the portion of the country which he in part represented. He had then urged the justice of the measure recommended. Believing it still both just and peculiarly seasonable, he was induced, in this way, to bring it to the consideration of the House; and, in doing so, he would briefly explain the view which he took of it.

DECEMBER, 1832.]

Reduction of Postage.

[H. or R.]

Few persons who had not turned their attention particularly to the Post Office were aware what a vast and expensive establishment it had become. In giving it this character, however, he by no means intended to say that its operations ought to be contracted; on the contrary, he would go as far as any one in extending the accommodation which it afforded to the people. But the view he took of the subject made it necessary to state the expense at which it is supported; and which, for the year ending July, 1832, amounted to the large sum of 2,266,100 dollars, of which 2,258,570 dollars were actually levied, in the form of postage, during the last year. The entire expense of the navy of the United States is but 3,379,000 dollars, and that of the whole civil list, foreign intercourse and miscellaneous department of the Government is but a trifle over $3,000,000. These comparisons show that the Post Office establishment, if among the most useful, is also among the most expensive establishments of the country.

This expense is not defrayed from the treasury, as that of the other public establishments, but by a specific tax, levied on a portion of the people, viz: those who receive letters and packets by mail, charged with postage. One of the objects to which I wish to draw the attention of the committee is, the inquiry whether, as the Post Office establishment is partly for the service of the public, as well as partly for the accommodation of private individuals, the entire expense of it ought to be thrown upon the latter? And another point of inquiry is, whether the burden of supporting that part which is for private accommodation is fairly apportioned?

If the Government levied no more from the individuals served than it costs the Government to render the service to these individuals, there would, of course, be no cause of complaint. Or, if the state of the treasury required that more should be raised from the payers of postage than the establishment costs to the Government; then if the excess were equitably apportioned among all who pay it, there would be no injustice. But neither of these is true. On the present system, the Government, by penal laws, secures to itself the monopoly of the business, and then charges the expense of carrying it on to a portion only of the people, and, as I think, upon inequitable principles.

In the first place, there is frequently a considerable surplus over and above the whole expense of the establishment: thus, the year before last, there was a surplus of more than 200,000 dollars. In the present state of the treasury there surely can be no reason in raising a revenue of this kind by a Government monopoly.

In the next place, there is a very considerable number of post routes which are unproductive; that is, which cost more to keep up than they yield. The law requires a return to be made to Congress of those that yield less than a third of the cost of maintaining them; but no return is made of all the others, and those which are returned are rarely if ever discontinued. I am not for discontinuing them, unless they are useless or superfluous, as well as unproductive. I am willing to pursue the most liberal policy in multiplying them. But why are unproductive post routes established and kept up? Of course, because the public good, or the interest of the inhabitants on the route requires it, or both. But whether it be one or the other, or both, it is plain that the expense, if not borne by the inhabitants on the route, (those immediately benefited,) should be borne by the public at large, and paid out of the public treasury. It cannot be just to charge it, as we now do, to the individuals who pay postage on some other route, thus making them pay their own postage and that of their fellow-citizens.

Lastly, there is the vast quantity of letters, papers, and documents which are transported free of postage. The whole correspondence of the Government, external and internal, foreign and domestic; the voluminous documents, which we print here by thousands and tens of thousands, and the entire correspondence of seven or eight thousand postmasters; all those are transported free of expense to those who despatch and those who receive them. I am not for curtailing this privilege; it is essential (to some extent) to carry on the public business; and where not essential, it is designed and operates for the benefit of the people. But who ought to pay for it? Somebody must pay for it. We write free on the packets, but when we have done so they acquire no locomotive power; they do not fly through the air; they are carried along and distributed, by the usual means of transportation, to the amount of more tons than I will venture to estimate, in the course of the year. But this transportation, which takes place for the immediate service of the Government and the general accommodation of the people, instead of being paid for by the treasury, is thrown upon one class of the citizens, who are compelled by the Government to pay for carrying their own letters, and then for all the free letters, documents, and packages of the Executive and Legislative Departments. This seems to me unjust and unreasonable in the present condition of the treasury.

I think, therefore, that the cost of the unproductive post roads, instead of being borne by a part of the people, should be borne by the whole—should be a public charge. How much it would amount to in the course of the year I do not know; but the books of the Post Office, I presume, would furnish the amount on inspection.

In the next place, I think the treasury ought to be charged a reasonable sum on account of the transportation of letters and documents free of postage. What would be a reasonable sum depends on the proportion which this part of the transportation by mail bears to all the rest:

I suppose that the two items together would fairly amount, in the present state of affairs, to over a million of dollars annually; that is, to one-half of the present cost of the establishment.

This would, of course, authorize a corresponding reduction in the present rates of postage; a reduction which ought, on every principle of equity, to take place.

In making the reduction, a new graduation of rates of postage might, I think, with propriety be made. I do not pretend that the amount charged can be made in all cases to correspond mathematically with the distance to which the letter is carried; but it seems too wide a departure from this rule, that while a letter from Boston to New Orleans pays but a quarter of a dollar, a letter from Boston to Washington should pay as much. The exaction of double postage for putting your letter into an extra half sheet, or for enclosing a five dollar bill in it, is also, I think, unnecessarily onerous.

The postage on pamphlets and newspapers might likewise be advantageously reduced. It is at present a heavy tax on literature and intelligence, not needed by the treasury. By combining with this reduction the method adopted in England to prevent the letter mail from being overloaded with other articles, or some other method for the same object, I think the convenience and interests of the people would be greatly promoted, and as acceptable a service rendered them as any in our power to render, in the way of reducing and equalizing taxation.

Mr. CONNOR, of North Carolina, said he did not object to the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT); he would, on the contrary, go as far as any body in supporting every practicable reduction of the postage on letters newspapers, pamphlets, &c. If he understood the proposition of the honorable member, it had reference not only to a reduction of the postage, but also to the expediency of throwing the Post Office Department on the public treasury. He thought such a proposition would not be sustained by the House then or at any other time. It never was intended that the Post Office should be a source of revenue; but it was intended that it should bear its own expenses. Contrary to expectation, it had done this and more. At different times a million or two had accrued at the treasury from the Post Office Department; which sum it would have a just right to call on the treasury for at any time when it might be needed. But, as an individual, he was not willing to burden the public treasury with a responsibility for the Post Office Department. The gentleman was well aware how the great amount of surplus has been disposed of; it had been expended in forming routes, and making openings through various sections of the country, to facilitate the communications of the citizens in the different parts of the Union. Last year, up to July, there was a surplus of 200,000 dollars which had been thus applied. In the present year there was said to be a small deficiency of some 5 or 6,000 dollars; but then they were informed that it would exceed by as great an amount the next year.

SATURDAY, December 29.

Reduction of Postage.

The resolution offered by Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, came up.

Mr. WILDE said, the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts was, in effect, to charge the Post Office on the customs. This would be virtually to discharge that House from the further consideration of reducing the duties to that extent. Adding two millions to the duties on imports, in the present state of our affairs, was like throwing water on a drowned man. In Mr. W.'s part of the country the chief distinction recognized among politicians here, was between those who wished less money to be raised by duties, and those who tried to find new ways of spending it. Among the latter class, he was forbidden to rank the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) That gentleman placed his resolution on the footing of its proposing a reduction of oppressive and unequal taxation. He (Mr. W.) accepted the omen. On a proper occasion he should be proud to have the support of the gentleman to that object. He was happy to hear the general principle avowed, though he feared there might arise some unfortunate difference of opinion between them, when they came to its application in detail.

With respect to postage, Mr. W. denied that it could, with propriety, be called a tax. It was not unequal. If it was mostly paid by the inhabitants of cities, they, too, derived the greatest advantages from it. So far as it was a charge on commercial correspondence, the merchants were indemnified by increased facilities afforded to enterprise and speculation. The cities received from abroad the earliest intelligence of events, which regulated prices in our markets, and these were often of sufficient consequence not merely to defray the charge of postage, but to warrant the expense of express. So far as political and literary information was concerned, the publishers of newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets, in the cities, derived the profits of a more extensive demand for their works, which the mail enabled them to circulate more widely.

There seemed to him no more propriety in maintaining that each part of the country should defray the expense of its own post routes, than in saying that the seaboard ought to pay for its own fortifications, and commerce for the navy that protects it.

As to the oppressive character of the charge of postage, he was not apprised that it had ever been complained of. If it had ever been galling, the sore must have grown callous. Providence, it was said, fitted the yoke to the neck; it fitted the neck to the yoke also. This had been worn until it became comparatively easy. Other burdens still touched the quick, and must be got rid of. In this manner the topic of postage had been considered and disposed of by the Committee of Ways and Means; and as he should be sorry to see that disposition of it at present disturbed, he felt bound to say thus much, merely to prevent the opinion of the House being prematurely affected by the great weight to which every thing that fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts was justly entitled.

Mr. HOFFMAN said, the proposition advanced in the gentleman's argument went, if he understood it, to pension the Post Office Department upon the public treasury. Such a scheme contained, at first blush, a manifest impropriety. During the last fifteen years it had been the settled policy of the Government to make this department support itself. It was a settled principle in this country that the transmission of intelligence should never be made a subject of taxation. The proposition in the resolution was, therefore, impolitic; contrary to the fixed policy and principles of this country. But it was quite as unjust as it was impolitic. The principal argument urged by the gentleman in its behalf, and the chief subject of his complaint in the existing state of the department, was the vast inequality of the operation of the present law of postage, the practical effect of which was said to be that the whole expense of the transmission of letters throughout the country was borne by a few persons. Mr. H. did not think that such was the case in point of fact. By whom was the greater part of the postage at present paid? First, by members of the legal profession, who transmitted the necessary papers connected with the causes in which they were engaged; this expense was always charged by the lawyers to their clients, and by them paid. Another class was the printers of newspapers and periodicals, and they charged the postage to their subscribers and customers. A third class consisted of merchants and men of business, and it was well known that postage formed an item of charge in their mutual accounts. The burden, then, fell on wide classes of the community, and was made a practice, as equal in its purpose, as in the nature of things was possible.

But, supposing the project of the gentleman from Massachusetts was adopted, by whom would the amount then be paid? It would be taken from the pockets of hundreds and thousands who had little or no concern in the transmission of letters, papers, or books at all. All these would be made tributary to the expense of an establishment with which they had scarce any thing to do, and from which they derived scarce any sensible benefit. The charge, surely, ought to be borne by those who were directly benefited by the establishment; and if any part of our population should be exempt, it ought to be those who had little or no interest in the transmission of the mails. The gentleman's scheme, instead of remedying, would aggravate and increase any inequality which existed at present. The gentleman complained of gross injustice in compelling the productive mail routes to bear the whole expense of those which were unproductive. But this complaint was as unfounded as the other. If the unproductive routes were to be pensioned upon the treasury, how was the department to ascertain which routes were unproductive and which were not? The reduction of the rates of postage would speedily operate to render many routes unproductive which now supported themselves, and sent a balance to the department. The gentleman would soon find that he had got the department into a situation where its difficulties were far more and greater than ever. Its old difficulties would be increased, and new ones created.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 2.

Reduction of Postage.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. E. EVERETT, coming up,

Mr. EVERETT observed, that though he had not anticipated, in offering this resolution, that it would consume so much of the time of the House, yet he believed the subject to which it referred was of importance enough to deserve all the time which it had occupied, or might yet occupy. He did not himself, however, intend to protract the debate; but as his objects had not been correctly stated, nor his arguments answered by any of the gentlemen who had followed and opposed him, he would trouble the House with a brief additional explanation.

Of the several gentlemen who had spoken against the resolution, not one has attempted to refute the broad principle, that as the Post Office establishment was partly for the public service, and partly for private accommodation, it was not just that the entire expense of it should be charged to one class of private individuals. The gentleman from Georgia (whose ingenuity had not found a reply to one of Mr. E.'s arguments) had said, that the resolution went to charge the Post Office on the customs. This was giving the resolution, to say the least, twice the latitude intended. Mr. E. had intimated only that a part of the expense of the Post Office (that part which was not for the service of the payers of postage) ought to be charged to the people at large; that is, ought to be charged to those for whose good the expense was incurred. The gentleman might call this charging the Post Office on the customs; but, if it were so charged, it would be precisely in the condition of the army, navy, executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government; and, in short, every public institution and establishment. These are all "charged to the customs," precisely because the people of the United States had, from the first, given a preference to indirect taxation, as that method of raising the public revenues, whose burdens were most equally diffused and least felt. Why, the cost of that portion of the Post Office establishment, which was for the direct service of the public, or for the accommodation of individuals, who do not themselves pay for it, should not be defrayed as all other public establishments are—why it should be charged to a limited class of private citizens, who are not otherwise benefited than the rest of the community, I cannot conceive; nor has any gentleman, by any plain and common sense argument, attempted to show.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. WILDER) had said that it was unseasonable to press a measure of this kind at a moment like this, and that, in its operation, it would interfere with a great matter which the House had in hand. On the contrary, I hold it is precisely the right time for the introduction of the proposition, and, instead of interfering with the matter to which the gentleman alludes, I take it to be fairly part and parcel of that matter, and expressly referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which the gentleman is a member, as one of the points alluded to in the message at the opening of the session. The President says: "The subject of the revenue is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in hope that the combined wisdom of the Representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object, as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall unequally upon any."

Now, sir, I have proved that the burden of the Post Office establishment falls very unequally, and the gentleman refuses to relieve those oppressed by it, because he has in hand a general plan for relieving those who suffer under what they think unequal taxation. I maintain that this Post Office tax, the heaviest single tax which the people pay, amounting to two and a half millions annually, is demonstrably unequal in its apportionment. All the other taxes in the country are levied on consumption, and that is as near an approach to equality as can be made. The postage tax, instead of interfering with a plan for removing unequal taxation, is in reality the only burden with which I am acquainted, which falls unequally on any of the people. Sixty or seventy tons of franked documents is, literally as well as financially, an enormous burden to throw on a single class of the community; to say nothing of the unproductive routes, the cost of which is also cast on the same individuals.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. HOFFMAN) had said that if the Post Office were not thrown on the treasury, the time would come when the treasury would make drafts on the Post Office; if we did not keep the Post Office and treasury distinct, whenever the latter ran low the government would resort to postage as a source of revenue. Sir, that will be done at any rate. Whenever the ordinary sources of public income, derived from the customs, are cut off, and it becomes necessary to resort to direct taxation, the Post Office will be among the first objects resorted to. In the last war the rates of postage were doubled. Foreseeing such an increase of postage hereafter, as the possible result of my proposition, the gentleman said my plan tended to tax intelligence and information for the use of the treasury. I say, on the contrary, I wish to prevent intelligence and information being taxed to carry on the various branches of the public service; and it is a very insufficient reason for refusing to take off the tax now that you may have to put it on again hereafter. Let us take it off now that we can, and keep it off as long as we can; it will be time enough to put it on again when we must.

Mr. HOFFMAN observed, in reply, that he had remarked, on a former day, when this subject had been under discussion, that, if the gentleman had submitted his resolution without the accompanying observations, it would probably have passed in silence, as containing some proper suggestions to the Post Office Committee. But the gentleman had thought proper to favor the House with his views and reasons for introducing it, from which it had appeared that the reasonings on which the resolution was founded, were wholly fallacious, and the purpose of its introduction very different from what might be gathered from the tenor of the resolution itself. The gentleman's whole argument, as it has now been put, lay in this fact that the transmission of intelligence among the people of the Union was charged with the expense of the transmission also of the public documents, especially those printed and circulated by order of the two Houses of Congress. This might be a very good argument in favor of a reduction of the franking privilege; but for nothing else. If it was true that the two Houses were in the habit of franking more than they ought to do, it was easy to remedy the evil, by curtailing the power. Confine the franking privilege to the officers of Government, or limit it in point of time. The argument might avail against the people's reading so much, or against the Houses franking so much, or in favor of their franking more selectly; but it was no argument for the reduction of the rates of postage. Still less was it any reason why the expenses of the Post Office should be charged upon the treasury. Did not the treasury already contribute largely to the expense of that department? The legislation of the House, while occupied in examining and passing upon proposed mail routes, was paid for out of the treasury. A large share of the action of the department itself was sustained from the same source. All the salaries of the numerous officers of the establishment came out of the treasury, and he had no doubt, if the matter were fully investigated, it would appear that a large part of the charges attending the transmission of the forty tons of documents, of which the gentleman had spoken, came from the same place.

But, allowing the burden to be as unequal as the gentleman had represented it to be, his own proposition would render it still more unequal. Those who paid now were persons who derived at least some advantages from the transmission of the mail; but those whom the gentleman wished to compel to pay, were persons who were almost entirely unconnected with it; who seldom sent, and as seldom received letters by mail at all.

JANUARY, 1833.] Reduction of Postage—Tribunal for Claims—Reduction of the Tariff.

[H. OF R.]

THURSDAY, January 8.

Reduction of Postage.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted on a preceding day by Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, instructing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to bring in a bill reducing the rates of postage.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that he had an amendment to propose, which might, perhaps, meet the approbation of the gentleman who offered the original resolution, and of the House also; it was simply to provide that the efficiency of the Post Office should not be impaired, nor its ability to sustain itself diminished. Mr. C. then offered the amendment.

Mr. EVERETT regretted that there should be any objection to a resolution of inquiry going to the Post Office Committee. The character of that committee was, he should have thought, a sufficient guarantee that nothing injurious to the public interest could be expected at their hands. He was of opinion that the resolution should be referred without the restrictions imposed by the amendment; but, rather than it should be rejected, he would vote for the resolution with the addition of the amendment.

Mr. POLK said that, as he could not perceive any necessity for acting on either the original proposition or the modification suggested by his friend from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG), he should move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

On this motion Mr. EVERETT demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken, stood—Yeas 89, Nays 89.

The CHAIR gave the casting vote in the affirmative; so the resolution was laid on the table.

Tribunal for Claims.

Mr. HOGAN moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report on the expediency of establishing a judicial tribunal, which shall take cognizance of all claims and demands of individuals on the Government of the United States, and decide on the validity thereof, in accordance with the principles of equity and law, and established rules of evidence.

Mr. H. accompanied his motion by some remarks on the great number of private bills on the calendar of the House; the consumption of time annually occasioned by discussing them, and the small degree of attention usually bestowed by a vast majority of the House on their discussion. He stated, as his opinion, that private individual claims for more than a million of dollars, might be substantiated against the United States, were it allowable to sue the national sovereign; but, since this could not be allowed, they must be settled by Congress, and the expense of so doing would not amount to less than three millions of dollars. The resolution was agreed to.

Reduction of the Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

On motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, the intervening orders were postponed, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and, by a vote of 94 to 78, took up the bill "to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports."

[The bill omitted. Its character and effect will be well understood from the debates, and especially from the opening speech of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. Julian Verplanck, of New York, reporter of the bill, and its parliamentary expounder to the House,) showing that it would make a reduction of $13,000,000 on the tariff of 1828, and still yield $19,500,000, which, with $8,000,000 from other sources, would make $22,000,000—which would be $7,000,000 more than the Government would require, the public debt being paid. He estimated $13,000,000 as the necessary current expenses of the Government; and $15,000,000 as the maximum amount that ought to be raised to meet extraordinary and contingencies; so that a further reduction of $7,000,000 might be made after the little remaining fragment of the public debt should be extinguished.]

On motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VERPLANCK said that he rose to invite the attention of the committee to the examination of the details of the bill now before them, and for that purpose only. It was true, that this was a bill which might serve as an occasion for expatiating upon topics that always awakened much interest. The great question of constitutional right might be argued. The question of the incidence or bearing of taxation, together with other not less important theories of political economy, might be now discussed. But, for myself, I feel that after the years during which Congress, and public men elsewhere, as well as the press, have discussed these points, and especially after the ample discussion which has taken place during the present Congress, it would be presumption for me to think that I could now contribute any new general views that would enlighten the House or the nation. In making these remarks, I speak not only my own unfeigned opinion, but as I am fully authorized, that of those of my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means, who have joined with me in reporting this bill.

As members of this House, we have some of us, on this floor, and all of us in some way or other, made known our views to our constituents. The people have the whole of the general argument before them. It is now to a more practical and urgent duty that I would invite the attention of this body. It is one growing out of the financial state of our Government, and its legislation.

The last war left the nation laboring under a weight of public debt. The payment of that war debt was one of the great objects of the arrangement of our revenue system at the peace, and it was never lost sight of in any subsequent arrangement of our tariff system. Since 1815 we have annually derived a revenue from several sources, but by far the largest part from duties on imports, of sometimes twenty, sometimes twenty-five, and recently thirty-two and thirty-three millions of dollars a year.

Of this sum 10,000,000 dollars always, but, of late, a much larger proportion, has been devoted to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. At last that debt has been extinguished. The manner in which those burdens were distributed under former laws, have been, heretofore, a subject of complaint and remonstrance. I do not propose to inquire into the wisdom or justice of those laws. The debt has been extinguished by them; let us be grateful for the past. We are now to enter upon another, an honorable and gratifying duty, the reduction of the taxes of the people—the alleviation of the public burdens.

Here Mr. V. gave a brief view of the financial history of our Government since the peace of 1815, in which he stated that, during the last six years, an annual average income of 27,000,000 of dollars had been received; the far greater part from the customs. That this sum had been appropriated, the one-half towards the necessary expenses of the Government, and the other half in the payment of the public debt. In reviewing the regular calls upon the treasury, during the last seven years, for the civil, naval, and military departments of the Government, including all ordinary contingencies, about 18,000,000 of dollars a year had been expended. This amount of 18,000,000 of dollars would seem, even now, sufficient to cover the standing necessary expenses of the Government. A long-delayed debt of public justice, for he would not call it bounty, to the soldiers of the revolution, had added for the present, since it could be but for a few years only, an additional annual million. Fourteen millions of dollars then covered the necessary expenditures of our Government. But, however rigid and economical we ought to be in actual expenditures, in providing the sources of the revenue, which might be called upon for unforeseen contingencies, it was wise to arrange it on a liberal scale. This would be done by allowing an additional million, which would cover, not only extra expenses in time of peace, but meet those of Indian warfare, if such should arise, as well as those of increased naval expenditure, from temporary collisions with foreign powers, short of permanent warfare. We are not, therefore, justifiable, in raising more than 18,000,000 dollars as a permanent revenue. In other words, at least 18,000,000 dollars of the revenue that would have been collected under the tariff system of 1828, may now be dispensed with; and, in years of great importation, a much larger sum. The act of last summer removed a large portion of this excess; yet taking the importation of the last year, as a standard, the revenues derived from that source, if calculated according to the act of 1822, would produce 19,500,000, and with the other sources of revenue, an income of 22,000,000 dollars. This is, at least, seven millions above the wants of the treasury.

It was this excess of public burdens which the Committee of Ways and Means have felt it to be their duty now to call upon Congress to reduce. The task of regulating the rate and manner of that reduction was neither easy nor enviable. We all must know that large sections of the country throughout, as well as various classes of the community in every section of the country, have complained, or remonstrated against the unequal operation of the public burdens. It is certain, too, that, under any plan of finance whatsoever, of long duration, various interests must grow up, which cannot but be subject to great injury, from a change even for a better, and less onerous system.

The committee have felt all these difficulties. They have approached the subject not with rashness or presumption, but with humility. They have endeavored to profit by the lights of long experience, and of former legislation. Whatever may be the defects of their bill, they confidently claim for themselves the merit of honest and sincere intention. They trust that no local or personal interests, and certainly no views or feelings of party politics, have been suffered to influence them. They have desired and endeavored to conduct the deliberations of their committee-room in the spirit of justice, conciliation, and of peace; and it is in this spirit that they now invite this body to the examination of the bill before them.

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

Reduction of the Tariff.

The House having again gone into Committee of the Whole and resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports:

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Connecticut, said: The Committee of Ways and Means had presented this bill, as containing provisions to insure the revenue from the customs, which, with that from other sources, would be sufficient for the wants of an economical, but efficient Government. The principle which formed the basis of the bill was that the Government would require but fifteen millions of dollars for its annual expenditure; of which twelve millions and a half were to be raised from the customs, and two millions and a half from the public lands. It had been stated by the committee, in their report, that they considered it their duty to present to the House a bill which should be gradual in its operation on the existing establishments of the country. In this respect the committee had expressed the same sentiments which were contained in the Executive message, and in the report from the Treasury Department. The report uses the following language: "It has been the wish of the committee to guard against a sudden fluctuation of the price of goods, whether in the hands of the merchant, the retailer, or the manufacturer. With this view, they have made the reduction upon the more important protected articles, gradual and progressive."

The President, in alluding to the subject, says: "If, upon the investigation it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to any particular interest, is greater than is indispensably requisite," (for the objects previously specified,) "I recommend that it be gradually diminished, and that, as far as may be consistent with these objects, the whole scheme of duties be reduced to the revenue standard, as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will permit." "Large interests have grown up, under the implied pledge of our national legislation, which it would seem a violation of public faith suddenly to abandon." The Secretary of the Treasury, in recommending a reduction of the revenue, says: "The necessity of adopting the proposed changes to the safety of existing establishments, raised up under the auspices of past legislation, and deeply involving the interests of large portions of the Union, is not less imperious in the further changes which may be deemed expedient."

Such had been the sentiments always avowed by those who believed that the protective system ought to be abandoned. But how does the bill correspond with these opinions and views thus expressed? Was that a gradual reduction of the protected duties, which annihilated the whole in two years? Was this the "gradual diminution" of which the President and the Secretary of the Treasury had spoken? Did the Committee of Ways and Means really suppose that within two years the industry of this country could adapt itself to the provisions of such a bill as that now reported? Did not every man, at all conversant with the practical operation of the existing system, know that to call this a gradual reduction, was a perversion of the terms?

Was two years a period in which the industry of the country could change its entire direction, and resort to new channels? or in which the people could resort to new and untried employments for their livelihood? No, for almost all beneficial purposes connected with the protection of interests, which had grown up under the faith of the legislation of Congress, a delay of two years would be no better than the immediate operation of the bill on the whole amount of duties proposed to be reduced, sweeping them away at a blow. He would tell the committee all the good that such a delay would occasion: it allowed those who had on hand extensive stocks, time to put that stock into a manufactured form for sale. But as to those who were the real working men of the country, the bill operated to throw them completely out of employment, without time to prepare themselves for such a radical change. He repeated the position (and he did so with all respect for the committee who had introduced the bill) that, to profess the principle of gradual reduction, and, at the same time to cut down the whole protective system within two years, was nothing but mockery. Such a bill was substantially no better than an instantaneous abolition of the whole amount of protective duties; and this was one feature of the bill which rendered it so peculiarly obnoxious to those whose interests he more immediately represented on that floor.

But, whether gradual in its operation or not, whether immediate or more remote, whether carrying out the recommendations of those opposed to the whole system or not, it was reported as a bill calculated to bring down the revenue of the country so as "to meet the exigencies of an economical but efficient administration."

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

The Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, upon the bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports—Mr. WAYNE in the chair.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Connecticut, rose and said that the peculiar situation in which, as one of the Committee of Ways and Means, it had been his fortune, perhaps misfortune, to be placed, seemed to require that he should, in this early stage of the debate, give the reasons why he had not been able to assent to the present bill, and the report which accompanies it. This is due to myself (said Mr. I.) no less than to my highly respected associates of the committee, from whom I have been obliged to differ. As was said on a former occasion, and in reference to another report, by the gentleman (Mr. VERPLANCK) who, as chairman of the committee, reported this bill, my position in regard to it, is "singular and solitary." Yes, I say it more in sorrow than in anger, it is solitary indeed.

What would be the precise effect of this measure, if adopted, on the revenue of the country, no one could with safety predict. But, as I wish to avoid as much as possible all debatable grounds, I shall take it for granted, for the purpose of this inquiry at least, that the committee are right in saying that the receipts from the customs, under their bill, would be reduced to something over thirteen millions of dollars. We are asked to make arrangements now for large reductions, because, in the opinion of the committee, our present receipts, unless we promptly interpose, will roll up and retain a dangerous surplus in the treasury, "a needless burden upon the people, a tax falling directly or indirectly upon the land and labor of the country, certainly injurious in its effects, and probably unequal, enriching the treasury only to divide and distract our public councils, by tempting to expenditures of doubtful constitutional right or inconsistent with the simplicity of republican institutions, staining their purity, and hazarding their permanency." If, Mr. Chairman, there is one individual on this floor who is in favor of accumulating such a surplus in the treasury, for the pleasure of scrambling for the spoils, I wish it to be distinctly understood that it is not the humble individual who now addresses you. No, sir; the sentiments held by me on that subject, were embodied in a report presented at the last session, and which was also signed by my friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GILMORE,) and, by the principles there expressed, I shall steadfastly abide, let those principles lead me where they may.

There are some points, then, in which I am happy to agree with the other members of the committee. I agree with them that we should not accumulate a useless surplus in the public treasury; and that, at a proper time, and in a proper manner, the revenues should be adapted to the strict wants of the Government, if found to exceed those wants. More than this, it may be admitted that, after the payment of our debts, fifteen millions, the sum estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and sanctioned by my associates of the committee, should be, in ordinary times, sufficient to meet the current expenses.

Having gone thus far with the other members of the committee, we have now reached the point at which I am sorry to part with them. In saying, as I do, that this is not the proper time to change the established revenue system of the country, I have no allusion to what is taking place elsewhere. I come to this part of the subject, in the way in which it was put to me, as a strictly financial, not a political question. This is not the proper time, because you will, in my opinion, have need for every dollar you will receive under the present system of duties for the two years to come, at least. In the report put forth, it is taken for granted that now is the time, and now the hour, most fit and proper to reduce the treasury receipts; and this the committee are attempting to accomplish by their bill, lest the dreaded surplus should overtake us, if we delay it a little longer. This is not the first time that we have heard about "a surplus in the treasury," and the embarrassments it might produce in our devising ways and means to get rid of it. Why, sir, I have heard about it, and read about it, ever since I was old enough to read the newspapers, but have never been able to find it, except in the imagination, for the last quarter of a century. I remember reading about it as far back as the administration of Mr. Jefferson; the evil had been anticipated at that day, and Congress had been called upon to devise some plan for disposing of it. The profound statesman (Mr. Jefferson) then at the head of the Government, advised Congress, that when a surplus should really be found in the treasury, it should be expended in works of internal improvement, either under the present constitutional powers, or under such new grants as might be imparted to the federal compact. But we have grown wiser than Mr. Jefferson, or think we have. No one is now so unfashionable as to propose that the surplus revenues should be so used; in our estimate of fifteen millions we do not mean to have any of it distributed in that way. And lest we should happen to have an excess, we are perplexed as to the mode of avoiding it. It was the burden of complaint at the last session; it met us during the recess, in staring capitals, in the publications of the day; and since we have been here this winter, it has been rung and echoed in our ears, in all the sameness of the cuckoo's note—"surplus—surplus—surplus!" Gentlemen will insist upon it that the body politic is in danger of immediate death from plethora, and the political doctors who gather around in consultation, instead of tapping a vein, are for cutting the arteries. Let me advise them to stay their hand before they use the knife thus freely.

Mr. CRAWFORD said: What does the bill of the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. VERPLANCK) propose? To reduce the duties on the importation of foreign merchandise generally, to the scale of 1815, and, in some instances, below it. I desire the members of this committee to pause, and reflect. The most extensive operation of this Government is upon property, and the wider the range of our laws, the more studious, the more cautious should we be to do no act which may be detrimental to the great interests committed to our charge. We are placed here as trustees, to the extent of the powers confided, whose solemn duty it is to advance, by all the means we have, the prosperity of this nation; so to shape the action of the Government that the citizen may receive no injury, and that, while we do justice to all, we sacrifice none. Will we be fulfilling this high trust by rendering valueless two hundred and fifty to three hundred millions of property? for at no less sum are the manufacturing establishments of this country computed. Sir, I know of no measure more likely to be extensively ruinous—irreparably ruinous—to our great and leading interests, running through all the ramifications of society. If you break down a large establishment of iron, or wool, or cotton, you prostrate not its owner alone, but you reach every mechanic, every farmer, every laborer, in his neighborhood. If it was wise and statesmanlike in 1816 to regulate your duties, with a view to your existing manufactories, amounting then probably to not more than thirty millions of dollars, (though I have no means of ascertaining accurately,) can it be judicious in 1832 to throw out of consideration interests ten times as great? I speak not now of the amount of revenue; that shall be thought of presently.

To see the full operation of the proposed reduction, it is all-important that we should bear in mind what the duties have been on the various articles to be affected by it. I ask the members of this committee to recur to the legislation on this subject, and contrast the various enactments with the bill submitted. By the law of 1816, you imposed a duty on woollen manufactures generally of twenty-five per cent. until the 30th June, 1819, and afterwards of twenty per cent.; by that of 1824, a duty of thirty per cent. until 1825, and subsequently thirty-three and one-third per cent.; by the provisions of 1828, forty-five per cent. on cloths under four dollars in price, and fifty per cent. on all exceeding that value; and the law of 1832 imposed fifty per cent. ad valorem, and abolished, on this article, the system of minimums. It will be seen, at once, that the measure now under debate, reaches by a single bound, the regulation adopted seventeen years ago; for I regard as of no consequence the retention of forty per cent. until March, 1834, and of thirty per cent. until 1835. You had as well seal their fate at once. It is like the gradual extinction of human life, and, on a level of kindness, with the lopping off a man's legs and arms before you strike a vital part. How are hundreds of millions to be arranged in two years to prevent the crash which the provision seems to admit must follow if the change were immediate? On cottons, the change is still more to be regretted; for it will be soon perceived that it sweeps from under their feet the ground upon which those concerned stood in 1816, and leaves them in an infinitely worse situation. By the law of that year, foreign cottons paid twenty-five per cent. for three years, with a provision that if they cost less than twenty-five cents per yard, they were to be rated as worth that sum, and afterwards a duty of twenty per cent. By the regulation of 1824, they were charged with a duty of twenty-five per cent. with an increased minimum, from which the enactment of the last session did not materially vary, and the law of 1828 did not touch cottons. I request gentlemen to look for a moment seriously at the change they are about to effect, and inquire if they have examined narrowly into the certainly destructive consequences which must follow if this project be consummated. You have, heretofore, deemed a certain degree of protection necessary, not to the profitable and thrifty condition of your cotton manufactures, but to their existence; and of that duty so deemed by the very body I am addressing, and so deemed not six months ago, it is now sought to take away three-fourths. Can any pursuit or occupation bear such an application of the retrenching knife? I believe there is no mistake in my proposition. The present duty on cottons, under and not exceeding thirty cents the square yard, is seven cents and one-half; on those over that value, eight and three fourth-cents. What is the rate provided by the bill? The duty of 1816, which was five cents per yard? No, sir. But to bring down the duty to twenty per cent. ad valorem, abolishing the minimum that was adopted in that year, which will leave you about one-fourth the present duty. On articles costing ten cents the square yard, two cents is charged; on those of the value of eight cents, one cent and six mills; and on those priced at six cents, one cent and two mills. The finest will not cost in England, above sixteen cents; and as the coarsest are most used, the probable average value will be about ten cents, and the whole range of duty about two cents the square yard. Those manufactures which you have invited into existence, and reared in a hot-bed if you please, you now seem disposed to abandon to their fate. Is this, can it be, right? At the last session, as an inducement to the passage of the pending bill, it was said it would give permanency to the system; and, to my own knowledge, some gentlemen then, and not until then, regarded the policy of the Government as settled, and embarked their means in this species of property.

The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. VERPLANCK) informed this committee that this bill was framed, with the view to the production of eleven millions of dollars from customs, and that the foundation of his calculation was the importation of last year. I do not think any just calculations can be made upon the imports of any one year, more than that an increase of duty, judging from experience, is followed by an increase of revenue; though I believe that an increase of imports will be the consequence of a diminution of duty, and that the revenue will be enlarged, instead of lessened. The Europeans who find a market in this country, are so situated that they must export, to a certain extent, under almost any circumstances—less, however, when the duties are high—and the increased quantity, at the lowest rate, will often pour more money into the treasury than when the duties are higher. And I believe it is morally certain that it will always do it, so long as you vibrate between two medium points; say, in reference to the present inquiry, between twenty and forty per cent. It is true, you may reach a point so low, that more than a certain amount of revenue cannot be raised, or so high as to amount to a prohibition; and either way you will not be burdened by money. I dread the disclosure of the fact, which the operation of this bill, if enacted into a law, will probably make, that the revenue is larger, instead of smaller; and then will come the necessity, as it will be called, of falling to this minimum duty, to prevent an accumulation of money into the treasury. As proof of the correctness of these remarks, look at the product of your custom-house at various periods, and under different rates of duty; in 1826, your revenue from customs was greater than it has been at any time since, except the two last years, although the law of 1828 was passed increasing greatly your imposts.

In the year first named, it amounted to $23,341,331 77; in the year 1828, (the law of that year did not go into operation until the first of September, and could have little or no effect, as the annual treasury accounts are made up to the 30th September,) to $23,205,523 64; in 1829, to $22,681,965 91; in 1830, to $21,923,891 89; and, even in the year 1831, it exceeded the produce of 1826 by only $883,110. The additional imports of the two last years have been made, I imagine, with a view to aid the extinguishment of the public debt and other causes, in effecting a reduction of the tariff. Circumstances will vary your revenue; I mean the circumstances of your citizens, of the commercial world, and of all the world, more than your enactments. Look at your public income from 1816 to 1821: from customs you derived in 1816, $27,569,769 71; in 1817, $17,547,540 89; in 1818, $21,828,451 48; in 1819, $17,116,703 96; in 1820, $12,449,556 15, and in 1821, $13,400,447 15; reducing your treasury so low, that by an act of Congress of the 3d March, 1821, a loan of five millions of dollars was authorized "to be applied, in addition to the moneys now (then) in the treasury, or which may be received thereon from other sources during the present (then) year, to defray any of the public expenses which are, or may be, authorized by law;" and yet, during all this time, the duties (except some small additions, and, it is a remarkable fact, that the revenue was lowest after those deductions were made), remained the same, while your revenue varied more than fourteen millions, and at last sunk so low as to oblige you to borrow. Examine your treasury books throughout, and you will find everywhere evidence that a diminution of duty is by no means certainly, or, I think, usually followed by a reduction of revenue; on the contrary, I believe it will, in the circumstances of this country and Great Britain, be the cause of an increase of your funds.

FRIDAY, January 11.

The bill for the relief of General Macomb next coming up for consideration, it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Florida Claims.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOFFMAN in the chair, on the bill for the relief of certain inhabitants of East Florida.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said, that the nature of the claim set up might be properly understood, he should be obliged to go into a short historical detail of the events and incidents with which they were connected, and the principles of international law on which they are founded.

On the 15th of January, 1811, an act was passed by the two Houses of Congress, in which it is declared "that the United States, under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis, cannot, without serious inquietude, see the Floridas pass into the hands of a foreign power;" and "that, under existing circumstances, they will take temporary possession of that territory, and hold it, subject to future negotiations." On the same day another act was approved, giving to the President the authority to occupy, at his discretion, the country east of the river Perdido, with an armed force, on the happening of either two contingencies: 1st. If it shall be rendered up by the local authorities. 2d. If any attempt to occupy it shall be made by a foreign power. This last act makes a large appropriation for effecting its provisions, and invests the President with a legislative authority over the country to be acquired in pursuance thereof. On the 26th of January, 1811, instructions were issued to General Matthews, of Georgia, and to Colonel McKee, of which the laws above cited, were assumed as a basis. (9 vol. Waitt's S. P., p. 41.) It will be seen by the letter of Mr. Monroe, the Secretary of State, that the powers conferred on these commissioners are almost discretionary. It is melancholy to discover in this first document the commencement of all the American aggressions against the provinces of the Floridas; to see the Secretary of State dictating to his agent the quibbles to which he should have recourse, and recommending the first of those baseless promises to be so worded as to deceive the Spanish authorities, who should rely upon them, without being binding upon him who made them. If the Governors will peaceably "surrender the territory they were intrusted to protect, we will pay the debts of the Spanish king to his Spanish subjects." If you are driven to force, "you will exercise a sound discretion in applying the power given with respect to debts, titles to lands, &c., taking care to commit the Government on no point further than may be necessary."

I will not comment on the consistency of promising then to pay the debts of Spain, and refusing now to pay our own to the same creditors. I will say nothing of that morality which seizes on a moment of weakness to invade the province of an ally; which offers a reward to vice, and renders justice as a bribe to treason. I cite this passage to prove "that the operations" of the American Government in the Floridas, had a beginning ominous to just and honest claimants. "Commit the Government on no point further than may be necessary." But, sir, here is the important postscript to this preliminary document: "If Governor Folk should obstinately require, and pertinaciously insist, that the stipulation for the redelivery of the province should also include that portion of the country which is situated west of the river Perdido, you are, in yielding to such demand, only to use general words that may, by implication, comprehend that portion of the territory." This doctrine of implication was most beautifully and practically commented upon by the Sultan Mahomet, who, as we are told by Grotius, "upon the taking of Eubœa, cut a person asunder in the middle of his waist, to whom he had made a promise that he would not hurt a hair of his head." I have cited these passages, as well to show the whole uniform tendency of the measures taken and pursued by the United States in her operations in the Floridas, as to prove that Matthews was justified by his instructions in the course he adopted—instructions, as I have said before, mostly discretionary, and seldom specific, unless to dictate a promise that may deceive, without being obligatory to the maker. With such instructions before him, it is not to be wondered at that the acts of Matthews were such as could not be openly justified by our Government. Suffice it to say, that, on the reception of a letter from that officer, dated the 14th of March, he was immediately notified from the Department of State, in a despatch of the 4th of April, "that the measures he had adopted were not authorized by the law of the United States, or the instructions founded on it, under which he had acted," and the powers of which he is divested, are bestowed on Governor Mitchell, of Georgia. The Governor is directed to surrender Fernandina, &c., on terms, viz: that the inhabitants should be protected from the vengeance of the Spanish authorities, and not to withdraw his troops until that security is guaranteed. "You are to report to the Government the result of your conferences with the Spanish authorities, with your opinion of their views, holding, in the mean time, the ground occupied." And so fully was Mitchell persuaded of the intention of the Government, on this point, that he writes expressly to the Secretary of State, "that he knew it had never entered into the contemplation of the Executive to have the troops withdrawn from Florida." "In the measures lately adopted by General Matthews (says Mr. Monroe to Governor Mitchell, 10th, April, 1812,) to take possession, it is probable that much reliance has been placed by the people who acted in it, on the countenance and support of the United States. It will be impossible to expose these people to the resentment of the Spanish authorities," &c.; "you will, however, come to a full understanding with the Spanish Governor on this subject, and not fail to obtain from him the most explicit and satisfactory assurances respecting it." From this it appears, 1st. That, though we disavow the acts of Matthews, we are determined to retain possession of that portion of Spanish territory which he had seized on; and, 2d. That the disavowal does not extend so far as to prevent us from obtaining the most full and perfect indemnity for those who had assisted him, though it does extend to exempt us from all, and every obligation, to make satisfaction to those who had suffered by his acts; in other words, the acts of Matthews, though unauthorized, are obligatory on us to protect those who were deceived by him, but not to indemnify those who were injured by him. An unauthorized adventurer, holding an American commission, at the head of American troops, marches into a neutral country and lays it waste; his acts are disavowed by the Government, but the Government is bound to protect those who joined him, relying on their support against the vengeance of their offended laws. But he who resists their advances, acting as they were against the laws of Spain, and the force of treaties; he who resists, and is ruined, can demand no satisfaction. "The United States are only responsible for their own acts—and this is an act of Matthews. True, if you have been a wrong-doer with him, we will see that no power can harm you: thus far are we bound; but if you have been injured by him who bears our commission, and commands our troops, or by his associates who we protect, we cannot remunerate you; we are not bound by the acts of Matthews." By the laws of nations he is deemed a principal offender "who is guilty of certain acts of negligence to prevent them, as well as by actual commission; that urges to the commission of it; that gives all possible consent; that aids, abets, or in any shape is a partner in the perpetration of it." (Gro. B. C. 17, 5, 6.) Vattel ranks all as associates "who are really united in a warlike association with our enemy; who make a common cause with him." (B. 3, 6.) It is idle to quote passages of law on a point as plain as this is. If a nation would disavow the acts of her officer, she must punish the offender; she must cause him to make satisfaction if he is able, and if not, she must do it for him. "Sovereign princes are answerable for their neglect, if they use not all the means within their power for suppressing piracy and robbery." (Gro. 2, 17, 20.) It even frequently happens that the injury is done by minor persons, without their sovereign having any share in it; and, on these occasions, it is natural to presume that he will not refuse us a just satisfaction. When some petty officers, not long since, violated the territories of Savoy, in order to carry off from thence a noted smuggling chief, the King of Sardinia caused his complaint to be laid before the King of France, and Louis XVI. thought it no degradation to his greatness to send an ambassador extraordinary to give satisfaction for this violence. (Vattel, B. 2. C. 18, 8, 838; see further on this subject, Vattel, B. 2. C. 6. Sec. 76, 77, and 78; same author, B. 4, 7, 84, and Gro. B. 2, C. 18, 5, 4.) It is idle, then, to disavow responsibility. The injury is the act of our troops under our own officer. We retain the possession of the country occupied; we protect those who aided us—subjects, patriots, and all; and the law is everywhere recognized in the books, that, if we protect the wrong-doers, we are responsible for the wrongs done.

Florida Claims.

Whilst our troops were thus sustained in a foreign territory, whose inhabitants, using every effort of which they were capable, to repel an invasion which our relation with the mother country rendered more unjust and oppressive, it was to be expected that much violence should be used on both sides; that much oppression of persons and destruction of private property should result. In this individual instance, it is believed that the waste of private property was wanton and extensive. The letter of Colonel Smith uses the strongest language to show the ruin following in the train of our armies: "The inhabitants have all abandoned their houses and as much of their movables as they could not carry with them." And further, "the province will soon become a desert." And the investigations had before the courts in that territory, in pursuance of an act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1823, prove that the inhabitants of East Florida were driven from their homes by the American soldiery; that their houses, farms, and orange-groves were wasted; that their stock was destroyed, and their slaves, to a large amount, were enticed or forced away, and many driven to seek protection amongst the Indian tribes, from whom they have never been reclaimed. Such are the facts in the case of the inhabitants of East Florida. These sufferers are now no longer foreign subjects. They have now no separate Government to which to appeal for a redress of grievances. They had fondly hoped, that when their impotent master had transferred them over to a free and growing republic, that a full adjustment of their claims, a full security for payment and satisfaction, was guaranteed by the treaty of cession: and they might still more fondly have hoped, that, if any doubt could arise in the construction of a clause so remedial and so just, that our Government would allow some little weight to the equity of the claim; that we would not construe an ambiguous promise to pay, "a promise by implication," into a total release from an obligation so cogent and so binding before the promise was made; but, alas! they are deceived. Two succeeding administrations have construed the treaty so as to close against them the door of hope. Thus, sir, are these people injured and deceived; ruined by our arms when Spanish subjects, transferred to us their debtors, they have none to intercede for them. The transfer, from which they had hoped so much, has betrayed them; because, in the language of poetry, "it has held the word of promise to the ear, and broke it to the hope." It has made us their creditors by our wrong, and then closed against them the avenues of redress, by purchasing themselves and their territory from a master who would have vindicated their claims to justice.

These, sir, are the facts upon which the inhabitants of East Florida rest their claims to indemnity for the spoliation of the American army.

MONDAY, January 14.

The Tariff Bill—Reduction of Duties—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the discussion of the Tariff bill.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, of Connecticut, rose. He said that when the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had introduced this bill into the House, he had accompanied it with a few remarks of a general character, all of which were very pertinent and proper; but, since that time, the committee had not been favored with the views of any one gentleman, from any part of the country, in favor of the bill; and, if a judgment was to be formed from what had taken place, thus far, there was reason to apprehend that neither they nor the country, were to be favored with any new light, or any new facts, or considerations on which the House was pressed to pass so very extraordinary and wholly unexpected a measure.

He regretted this the more, the more he looked into the bill, and reflected on the principles it contained and the consequences likely to follow it. Congress had never legislated on a measure which, if adopted, would tell more in our future history. He repeated it, that such a bill should have been introduced, and an attempt made to force it through the House, without one word being said by those who were in favor of its passage, was most unexpected indeed. So soon as this bill should have passed both Houses of Congress, and received the Executive signature, millions of property which had been invested in establishments that had grown up under the sanction, and on the good faith of the Government—property, not of the "sumptuous manufacturer" merely, (as he is called in the South,) but, of the working, laborious, common people; the laboring community would be deprived of its value, and all the thousands, yes, the millions of these laborious citizens, would find their condition in one moment greatly changed. The rich would become poor, and the poor idle and wretched. Thus far they had lived under a Government of some degree of uniformity, and had calculated, as they had reason to calculate, that that uniformity would, to a certain extent, be preserved; but now they would, in one moment, find its policy reversed, and themselves reduced to the utmost distress. He had been told by gentlemen out of the House, he had not heard it from any in the House, that the people of the South were looking with anxiety for this bill. He did not doubt such was the fact. But gentlemen ought not to forget that it was not the South alone, but the entire population of his portion of the country, who were looking to the fate of the bill with the most intense anxiety; and he did not hesitate to declare there, in his place, that if this bill should ever become a law, it would prove the winding-sheet of New England.

Standing there to speak the language of his constituents, the first remark he should make upon the measure proposed, was, that it was exceedingly premature and hasty. He asked gentlemen who pressed a bill like this, whether the bill itself had yet so much as reached all their constituents? They must answer, no. A bill lowering duties of itself six millions, and going into operation within forty days, and together with the reductions made by the tariff act of the last session, proposing to reduce the revenue at one blow, from twenty-five millions of dollars to twelve millions and a half; a bill of such momentous consequence to every portion of the country; a bill containing principles which subverted the entire policy of the country, was pressed to its passage, in sullen silence, before it had even been seen and examined by one-half of the American people. When that bill should have reached them, what did gentlemen suppose would be their answer? He would make his appeal to the representatives of that great State which had taken the lead in the school of protective policy: has Pennsylvania said the tariff needs to be revised? Let her representatives speak, if it be so. And he asked, what had been heard from the "empire State," as it had justly been denominated? Had any voice come from New York indicative that the country desired such a measure as this? Had any voice been heard from New England? Not a breath had reached that House, declaring such was the people's will. A deep and universal alarm was beginning to pervade New England; nor would the voice of approbation come, wait ever so long. He feared lest one portion of the American people, who had been forced into their present pursuits by the votes of the South, and who had ever since been led on from step to step, from tariff to tariff, by that House, when they learned the measure that was preparing for them, would look upon their fields and their factories with sorrow, and learn to hate a Government so fickle and so faithless. He feared that, should this bill pass into a law, the consequence would be, not only distress and heart-burnings, but, in the end, a settled hatred to the Government; a hatred far beyond any thing that had been felt in the South.

But he would now proceed to that which, after all, was the real cause of this bill. He meant the discontents in the South. He hoped that his honorable friend, (Mr. McDuffin,) for such he esteemed him, who so ably represented the views of the South, would not charge him with any disrespect. But, might he not say, that if any member of the House should be asked out of the House what was the cause which had produced such a bill, would he not say, the discontents in South Carolina? No man, woman, or child, could doubt the fact.

In relation to this matter, the first question he should ask was this: Were they not bound, in endeavoring to relieve the people from the burden of taxation, to see that they did not merely change the scene of the discontent? It was known to all, that during the late war, very deep discontent had existed in one quarter of the Union in relation to the General Government. He had the authority of a gentleman from Georgia, for saying, that the country was near revolution. But let the House, while it was endeavoring to appease his friends at the South be cautious that they did not, as he had said, merely change the scene. He thought there was no just cause for demanding from the North so great a sacrifice. The first question asked of him by his constituents would be, Will South Carolina be any better off when the tariff is annihilated? He feared he should not be able to give an answer such as should be satisfactory to the people of South Carolina. It was very important that the people of the North should be convinced that there existed some real grievance, for the removal of which they were called on to make so great a sacrifice. Nothing else would ever induce them to forego the advantages they now enjoyed.

Mr. BRIGGS of Massachusetts said: I need not say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the State of Massachusetts is deeply interested in the tariff. The people of the district which I have the honor to represent, have a capital of more than two millions of dollars dependent, in a great measure, upon the fate of the bill on your table. I shall vote against the bill, and the facts already named constitute my apology for throwing myself upon the indulgence of the committee, long enough to state my reasons for that vote.

Sir, at the last session of this Congress, a law was passed upon this identical subject, after a protracted and full discussion. It was carried by an unusually large majority of both Houses of Congress, and received the prompt sanction of the Executive. It was passed as a measure of peace and conciliation. That law had not yet taken effect, and its operation upon the revenue, or upon the great interests of the country, can only be known by experiment. It is certain, however, that under it, a large amount of revenue will be reduced, and it may produce a very sensible effect upon some of the manufacturing interests. The most strenuous opposers of the tariff, at the last session, professed a willingness to reduce the revenue by a cautious and gradual process, so as not suddenly to ruin the manufactures. Where now is the necessity of departing from that principle of action, by demolishing the law then passed, before its effects can be known? It would be an unheard of course of legislation, in this or any other country, for the same men to repeal a law upon a subject which involved the vital interests of the country, and which they had passed upon the most careful and deliberate consideration, before it should have gone into operation, and when the circumstances of the country had undergone no change demanding a precipitate repeal or alteration. After so much time had been spent at the last session, and a bill passed upon the avowed principle of compromise and concession, the people did not expect that the question would be again agitated at this session, before they could see and understand the bearing and effect of the law then passed.

The committee who recommend this measure, urge, as a reason for its adoption, that the revenue must be reduced to the wants of the Government. I readily concede this point. I trust all will admit, that after the national debt shall have been paid off, the amount of revenue to be raised must be limited to the sum required to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, and to meet such authorized constitutional expenditures, as shall be necessary "to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare" of the nation. But, sir, the precise amount which would be required for these objects, and the particular sources from which it should be raised, are grave and important questions, which, under the present condition of the country, demand grave and deliberate investigation.

If the entire revenue is to be raised from import duties alone, justice requires that it should be drawn in equal proportions from the people of the different States, and the different sections of the country. But how shall this be done? It by no means follows, that an equal rate of duty upon all the imported articles, would produce this result. It may happen that the same number of people in one State, from their habits, business, or climate, consume a much larger amount of imported articles, than the same number of people in other States, and thus made to contribute more than their just proportion of the public revenue.

On the contrary, it might be found upon full and careful examination, that a duty upon a comparatively few articles of importation, would, by reason of the generality of their use in all parts of the country, afford the necessary revenue, and make a just and equal distribution of taxes among the people of the several States. If a system could be devised, by which a sufficient amount could be raised by a fair and equitable distribution of the duties to be paid, and, at the same time, preserve and sustain the great and varied interests of the country, I am not able to discover what reasonable objection could be interposed against its adoption. Though the practical operation of such a system might be more beneficial to one portion of the country than to another, yet if it operated no injury to that other portion, and was uniform and impartial in the contributions which it would draw from every part, it would be just, and ought to be satisfactory. To enable us to carry these principles into operation, it is important to know, as near as may be, what amount of imported dutiable articles are consumed in the different States of this Union. In the final adjustment of the tariff to the revenue standard, this essential information cannot be dispensed with without the hazard of doing great injustice somewhere. This knowledge, so indispensable to right action upon the subject under discussion, is not within our reach, and cannot be during the present session. Our treasury is now empty; the national debt is not yet extinguished; the amount of revenue which may be required for the current, and the coming year, cannot be precisely ascertained; and as the officer in the financial department of the Government does not call for an immediate reduction of the duties, the passage of the bill, at the present session, would seem to me to be an act of precipitant and hazardous legislation. The committee present their plan as a permanent revenue measure. This consideration heightens the importance of mature deliberation before we settle down upon it.

Mr. Chairman: The bill on your table, under the form of a simple revenue measure, proposes to change the great policy of this Government. Is this policy one which has suddenly started into life? Is it, as has frequently been alleged upon this floor, the creation of a tyrannical and reckless majority, impelled to action by motives of selfish sordidness, regardless of the interests, and trampling upon the rights of the minority? No, sir, it claims a higher origin, a nobler purpose.

The policy of developing and bringing forth the rich, and exhaustless resources of our extended country, by fostering and protecting domestic manufactures, has engaged the anxious and continued attention of this Government from the adoption of the constitution. This position is maintained by a reference to the course of legislation, the reports from the Treasury Department, and the uniform tenor of Executive messages from the time of Washington to the present day. And, sir, I shall be much disappointed if it does not turn out, upon examination, that it has been the favorite scheme of the great leading statesmen of the South.

I will not consume the time of the committee by talking about the second act of this Government, passed on the 20th July, 1789, the very preamble of which declares it necessary to lay duties "for the encouragement and protection of manufactures."

In his last message delivered to Congress, in December, 1796, President Washington says: "Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures." "The object is of too much consequence not to ensure a continuance of their efforts in any way which shall appear eligible."

In relation to the same object, President Jefferson, in his closing message, communicated in November, 1808, has the following remarks: "The situation into which we have been thus forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties, and prohibitions, become permanent!" Protecting duties and prohibitions! Yes, Mr. Chairman, in 1808, Mr. Jefferson, the President of the United States, the great republican leader, the strict and able expounder of the constitution, the highest authority of political orthodoxy, of the present day, in one quarter of this Union, could officially speak of rendering manufactures permanent by protecting duties and prohibitions, without lighting the torch of civil discord, or shaking the integrity of the Union. But now, sir, the name of this great man is relied on by those who profess to be his true followers, to show that laws which create protecting duties, "are plain, palpable, and dangerous violations of the constitution," and that the States which oppose them, have a right, if not to nullify, to recede from the Union, if they are not repealed.

Great efforts were made by the leading republicans of that day, to give popularity to the plan of building up domestic manufactures. The prominent newspapers of Virginia, and of the South led the van, and urged on their followers in the patriotic service. The committee will recollect the numerous extracts to show the sentiments of Southern men on this subject, read from a volume of the Richmond Enquirer, taken from the library of Mr. Jefferson, by the honorable gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. SUTHERLAND,) in the course of his very able and eloquent speech at the last session of this Congress. The sentiments, toasts, and resolutions at public dinners, and Fourth of July celebrations, clearly show what, in those days, was the current of public opinion. It was in 1808 that Mr. Jefferson in a letter addressed to his friend Thomas Leiper, Esq., of Philadelphia, in strong terms, spoke of building up domestic manufactures, as the "true republican policy." He said it was the design and policy of "New England federalists" to continue a commercial people, and thus keep up a dependence on foreign nations for a supply of manufactured articles. With an adroitness peculiar to himself, he sought to identify the opposition to his favorite system, with the opposition to the party of which he was the head. New England was then suffering under the restrictive system of the General Government, which bore upon her with peculiar weight and severity. Her people were necessarily and essentially a commercial and navigating people. They were then the stout advocates of those free trade principles which the national legislation afterwards compelled them to give up, and which are now proclaimed to be so essential to national prosperity in a region, where, then, the domestic policy was declared to be the sure foundation of public prosperity and permanent independence. Sir, impartial history has recorded all these matters, and they will stand out on the future page as subjects of curious speculation to those who shall come after us.

TUESDAY, January 15.

Distribution of Surplus Revenue.

Mr. STEWART offered the following preamble and resolution, and moved that it be laid upon the table:

Whereas it was declared by the President of the United States, in his message at the opening of the first session of the twenty-first Congress, that, after the extinction of the public debt, it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, on principles satisfactory, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the treasury beyond what may be required for its current services; and that, in his opinion, "the most safe, just, and federal disposition that could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their representation," which recommendations have been since reiterated in subsequent messages from the same high source: And whereas the President has congratulated Congress, at the opening of the present session, upon the near approach of the period referred to, when the public debt will be entirely extinguished, and a considerable surplus remain in the treasury; therefore,

Resolved, That the sum of five millions of dollars (if the surplus revenue shall amount to so much) shall be annually apportioned among the several States, according to their representation; one moiety thereof to be appropriated to works of improvement of a national character, and the other to the purposes of general education; and that the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. WILDE moved the question of consideration, viz: Will the House now consider the resolution?

Mr. STEWART suggested to the gentleman from Georgia, that the resolution might be suffered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WILDE demanded the question of consideration.

Mr. STEWART inquired of the Chair, if the refusal now to consider would preclude him from moving its consideration hereafter? Being informed that it would not, he said he did not wish the House now to consider the resolution, but that at some future day, after time had been afforded to examine it, he would move for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. WILDE said that, in a crisis like the present, he could not withdraw his motion, though he regretted not being able to comply with the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question of consideration was decided by—Yeas 48, nays 111.

The Tariff Bill—Reduction of Duties.

Mr. CHOATE, of Massachusetts, addressed the committee as follows:

It would be mere affectation in me, sir, to pretend not to see that this bill is introduced because South Carolina has, prospectively, nullified the law which we made in pari materia, five months ago. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means does not, to be sure, say this in his speech, or in his report; but there is not a man, woman, or child, in the United States, who does not know it, and who would not laugh in your face to hear the contrary asserted. Why, sir, upon the apparent circumstances, who can doubt about it. The tariff of the last session, whatever else might be said against or for it, was no very hasty piece of legislation. A committee of this House, constituted for that very purpose, were three months in framing that bill which was its groundwork. In one form and in one stage or another, the bill was pending before us two or three months longer. It was under actual discussion more, I believe, than one. The public attention had been recently very much drawn to the subject. Conventions had been holden; memorials had been composed; and a vast body of fact and argument had been furnished to us by the sections and interests most opposed and most sensitive upon this policy. After all this, the bill passed with a surprising unanimity through both branches of Congress, and I cannot say that it has not been pretty well received by the people. Certainly, the administration presses have unceasingly declared that it had the approval of all but the ultras on both sides; the manufacturers and the nullifiers.

That tariff has not yet gone into operation. How it may work, therefore, how much revenue it may yield, what effect it may produce upon prices, commerce, manufactures, or the agricultures of the South, how far it may approve itself upon a full experiment to the judgment of our constituents, the American people, upon all these matters, you know absolutely nothing which you did not know when you set your hands to it. Without the examination of a single witness, without the reading or presentation of a single memorial, without a particle of new information, whether of fact or science, on the merits of this business as a question of finance or political economy, the Committee of Ways and Means have struck out at a heat in three weeks, a new tariff, departing fundamentally from the provisions of the last, and overturning, not formally, I concede to the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. KENNON,) who had just resumed his seat, but substantially overturning the American protective system.

Sir, I repeat it, it is impossible for me to doubt the motive or object of this proceeding, unexampled in our legislation. Do not deceive yourselves by supposing that the country and the world also will not see clear through it. Let us not shun a fair responsibility on this great occasion. Why not avow it at once, and put yourselves thereupon on the country. South Carolina has nullified your tariffs; and therefore you repeal them. You suppress nullification, and take a statesmanlike pledge and guarantee against any future recurrence by any other State to that happy expedient, by just promptly granting, the first time you have a chance to act on it, all that it demands.

But, sir, I shall consume no time in complaining of the committee for having cast the consideration of this subject again on this Congress. If we can make a better tariff than the last, or rather if we can make a really permanent and good one, without the neglect of weightier matters, I do not think the attitude of South Carolina alone ought to prevent our doing so. While I hold undoubtedly that our main and first business at this session is, to provide for effectually enforcing the law, if in that behalf there is any thing for the Legislature to do, I could wish to improve the law also, if it requires to be, and can be improved.

But this bill is no improvement of the law. Come what may, I shall not assent to it. Some of the principles it proceeds on are well enough; some of the ends it seeks not undesirable. But the honorable chairman will pardon me if I say that, as a whole, it is a great deal too rash, partial, and revolutionary. He will pardon me if I say I see on it some marks of the unwise precipitation of fear, and some of the still more offensive marks of political calculation and combination. Instead, however, sir, of attempting to dissect it minutely, and to display its objectionable details, I have risen only to suggest some more general grounds on which I oppose it, and on which perhaps, the expediency of passing even a far better bill than this in the circumstances, may well be questioned.

There is one view of this great subject of the tariff, in its relation to the times we are approaching, in which the importance of very deliberate action on it, upon the part of the National Legislature, is quite striking. I cannot hope to impress it on others as it has presented itself to my own mind.

We have reached the time, or rather we are within a year or two of the time, when it will become necessary to meet and settle a question in some sense new; a question involving the fate of our existing manufacturing establishments, and perhaps the fate of American manufacturing enterprise. The question is this: Can the tariff be so arranged, that it shall produce no more revenue than the wants of a Government out of debt and wisely administered, indispensably demand; shall incidentally give effectual protection to capital now invested in manufactures, and shall, at the same time, work no sectional injustice to the planting States. Such a tariff alone can be maintained in this country. Such a tariff, by the blessing of providence, can be maintained. Such an one can be framed; but time, and an opportunity of calm, thorough, unterrified deliberation, are indispensable to a work so great, and healing, and difficult.

The Tariff Bill—Reduction of Duties.

[H. OF R.]

The first requisite of a tariff, which shall meet the exigency of the times is, that it brings down the revenue "to the wants of the Government." A very few words only upon this: .

I consider it to be the settled opinion of the country, that the national revenue ought to be restricted to, and measured by, the necessary annual expenditure of the Government, out of debt, and economically administered. The public demand is, I think, that the tariff be so constructed as to yield that amount of revenue, and no more; and if the tariff of the last session shall be found, on a full experiment, to yield more than that, sooner or later it must, of course, be altered. In other words, if fifteen millions a year will administer the Government, fifteen millions are all which we can permanently collect from imposts.

The bill under consideration professes to be an attempt to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government; and, so far, I have nothing to object to it. How far it may effect its object, or how far it may go beyond its object, is another question. It assumes further, that fifteen millions of dollars will satisfy the annual wants of the Government. Upon this, too, I have nothing to say. But it further proceeds upon the supposition, that, of this sum, two millions and a half will be supplied by the sales of the public lands, and the other twelve millions and a half by the imposts. I submit to the committee, sir, that the imposts ought to be made to contribute from the first, the whole fifteen millions, or whatever be the sum which you decide to raise.

But there is a deeper objection to the bill. Assuming, sir, that a tariff is to be constructed which shall supply from imposts the whole national revenue, and no more than you need for revenue, then the great question is this: Can the principle of an effectual protection of the existing manufacturing establishments be embodied incidentally in such a tariff, without injustice to the planting States? Sir, I believe that it can; and I am wholly against this bill because it makes no attempt to do it.

Look into this bill, and say if these rates of duties are sufficient for the preservation of your leading manufactures? Why, this House has concluded the question. You have framed, this very assembly has once already framed, a tariff of protection. Yes, sir, the law of the last session, enacted after a series of investigations of unexampled minuteness and toil, is the deliberate, recorded, promulgated judgment of the whole National Legislature, that the duties in that law are indispensable to the adequate protection of your investments in manufactures.

Now is there a particle of new evidence, is there one single argument good or bad, old or new, is there so much as a suggestion from any quarter of this House, that, on point of necessity of that degree of protection which you decided to give last summer, your judgment was erroneous? So erroneous that you may now take off seventy-five per cent. of that protection without fear of the consequences? Sir, we know there is nothing. This bill is not put forward as a protecting tariff. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, has not said on this floor, or in his report, and will not say that he believes this rate of protection is enough. He does not press the measure upon you on that ground. He argues that it will reduce the revenue to twelve and a half millions, and he claims no more for it. No verbal or written testimony has been taken by the committee, and none is furnished to the House. Some manuscripts of matter purporting to be answers of manufacturers to the interrogatories of agents of the Secretary of the Treasury, are said to be in the hands of the public printer; but nobody knows their contents, or attaches any sort of importance to them.

I have heard, in conversation, that the tariff of 1816 gave adequate protection, and that this bill is a return to that tariff. Did we not know last summer what protection the law of 1816 gave, and did we not pronounce it to be wholly inadequate? Besides, sir, this bill is not a return to the provisions of that law. If that were intended, why are the duties on iron carried so much higher? Do you say that the manufactures of iron are essential to the defence of the nation in time of war, and, therefore, deserve to be protected? Very well; but this plainly admits that the law of 1816 does not afford the desired protection. And again; if you take that tariff for your standard, why do you withdraw from the manufacturers of woollens and cottons, the protection of which they enjoyed under it? No, sir, I shall not admit against your vote of five months ago, that these duties will sustain any great branch of the national manufactures. I am estopped by the record, and bow, as I ought, to your own authority. I must take it for this discussion, without pausing to collate this bill with former tariffs, item by item, and without attempting to calculate the exact rate per cent. of the proposed reduction, that the measure goes in its inevitable, and not very remote effect, to disturb and derange the whole manufacturing enterprise of the country, and particularly to break down the great body of the establishments of New England.

Is there any thing in the circumstances of the time which makes all this necessary? Sir, I cannot believe it. I believe you may construct a tariff which shall yield fifteen millions of revenue; effectually protect domestic manufacture; and do injustice to no portion of the country. This is the great problem now proposed to the wisdom of Congress. I beg leave, sir, to say a few words only for the purpose of showing that such a tariff may be made, but that perhaps new investigations, perhaps new modes of inquiry on the part of Government are necessary to an object so important and so difficult.

I confess, sir, it is not until very recently I have supposed that a tariff, producing so much revenue only as the wants of Government year by year demand, would be resisted by the South, merely because it sought to unite with its main object of revenue, in its selection of articles, and its distribution of duties, the protection of domestic industry. We have heard much about the burden of unnecessary taxation; against wasteful and corrupt expenditures of public money; against plundering the people with one hand, and dealing out the spoils here and there, to this portion of them and that, with the other. These topics are familiar enough in our discussions here and elsewhere; but that which has been somewhat technically called incidental protection, I thought had been spared this general denunciation. I had supposed the sentiments ascribed the other day by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. INGERSOLL) to a distinguished Virginian, (Mr. BARBOUR,) expressed the prevailing Southern opinion on this subject. When the tariff was made bona fide for revenue, where it was so framed as to produce no more than the necessary revenue for an economical administration of a Government out of debt; where, in its "gross and scope," as a whole, acting as one tax on one people, it drew from them only the proper amount of tax, I had supposed, sir, that such a tariff would not be objected to, merely because in its details it favorably regarded the interests of American manufactures. One thing is certain: the constitutional competence of Congress to make such a tariff has hardly been questioned, I believe, by those who have questioned every thing else. In the address of the convention of the friends of free trade, put forth in the latter part of the year 1831, I find these passages. They occur in the midst of a regular argument against the substantive constitutional power of Congress to make a protecting tariff. "They admit the power of Congress to lay and collect such duties as they deem necessary for the purpose of revenue; and, within those limits, so to arrange these duties as incidentally, and to that extent, to give protection to the manufacturer.

"They deny the right to convert what they denominate the incidental into the principal power, and, transcending the limits of revenue, to impose an additional duty, substantially and exclusively for the purpose of affording that protection."

The writer of an article in the Southern Review, published in August, 1830, a writer who, with zeal and talent maintains the doctrines of nullification, and the want of constitutional power to make a tariff of protection, says: "South Carolina has never contended that, in pursuing bona fide the legitimate object of revenue, a bill for this purpose may not be arranged in such a manner as incidentally to benefit the domestic industry of the country."

Sir, I agree that there is some ambiguity in this language; but it seems to me to admit, in the broadest terms, our constitutional power to make just such a tariff as the times demand; a tariff yielding just enough, and no more, to the treasury, yet so taxing, and so exempting from tax articles imported, as effectually to protect the manufacturing capital and labor of the country.

But, sir, we know now that our friends of the planting States take stronger ground. They now say that, even if the tariff produce only the necessary amount of revenue, it cannot be so constructed as to protect manufactures, according to the Northern opinions on the requisite degree of protection, without injustice to the South. Such a tariff will admit some imports free of duty; it will tax some heavily, others lightly; and this "arrangement of duties" must, as they allege, from the habits of consumption and of production, peculiar to the planting States, act with a sectional injustice and hardship on them.

Now this allegation of the South presents a question of fact of great interest. It has been discussed at former sessions of Congress, with eminent ability on this floor. It is the turning point of the controversy which threatens, not to rend these States asunder, that is an absurd apprehension, but which threatens to prostrate every manufacturing establishment in the country. I do not say that it is capable of being conclusively determined. Perhaps it is a problem which must forever baffle all attempts at solution. But, sir, before this Government shall take for granted this strong and no doubt sincere assertion of its Southern citizens; before it shall doom to destruction the vast interests which itself has warmed into life, upon the supposition that it can protect them no longer without injustice to others, I submit that something ought to be done by the Government, as a Government, through some department, or committee, or board of commissioners, to settle this question of fact. It would be a reproach to politics, to legislation, to science, if it could not be settled by a proper course of inquiry, with some approximation to moral certainty. I know, indeed, something of the obstacles which the passions put in the way of the pursuit of truth. Perhaps Hobbes, if it was he, was not so far in the wrong when he said "that, if their interests required it, people would deny that two and two make four." But, sir, "difficulty is good for man." We are fast approaching a real crisis in the history of our manufactures. We are told we can no longer protect them, and do justice to the South, even if heretofore that was practicable. We cannot put this question aside; we must meet it; and it involves the most momentous domestic controversy which this country was ever engaged in. Sir, the position I take is this: that this House is not prepared to admit—cannot, as a matter of justice, and expediency, and honor, admit, without more inquiry, that a tariff, producing fifteen millions of revenue, and effectually protecting domestic manufactures, will operate with any peculiar and sectional injustice and severity on the planting States.

Reduction of the Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

[H. OF R.]

In the first place, before we venture against our recorded acts of the last session to take a matter of so much importance for granted, I say we ought to have before us for inspection, the project of a bill yielding fifteen millions, and so framed as to protect manufactures. No such bill was ever submitted to this Congress. This, from the Ways and Means, that committee tell us, will produce twelve and a half millions only, and it makes no attempt towards effectual protection. The tariff of last session, it is said, will produce twenty millions. What we ought to have, from some committee or some department, for analysis, is a tariff, put together by express instruction of this House in such a manner as to raise a revenue of fifteen millions, without injury to existing investments; and, as far as practicable, without injustice to any distinct section of country. Then, sir, there would be something definite to act upon; there would then be a specific plan of taxation before you, under which some imports would be free; some lightly and some heavily burdened; the articles would be enumerated and the rates fixed. We should know then the terms and conditions of the problem to be solved. We could then subject the planting States to a minute comparison with other States, in regard to their habits of consumption and production, with reference to a given scheme of finance. The question then would be, taking into account the character of the consumption and production which distinguish the two great divisions of the country, which of them, under this precise scale of duties will feel the heaviest burden, or will it fall in just proportion on each? I repeat, sir, the first step towards a proper trial of the question involved in the representation of the South, would seem to me to be to call on the Committee of Manufactures, or of Ways and Means, for a bill of this character. Until we can see, and can dissect such an one, I shall not admit, in deference to any abstract reasonings, however ingenious; to any declamation, however eloquent; to any complaints, however loud or general; that it may not be made to unite all the three requisites which must meet in a just popular, and permanent tariff; that is, that it brings no surplus into the treasury, encourage and save manufacturing investments, and do no local wrong to the South.

But, sir, without waiting for the project of such a tariff, we know, to some extent what it must be; we know, in general, that it will lay a heavier duty on articles coming in competition with our domestic manufactures; and a lighter duty, if any, on articles not coming into competition with them, than the average of a mere uniform ad valorem revenue duty. And, now, is this House prepared to admit, without more inquiry, that such a distribution of duties works any sectional wrong to the planting States?

In considering this question, let the tariff first be regarded as a great indirect tax on consumption paid by consumers. I know that this view of the tariff is narrow and inadequate; it is, however, to a great extent, the true view of it, so far as you look to the burdens only which it imposes. It is a law laying taxes on consumption, which are paid by consumers. The question is, do these taxes fall disproportionately on the South?

In this way of considering the subject, the only ground on which the alleged inequality of this tax, in its operation on the planting States, can be made out, is this: that those States consume a larger value of imported articles paying heavy duties under such a discriminating tariff, in proportion to their whole consumption or ability, than the other States; that they consume a larger value of imported sugar, woollen cloth, cotton cloth, articles and materials of occasional and extra dress, household furniture, mechanic tools, iron, steel, hemp, flax, cordage, chain cables, sail cloth, oil and dyeing materials, and the like, in proportion to their whole consumption, than the other States. Now, do the planting States, in point of fact, consume a larger amount of such articles than the rest of the Union, according to their ability? Sir, I utterly deny it. I assert the direct contrary. I tender an issue, and respectfully pray that the same may be inquired of by the country.

In the first place, sir, it has been alleged on this floor that the planting States do not now, and never did, consume so large a value of all imported dutiable goods, in proportion to their numbers, as the other States. In particular, I recollect, that the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BURGESS), in his able speech at the last session, took this position very strongly. In the resolutions which he laid some days since on your table, he reasserts this position. He told us that the records of the treasury and custom-houses will sustain him in it. They will show you, or rather you may collect from them, with reasonable certainty, the whose value of imported dutiable goods consumed year by year in the whole country, and the value of those consumed in the Southern States; the whole amount of duties collected on them all, and the amount collected on the portion consumed in the Southern States. The result of the examination will be, that the complaining States have never paid, from the organization of the Government to this day, an amount of the indirect taxes which have mainly borne the entire national expenditure, in just proportion to their numbers, their whole consumption, and their general ability.

Sir, if the fact be so, it is a most important one. If it be so, that under no tariff, at no time, those States have paid a fair, constitutional proportion of tax, is it certain that under a protecting tariff of fifteen millions, they will pay more than their proportion? Is this so certain that you will take it for granted, without inquiry, and without trial, and prostrate your manufactures on the assumption?

Sir, in this view, the resolutions for inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, seem to me eminently reasonable and proper. I submit that we should immediately call out all the evidence to this point contained in the treasury and custom-houses; and, in the absence of that higher proof, I shall hold that the gentleman has truly stated to us the result of it.

I have thus far been considering the tariff as an indirect tax on consumption, paid by the consumers of imported dutiable goods. In that way of considering it, I never could comprehend the Southern sectional objection to it. To give color to that objection, it should be shown that the States which urge it, consume a larger value of imports paying the heavy rates of duty, in proportion to their whole consumption, which is always in proportion to ability, than the other States. Not a tittle of evidence, in proof of this position; was ever offered to this or any other Congress. The presumptions are all the other way; we utterly deny the position, and offer to unite in any mode of inquiry which can be suggested to ascertain its truth or falsehood.

It is sometimes said, sir, that the consumer in the planting States pays a tax to the Northern manufacturer. This, like all violently metaphorical and incorrect language, is calculated to mislead the mind. It may be honestly, but never can be safely employed in any reasoning. Closely scrutinized, it means nothing, or nothing to this purpose. It means only that he who (instead of buying a foreign article, paying the price, and reimbursing the duty) buys a domestic article, pays a price perhaps somewhat enhanced, perhaps not at all so, by the circumstance that the imported fabric is charged with a duty. It is delusive and mischievous to call this the payment of a tax. The article has never borne one; the vender paid none; the buyer reimbursed none. So far from this, he who substitutes the domestic for the foreign fabric, pro tanto, evades the tax. If, then, you buy of the Northern manufacturer, you diminish your contribution to the public burden; if you buy nothing of him, you still pay no more than your share. On what ground, then, do you complain of a protecting tariff as an indirect tax? You demand, instead of it, a tariff laying an uniform ad valorem duty on all imports. Well, why? You see that you do not now contribute more than your proportion of indirect tax to the federal treasury. Would you contribute less?

Do you say, however, that the Southern consumer of domestic manufactures pays to the manufacturer a price enhanced by the imposition of duties on the similar imported manufacture; and that he thus bears a burden, though he does not pay a tax? I answer, first, that if the price is so enhanced, it is enhanced as well to the Northern as to the Southern consumer; there is nothing sectional in the alleged grievance. I say, further, that all the leading American manufactures are, all things considered, rapidly and successfully establishing themselves; that the time is speedily coming when a protecting duty will be unnecessary, or rather will not be felt at all by the consumer in the price of articles; and that, therefore, within the sensible and temperate doctrine of Alexander Hamilton, and even of Mr. Gallatin, as expressed in the memorial of the free trade convention, presented to this Congress at its last session, the present temporary inconvenience ought to be submitted to by the individual, for the sake of that ultimate and certain compensation, a diversified, vigorous, and national manufacturing industry.

I submit, therefore, sir, upon the whole, that we should not pass this bill, because it assumes that a tariff producing only the necessary revenue, cannot be constructed to give effectual protection to manufactures without injustice to the South; a position which I deny; and which, let me say, we cannot admit consistently with our own solemn responsibilities to our constituents, to the nation, to that tribunal "at which nations themselves must one day answer."

Mr. Chairman: There is one more general reason why this House should not now pass this bill, or any bill at all resembling it. That is a fatally bad measure in itself, that it disturbs and endangers all the manufacturing investments of the country, and sacrifices especially those of New England. This, sir, indeed, is enough to decide my vote. But if it were not quite so palpably and radically bad, I should hope it would be promptly rejected. Sir, the actual motives on which gentleman will perform the duty which this occasion devolves on them, will be various and secret, and all deserving respect. By me they shall not be impeached or questioned. Some, undoubtedly, will vote for the bill upon a consistent and avowed and settled hostility to the protective system. Some, perhaps, because their interests are spared, and those only of their neighbors and allies are sacrificed. Some, again, upon an honest apprehension for the integrity of the Union. But, sir, the country, history, will stamp this proceeding as a concession to the sovereignty of South Carolina.

There is but one ground on which you can account for the vote you give for this bill, and it is, that South Carolina, has nullified every existing tariff. But you deny her right to nullify the law; and you agree with the President; you agree with the people speaking through their local Governments, their primary assemblies, and the press, as with a voice of thunder, that she must admit, though she were the fairest and dearest of the whole sisterhood of the States. You propose, then, to abandon a policy, sixteen, or rather forty years old; sanctioned by every President and every Congress; by the acquiescence of a large constitutional majority of the people; by a long, splendid, and robust national prosperity; a policy to which, five months ago, you gave your sanction; to abandon it without inquiry, without instruction from your constituents, yet against their known interests and presumed will; to abandon it, not to justice, for you do not believe that justice demands it; not in deference to the opposition of a respectable constitutional minority, for that you have all along thought it your duty to disregard; but in deference to this strange, half-peaceable, half-forcible, wholly unconstitutional interposition of a single State!

Reduction of the Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, it is for those, if any such there are, who, out of this House, are pressing this bill along, from any motive of political ambition, to consider how it may affect the chances of public men for high office, thus to make nullification a triumphant and recognized part of our already sufficiently complicated system. It is for us, the members of this House, who believe "that the preservation of the General Government, in its whole constitutional vigor, is the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad," and that "absolute acquiescence in the decision of the majority is the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism:" It is for us to pause long and anxiously before we do any thing to establish the precedent, fraught with all unimaginable and immitigable evil, that a small majority of a single State, whether of the fourth class, or the first, shall make the laws of this Union. Sir, in this view, our situation is undoubtedly one of interest and responsibility. Thank God, however, our duty is as plain as it is important. Sir, these unauthorized risings against the law, I will not call them what the law calls them, revolts, rebellions, treason, are among, I do not say the ordinary, but they are among the inevitable and not unfrequent perils which menace all human Governments. Remember, they are the same under our system that they are under every other. Our federal constitution, and our separation into States, may give them force, organization, complexity; but they do not change their nature. Essentially, here, and everywhere else, they are things irreconcilably antagonist to the rightful supremacy of the public will. Here, and everywhere else, there is but one of two alternatives for choice. They must be put down by the Government, or the Government must be put down by them.

Mr. GILMORE, of Pennsylvania said: Great responsibility rests upon the action of this Congress. We have arrived at a critical period in our Government, where one misstep may seal our ruin; a healing policy alone will answer, which I apprehend is contained in the bill under consideration. The bill proposes to reduce the duties to the wants of the Government, and so to arrange these duties as to afford a fair and reasonable protection to those great interests which have grown up under the faith of the Government. These are my views, and, if accomplished, all will be well.

By a fair and reasonable protection, I do not mean prohibition, neither do I mean an insurance against the fluctuation of the market by an excessive influx; but merely such protection as will counteract foreign regulations, and compensate for the difference in the cost of manufacturing. Is this not fair? Why should more be required, if protection alone is wanted, and when murmurs and discontents exist in the South? They say the operation is unequal; that one branch of industry is taxed to support another, and that they are compelled to pay more than their just proportion as to the equality of duties on the manufacturing and non-manufacturing States. I shall read an extract from the Federalist, a book of high authority: "When the demand is equal to the quantity of goods at market, the consumer generally pays the duty; but when the markets happen to be overstocked, a great proportion falls upon the merchant, and sometimes not only exhausts his profits, but breaks in on his capital. I am apt to think that a division of the duty between the seller and the buyer more often happens than is commonly imagined. It is not always possible to raise the price of a commodity in exact proportion to every additional imposition laid upon it. The merchant, especially in a country of small commercial capital, is often under a necessity of keeping prices down, in order to more expeditious sale. The maxim that the consumer is the payer, is so much oftener true than the reverse of the proposition, that it is far more equitable that the duties on imports should go into a common stock, than that they should redound to the exclusive benefit of the importing States. But is it not so generally true, as to render it equitable that these duties should form the only national fund? When they are paid by the merchant, they operate as an additional tax upon the importing States, whose citizens pay their proportion of them in their characters of consumers. In this view, they are productive of inequality among the States; which inequality would be increased with the increased extent of the duties. The confinement of the national revenues to this species of imposts would be attended with inequality from a different cause, between the manufacturing and non-manufacturing States. The States which can go farthest towards the supply of their own wants, by their own manufactures, will not, according to their numbers or wealth, consume so great a proportion of imported articles as those States which are not in the same favorable situation; they could not, therefore, in this mode alone, contribute to the public treasury in a ratio to their abilities.

Sir, I believe we have the power of protection, and I agree as to the expediency, at least so far as can be confined within the limits of a revenue standard.

The first great interest which I shall notice, requiring protection, is iron. This I place on a footing different from other manufactures. It is the first necessary of civilized life, "and contributes most to the wealth, the comfort, and the improvement of society." It is essential to the independence and defence of a nation. It is a great national object, in which we are all interested. I have no practical experience as to the making of iron; but from the best information I can obtain, I believe the protection proposed by this bill will be sufficient, and in a short time it may be reduced, if not dispensed with entirely. Our beds of ore and banks of coal are inexhaustible. A coking company is formed in this country, and when the application of stone coal is perfectly understood, we can make iron as cheap here as in any part of the world.

In England, in consequence of the encroachments on the forest in the year 1788, the quantity of iron made out of charcoal had dwindled down to thirteen thousand tons per annum. At that time coke was introduced into the blast furnaces, and in less than eight years it increased more than tenfold; and, at this time, they make annually to the amount of eight hundred thousand tons, being more than all the world besides. The honorable gentleman from Connecticut, my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) if I understood him correctly, seemed to insinuate that my course, in relation to this bill, was influenced by the favor shown to Pennsylvania on iron. Pennsylvania asks but equal justice; she claims no favor nor preference over her sister States. My colleague (Mr. CRAWFORD) thinks iron is not sufficiently protected, and can see no reason when we took the act of 1816, and its supplements of 1818, as the basis of our bill, that we did not put rolled iron at thirty dollars as it stood under the act of 1816. I say in reply, that I believe twenty-four dollars a sufficient protection for rolled iron, and is one step towards justice; the difference between hammered and rolled iron appeared unwarrantable; and even the justice of the discrimination may be doubted, if the expediency should not, as will be seen by the following letter:

[Here Mr. G. read a letter from Mr. Stratford Canning, Minister of Great Britain, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated Washington, November 26, 1812.]

But I shall proceed to notice the testimony taken before the Committee on Manufactures, in 1828. The following question was proposed to several witnesses, to wit: If wool be the same price here as in England, can the American manufacturer make the fabric as cheap as it is made in England?

[Mr. Gilmore here quoted the written opinions of fifteen American manufacturers sustaining his views.]

Sir, I have no doubt considerable embarrassment will be the consequence of a reduction of the duties; it is always the case; but this is unavoidable. The national debt being paid off, the people will not submit to taxation or high duties, and suffer money to accumulate in the treasury. Bringing the protection to the revenue standard will give stability and uniformity to the system, and less protection will be required than where the system is shifting and changing. But it is apprehended that the proposed reduction would induce foreign manufacturers to glut the market at a present loss, with the hope of a future gain, by breaking down our establishments. This I consider without foundation, in consequence of the difficulty in dividing the loss among themselves.

The fact is, all the great branches of manufactures are already overdone. England alone could supply the world. The labor-saving machinery used there is equal to the labor of two hundred millions of people. The labor-saving machinery used here is perhaps equal to the labor of four times our present population. It is evident, then, that the production may easily exceed the consumption, because population cannot keep pace. But I shall not enlarge, nor detain the committee longer.

WEDNESDAY, January 16.

South Carolina—Nullification—Secession.

A message was received from the President of the United States, communicating the nullifying ordinance of the South Carolina convention, and other papers relating thereto, together with the President's own views, as to what was proper to be done in the existing posture of the Union in reference to that State.

Mr. WILDE said it was obvious that the message just read was universally felt to be of the most solemn importance. This might be seen in the anxious countenances which surrounded him. We had arrived at a solemn crisis—a crisis of the most extraordinary character. It had, for the first time since the institution of the Government, been announced to Congress by the Chief Magistrate of the United States, that one of the States of the Union had denied the power of our laws. If we persevere in enforcing these laws, she claims the right of withdrawing from the Union. This right she has announced that she will exercise, and will relieve her citizens from the operation of the laws of the United States, peaceably if she may, and with violence if that should become necessary. This was not the ordinary case of enforcing the execution of the laws upon private individuals.

The SPEAKER said, if the gentleman proposed to make any motion, he would be pleased to submit his proposition in writing.

Mr. WILDE said his proposition was, that the message and the accompanying documents be printed; and that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow, in order that gentlemen might, after due reflection

South Carolina—Nullification and Secession—The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

upon this momentous topic, come to its consideration with calmer feelings.

Motion to postpone was negatived.

Mr. AROHER moved to refer the message and documents to the Committee on the Judiciary. The object of the message was to bring to the attention of Congress the necessity for certain laws. If Congress concurred in the views stated, he would put it to the House whether the Judiciary Committee was not the most proper to examine and report upon the subject. He had been surprised at the proposition to refer the message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Was that committee competent to digest and prepare the necessary measures? By such a reference every object of reference would be prostrated. The subject would be turned loose upon the wide field of debate only for the purpose of creating excitement. All that was suggested in the message as necessary, was certain additions and amendments to the revenue laws. For the purpose of reporting these additions and amendments, the Judiciary Committee was the most proper. It was not, perhaps, very important whether the reference was to a standing or select committee. Either would fully and speedily accomplish the object desired. But he hoped the reference would not be made to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless gentlemen desired to go into a protracted debate without practical result.

Mr. LAWIX said, the standing committees were selected in reference to the duties they were ordinarily called on to perform. He would ask if this was an ordinary subject? It was one of the very highest magnitude, and should be sent to a committee raised with express reference to it, instead of being sent to one of the standing committees. He should therefore vote against its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CAMBRELENG begged gentlemen to reflect that if the message was sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, probably three weeks would be spent in debate upon it. All that was desired, was that a committee should report the necessary amendments to the present laws relative to the collection of the revenue. The whole subject was of a judicial nature. One great object was to obviate the replevin law of South Carolina and provide for enforcing the laws of the United States. In his opinion no course was so proper to effect this object, as the proposed reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The reference was then made to the Judiciary Committee by a large majority of the House.

Mr. CLAY moved the message and documents be printed, which was adopted, and twenty-five thousand additional copies were ordered.

THURSDAY, January 17.

Tariff Bill.

Mr. McKENNAH, of Pennsylvania said: Sir, the protective policy has been recognized as the true policy of the country ever since the foundation of the Government. Almost the first act of Congress, which was passed after the adoption of the constitution, was entitled, in part, "An act for the protection and encouragement of manufactures."

The essential importance of this policy to the wealth and independence of the nation early attracted the attention of the father of his country, who was always alive to every thing which was calculated to promote its best interests; and who, in his Executive messages, pressed upon Congress the promotion and encouragement of it, with all the solicitude he felt for the future glory and prosperity of that country. In this his efforts have been seconded by all the distinguished men who have since filled the Executive chair down to the present period; each and all of whom have in some form or other, advocated and maintained, encouraged and enforced it, as the only true policy.

Eight years of actual experiment satisfied the people, and their representatives, that the protection afforded our manufacturers by the law of 1816, was insufficient to enable them successfully to compete with foreign capital and skill, and with the pauper labor of Europe, and determined them to carry out the principle of that law, by giving to the labor and enterprise of our citizens, efficiency, ample encouragement, and protection. This determination produced the enactment of the laws of 1824 and 1828, which did afford to our farmers, mechanics, and manufacturers all necessary protection and encouragement. Believing, then, the policy of the Government to be settled, fixed, and permanent, as evidenced by these various acts of legislation, hundreds, yea, thousands of millions of dollars have been vested by the people in the establishment of manufactories, and in the growth and culture of the raw material consumed in them throughout the country—the whole of which, there is too much reason to fear, will be sacrificed, if the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, now under discussion, shall be adopted by Congress.

And now, Mr. Chairman, permit me briefly to inquire what have been the practical operation and effect of this system upon the interests and upon the prosperity of the country? Commerce, contrary to the anticipations of its enemies, has flourished—the mechanic arts have been encouraged—the laborer has experienced a greater demand and higher wages for his labor—the farmer has been secured a steadier and a better market for his produce—the planter of the Southern States has prospered—the manufacturer has prospered—the whole country, and all its parts have prospered, not excepting the very State which is now so loudly and so boldly presenting its complaints; whose flourishing condition is exhibited in the most glowing colors in the last annual message of her Executive; and besides all this, sir, under the operation of this very system, will shortly be exhibited to the world the extraordinary and astounding spectacle of a nation of better than twelve millions of people, free of debt.

Sir, a system which has been fraught with so many benefits and blessings to the nation, ought to be touched with care, with delicacy, and with caution! Whilst the extinguishment of the public debt will be hailed by our citizens as an era of exultation and of mutual congratulation, it is apparent that its approach will not be unattended with its difficulties, embarrassments, and dangers. It is conceded, that when that era does arrive, there must be some modification or alteration and reduction of the duties heretofore imposed upon imports, in order to prevent the accumulation of a surplus revenue in the treasury, above the amount necessary to discharge all the expenditures of the Government; and how this is to be done, without endangering great and important interests, is a question of no ordinary difficulty. In anticipation of this event, a bill for the reduction of the duties was passed at the last session of this Congress. At least four months were occupied in preparing, maturing, and discussing the merits and the provisions of that bill. In it great and important concessions were made to our brethren of the South. The minimum system which has latterly become so obnoxious to them, was abolished. "Those articles, principally necessary for the maintenance and clothing of the laborers of the South and South-west, were, to a certain degree, relieved; and, both by its direct enactments, and as incident to its main scope, it encouraged and increased consumption of such articles as depended for their fabrication upon the raw materials and productions of the South." It is now before the people as a matter of experiment. The time proposed for its going into operation has not yet arrived. What will be its effect upon the revenue, and (what I consider of greater importance) what will be its operation upon the industry of the country, cannot be known or ascertained. No experience of the past can enable us to determine, and no man, unless he possesses the spirit of prophecy, can tell.

With this law, then, on our statute book, as yet inoperative, why are we now driven with an urgency which will not admit of a month's, a week's, an hour's delay, into the passage of another bill of reduction, which, with all due deference to the committee who reported it, may, in my view, be better denominated a bill for the prostration of domestic industry. Where is the imperious demand for this precipitancy in the passage of a bill, which involves in it the most vitally important interests of the country? Have we heard a voice, sir, from home—from our constituents—thundering in our ears, and demanding the immediate reversal of the act which we did, with so much deliberation, not six months ago. Where is it? Has any one heard it?

What then, is the state of the facts which have probably dictated this movement? They have been officially announced to us in the message of the President, and are spread before the people; we cannot close our eyes upon them. A single State of this Union has raised her puny arm against the power of the Government. I use this term, sir, not with any view of disparagement or insult to the State which has thought proper to place herself in this attitude. But the arm of any single State, of any six single States, is puny and powerless when raised against a Government founded upon the affections of the people, and which has strength enough to crush into nothingness any forcible opposition to the enforcement of its laws, from whatever quarter, or from whatever persons, it may proceed.

South Carolina has placed herself in an attitude of hostility against the Government. She has pronounced your laws unconstitutional, void, no law, and has declared that they shall not be enforced within her limits. Is this the time, then, sir, for deliberation, for cool, deliberate, dispassionate discussion of a subject involving the permanent change of a system which has raised the country to a point of unexampled prosperity, and which, in its overthrow, may involve millions in ruin and wretchedness? Can it be expected that we will be driven by the menaces of South Carolina, to recede from the ground we have taken, to abandon the policy, and the very principle of protection to American enterprise and American labor? For she has proclaimed to the world that she will be satisfied with nothing less than a total, absolute, unqualified abandonment of the principle. Sir, she asks too much, and I, for one, am prepared to say that I cannot, will not, grant it. The bill upon your table, sir, destructive as I consider it to be to the interests of the Northern, Middle, and Western States, would not satisfy her, for it asserts, in form, at least, the principle of protection.

I hope with all my heart, sir, although I confess, from present indications, it seems to be hoping against hope, that she may recede from the fatal ground she has assumed. The universal voice of condemnation which has been heard from one extreme of the Union to the other, from each and all of her sister States, ought to satisfy her that she has gone too far. But, sir, if she refuses this advice, and will persist in her career of madness, we must meet the crisis, and meet it like men, with forbearance, but with firmness. In the humble part which I have to act, I shall endeavor, fearlessly and firmly, to discharge my duty to my conscience, my constituents, and my country, and leave the consequences to that superintending Providence, who, I hope and trust, will deliver us in this time of difficulty, of distress, and of danger.

Mr. Root, of New York said: He did not suppose that the bill now submitted to their consideration was originated with any view of altering the system of protective policy, which, it seemed, was established in this country; it origination in the present session was, unquestionably, owing to the organized, and, if they pleased, legal opposition offered by one portion of the country, against the collection of revenue under the tariff laws of 1828 and 1832. Unquestionably the bill before the House was introduced for the accomplishment of the purposes recommended by the President at the opening of the session, and with a view to conciliate, if possible, their Southern brethren, and to induce them to stay their hand in opposing the laws. This bill, then, whether regarded as an act of justice, or as a sacrifice offered up on the altar of their country, was certainly a laudable measure. As an act of justice, he was willing to support it. He had ever believed, and he still believed, that the imposition of taxes, by way of duties on imports, further than was necessary to meet the just demands of the Government, was both oppressive and unjust; and that to lay such duties, was to take from one citizen for the purpose of giving to another. If the duty were laid merely by way of protection, somebody must be the loser, and it must be done for the benefit of somebody who was to be the gainer by it; because, the world was made no richer by the imposition of these duties; they accumulated no additional wealth in the world; they brought no additional treasures into the nation; they could not do so, because they were not creative in their effects. They had this effect, and they could have no other; they made the price for a given article, purchased from the American manufacturer, higher than it would be if no such duties existed. It was evident, then, that the manufacturer was benefited by them; he was the gainer, and the consumer must be the loser. He had said that those duties gave no additional treasure to the nation; perhaps it would be argued that they acted as an incentive to a greater degree of industry, and that, therefore, they did enrich the nation. Why, sir, said Mr. R., if this be your only object, you might as well tax the people in some other way, to pay the laborer for doing that which would be of no use when done; but I imagine, sir, the people will hardly feel it just that they should be ground down by taxes, merely, forsooth, for the purpose of making them more industrious in the performance of useless drudgeries imposed on them by their masters. At the opening of the session, I was rejoiced exceedingly to find a feature in the message of the Executive, which so completely conformed to my own views on taxation. I did hope that those views would be carried through, and sustained by Congress. I still hope they will, and with this modification, that the duties shall be laid in such a manner as to raise a moderate revenue, sufficient for the expenses and exigencies of the Government, and no more; and, at the same time, incidentally protect American industry. Mr. R. said that a bill, modified in this shape, would have his most cordial support. There was one modification which he must especially require at the hands of the committee; it was, that the agricultural produce, which was the great staple of the county in which he resided, should not be left entirely destitute of protection; but that, on the contrary, the raw material should receive the same protection, whatever it might be, which was given to the manufacturer for goods manufactured from it: the article to which he alluded was wool.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania might suppose that the spot where he resided was more highly favored of heaven, and that, therefore, it was of most consequence to the nation. Be it so. But the county in which I reside, said Mr. R., situated on yonder hills, contains a larger quantity of sheep, in proportion to its population, as computed at its last census, and likewise in proportion to the number of cultivated acres, than any other county in the Union. And he would tell gentlemen that the tariff of 1828, he might say the tariff of 1824, but more especially that of 1828, bore harder upon the people of that county, than it did on any other country, either in Carolina or in Georgia. They had, indeed, the solace, that then it was that a duty was imposed on wool; wool was protected; and, in a county, where they paid annually to the treasury duties to the amount of sixty or seventy thousand dollars. This was the only thing which sweetened the bitter draught; for he could assure the House the duties on sugar was no sweetener; their only solace was the duty on wool, and the consequent high price of the fleece. The bill before the House proposed to take that protection away; but if from wool, let them take it from woollens also, and not hire Europeans to cross the Atlantic to work up the raw material here. Let them work up their own, or let the raw material be shipped from this country to work up there, rather than give a bounty to workmen to cross the Atlantic.

But gentlemen appeared to feel some alarm about passing such a bill just now. He had heard it said, to be sure, it was in a confabulatory manner; but he had heard it said that it would not do to pass a bill reducing the duties at the present session. Why not? Because, forsooth, it would be regarded as an evidence of fear, or as an abject submission, under the threats of one State of the Union, which, it seemed, had put itself in hostile array against the present tariff laws. What! said Mr. R., because that State has, by its convention, declared its grievances, and has further declared that, inasmuch as it considers those laws unjust and unconstitutional, it also considers them null and void; because of this, is nothing left us but to bear the strong arm of power? Will it be an exhibition of cowardice, an evidence of fear? Will it show submission to South Carolina, to do that which is right and just? For my own part, sir, I shall not feel my own individual honor wounded if this offering be made, whether it be on the altar of justice, or on that of concord. Be just and fear not. Is it an act of justice? Do it, then. Is it an act of conciliation, a sacrifice, if you will, on the altar of concord? If it is that, and that alone, willingly, sir, will I, for one, make it.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18.

Tariff Bill—Reduction—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

MR. VERPLANCK rose. He began by regretting the course which the discussion had taken; and that the opponents of the bill had not complied with the invitation he had given, at an early period, in behalf of the committee which had reported it. It was their wish to have taken up the bill, section by section, and item by item, so that, upon any motion to amend, or any objection from any quarter, such defence or explanation as the occasion might call for, could be offered by the committee, and for this they were fully prepared. Unfortunately, as Mr. V. thought, for a fair consideration of this bill, a long, ardent, and desultory debate had been excited, by those who were adverse to its whole policy. In the discussion, upon a motion to strike out the duty on teas, the great principles which been so often agitated in the present, as well as in many a former Congress, were again drawn into debate. In addition to this, almost every item of the bill had been touched upon in some way or other, and transiently attacked; woollens, and iron, and cottons, and tobacco, had their turn; and my distinguished colleague from New York, (Mr. ROOR,) whom I have known for years as the champion of wool, had just driven his flock of sheep down from his Delaware mountains into the throng of the debate.

It is difficult now to reply to all these objections in a manner to be of any practicable use in deciding these several points. They must, if we proceed in the bill, come up in detail, and the committee, if called upon, will then endeavor to show the grounds upon which the several rates in it have been fixed. How it was, for instance, that woollens, which it was said had been unreasonably reduced, in comparison with other articles, had, in fact, no small compensation for that difference, by a reduction of the duties on the raw material, oil, and dye stuffs. How it was, to take another instance, that the duty on tobacco, which had been complained of as an excessive protection of Southern interests, was, in fact, so purely nominal upon an article of which we exported five millions of dollars' worth a year to foreign markets, that the committee had not thought it worth while to legislate specially about it, and had, therefore, left it subject to the operation of former laws. If any gentleman wished to introduce an amendment on this specific point, it would probably meet with but little opposition, and should it become part of a law, it would probably produce just as little effect.

Waiving all these details, as well as the discussion of those general principles of constitutional law and public policy, which would find a more appropriate place when the bill was reported to be finally acted upon in the House, if it should have that good fortune, Mr. V. said it was his intention to endeavor to come back to the question more immediately before us. He would, therefore, endeavor to reply to some of the objections which had the most direct and practical bearing upon the details of the bill. Among the most formidable of these, were the financial difficulties which had been so ingeniously raised by his able colleague on the committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. INGRESOLL,) who had alone dissented from the report and bill presented by the rest of the committee.

The ground of the argument was this, that whether the plan of finance now proposed was good or bad, the present was not the time for financial reduction: that the treasury still required, for some years, the aid of the higher duties and large income provided for by the existing laws: that, in fact, at the expiration of the last year, the treasury was left not only empty, but subject to a heavy charge of debt, without the means to meet it.

It had been said, that, on the 1st January, 1833, the only remaining funds in the treasury were the million and a half which had, year after year, figured in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury as unavailable funds, consisting of the paper of broken State banks, whilst the treasury was still subject to various heavy demands. These were, first, seven millions of funded debt; next, about five millions and a half of unsatisfied appropriations, for various purposes, made during the last year; and, thirdly, about seven hundred thousand dollars paid by the Government of Denmark as a compensation for spoiliations on our commerce, which was merely a temporary deposit in our treasury, to be paid over to the merchants when their claims were adjusted.

Let us see, said Mr. V., how this matter stands. And, first, as to the funded debt. This the Committee of Ways and Means had considered, as they stated in their report, to be fairly liquidated, by setting off the stock owned by the Government in the Bank of the United States. This stock, at the market price, somewhat exceeded the present amount of the debt due by the nation. It also produced an interest, and was likely to do so, during the continuance of the Bank charter, of about one hundred and sixty thousand dollars annually, above the interest payable on the national debt.

It had been said that the bank stock could not be sold without glutting the market; thus depreciating its value to the Government, and ruining individual stockholders. Certainly this might be done, if all branches of the Government were so disposed; but it was equally certain that it would not be done. It would be very easy to empower the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of this stock at a price not less than its true value, and under such restrictions as would prevent any fluctuations in the stock market, injurious to either public or private interests. The Bank itself might be authorized to purchase the stock, and it might be made the interest of that institution to do so, as enabling it to operate, for the remainder of its charter, upon smaller capital, and, consequently, with greater profits. What restrictions as to the sale, might be necessary, would be for the wisdom of Congress to determine hereafter. But if from any cause whatever, no such sale could be effected, still the funded debt unpaid was substantially provided for by the Bank stock. There was an income of nearly 500,000 dollars a year during the existence of the Bank charter to meet the payment of the interest on the debt amounting to less than three hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year; and, in the meanwhile, until the principal of the Bank stock was refunded, the payment of the debt might be anticipated, and extinguished, in whole or in part, by the application of such balances as would remain in the treasury at the end of each year. For I think it may be made to appear that in all human probability, under the operation of this bill, should it become a law, there will be such balances remaining unexpended in the treasury. Here, then, there is no debt unprovided for, at which the most timid political economist need be alarmed.

The second difficulty raised is of a more plausible character. I mean that founded on the unsatisfied appropriations for former years. Of the moneys appropriated during 1882, for the service of that year, there are still five millions and a half of unsatisfied appropriations. These are debts, it is said, for which the nation is liable; that we owe the money; that there can be no higher claim than an appropriation by Congress; that we should be always ready to meet these demands, however and whenever they come; and that the treasury is not now in a state to do so.

Let us again look at the true state of the case. Thirty years' experience, during peace and war, has shown us that there are, of necessity, in every financial year, certain portions of the appropriations which will not only not be paid during that year, but, in fact, from the mode of expenditure, can never be payable until late in the next. These are of various kinds, and it would weary the patience of the committee were I to enumerate them all. A considerable proportion of them are in the naval service. A large amount of the sum appropriated for the gradual increase of the navy, is applied to contracts for cannon, copper, and other materials, and for frames for frigates and seventy-fours. These contracts, of course, take a considerable time, often a year or more, for their completion, and the payments are consequently deferred until that period. So in the large annual appropriations for pay afloat in the navy, two-thirds, on an average, of such appropriations, applicable to distant squadrons, is never payable until their return to the United States. So also in contracts for the army, for cannon, provisions, clothing, &c., the money is not payable until the contract is fulfilled, and a large proportion of these are not payable until a year after the nominal appropriation is made. Thus, a portion of the actual appropriations of every year are but nominal debts during that year, and remain so until they become earned and payable in a succeeding one. Some portion of this is never earned or expended, and after two years returns to the general funds, by being passed, in the books of the treasury, to what is called the surplus fund. There are also, of course, some portions of the appropriations which, from less fixed and regular causes, are either not payable or not claimed until more than a year after such appropriation. Thus there are always, and have been uninterruptedly, for many years, and must always be, some three, four, or five millions of the sums appropriated in each year, and more as the appropriations increase, actually chargeable upon the income received during the next.*

It is due to candor to allow that, owing to the protracted session of the last summer, and the late period at which some of the appropri-

* What is here stated by Mr. Verplanck in relation to the unapplied balances of appropriations, presents a curious problem in the financial working of the Government—a paradox! but not the less true, because apparently impossible and contradictory. The statement (reduced to its brief meaning) is, that the moneyed operations of the Government can be carried upon less than its income,—one-fifth less at the time Mr. Verplanck was speaking, and frequently a quarter less. In other words, that the annual appropriations do not require an annual income of the same amount to meet them, but can be met by a fourth or a fifth part less, resulting from the fact that the whole appropriations cannot be applied within the year; and that the unapplied part becomes available for the next year—its place being supplied by the daily income. And this not only true of the last quarter of the year, but of every quarter in it; and so on to continue, to the end of the last year of the Government.

This is a point to which the attention of the author of this Abridgment was early directed after he came into the Senate. He had seen the working of the British system of finance in this particular, and how it was corrected (in his time) by the elder Mr. Pitt; and he wished to bring the same reform into the working of the American financial system. The reserve of money in the treasury, authorized by law at that time, was two millions of dollars. That reserve was authorized by the Sinking Fund act of 1817, drawn by Mr. Lowndes. The author of this Abridgment believed, first, that the act had been erroneously construed; and, secondly, that there was no necessity for any reserve by law at all; and submitted resolutions, enforced by a speech, to that effect, (March 2, 1838.) The resolutions met with no favor. They were referred to the Financial Committee, and reported against. But two years afterwards their object was accomplished. The fourth section of the Sinking Fund act of 1817—the section that made the reserve—was repealed, (April 24, 1840.) And the moneyed operations of the Government went on, not only as well, but better than before; for, the greater freedom given to the Treasury, enabled the public debt to be paid off the sooner. But the experience of that day has been lost, and ation bills passed, this amount is something greater than usual during the present year. But it is asked, is it not the part of a prudent statesman to keep always a sum in the treasury to meet these demands, which will certainly come at some time or other? Would not every prudent man do so in regard to his own affairs? Would such a man trust to contingencies to meet demands which he knows must be paid in three, six, or nine months? Certainly he would not. Neither does the Treasury of the United States. Nor yet is it obliged to keep a large sum of money lying unemployed, and for this simple reason: if there is always a certain amount of the appropriation of one year remaining to be paid in the next, there is also always a much larger amount of revenue earned in the one year, which, in consequence of our credit system of revenue, is not paid until the next. Under the former system of long credits, which is still partly in operation, two-thirds of the revenue earned in any one year, and secured by the best commercial security, falls due in one year, and is paid in the next. Under the shorter credits of the act of 1832, this proportion is altered; about one-half falling due within the year of importation, the other half in the next. Many years of custom-house experience have shown us that these securities are perfectly to be relied upon; and that even during the most disastrous periods of trade, the losses to Government are trifling in the extreme. In the present year, it so happens that, to meet the five millions and a half of the unsatisfied appropriations of 1832, there is a net revenue accruing from the custom-house bonds, given in 1832, and actually falling due weekly and daily during the present year, amounting to fifteen millions six hundred thousand dollars. Would any prudent man, in private life, under similar circumstances, consider his debts unprovided for? Ought any statesman, under such circumstances, wish to tax the people for the sake of accumulating money in the treasury? The policy of storing up treasures of gold and silver for future uses, is that of a past age. We now live in what one of our own poets, who is a man of business as well as a poet, has happily termed "a bank note world," in which, though there is doubtless too much paper, yet the place of Government hoards of gold and silver is well and safely supplied by commercial securities or custom-house bonds and deposits. This is no new doctrine: it is the settled policy of our Government. It was originally recommended and enforced by the late Mr. Lowndes, and was finally and fully carried into effect by an act passed about four years ago, repealing the old provisions for keeping a surplus in the treasury, and authorizing the head of that department to apply, at his discretion, the whole of the unexpended balances, at the end of each year, to the payment of the public debt. It is by the judicious exercise of this power that the extinction of the debt has been so rapidly hastened.

I come to another class of objections. These are in regard to the amount of revenue to be derived from this bill. It is indeed difficult to reply to all these. They remind me of the story told of (I think) Dean Swift, who once asked an acquaintance, "Did you ever find any good weather in the course of your life?" The other replied, "Yea, thank heaven! a great deal." "Now," said the cynical wit, "I never did; I have always found it too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry." Our poor bill has met with even harder censures than that of Swift upon the weather. It is not only too hot or too cold, too wet and too dry, too high and too low alternately, but all of them at the same time. One gentleman undertakes to prove that it will leave the treasury naked, bare, and desolate as the sea-shore at low water, while others pledge themselves to prove that it will bring in such a tide of importation, as will sweep away all the manufactories, and fill the treasury to overflowing.

To all this I have only to reply, that the committee, in their estimates, may have erred somewhat on one side or the other, but that these estimates were not arbitrarily assumed, but were grounded upon well known general laws of importation, consumption, and increase of population, which, like the calculations of insurance or annuities, may fail, in special cases, or in any given year, but always hold good in the main. They have made a calculation of the effect of their bill upon the actual importation of a certain year, that of 1831, for they thought that this would produce a more certain and practical result than could be obtained in any other way. This, it is true, was a year of higher importation than ordinary, though about the same as that of 1832. The committee believed that this excess over the average of former years, though it might perhaps fall short in this or the next year, would not fall short of the average of several years to come, taken together, under the operations of the new bill. They have stated their reasons for this in their report, and I need not minutely recapitulate them. Every year gives us an increase of population as well as wealth, and a consequent increase of consumption, and the means to pay for foreign goods by our own manufactures, or products of the soil, fitted for foreign export.

We have not, however, the vanity to presume that we have framed a perfect bill. We have no pride of opinion on this subject that can prevent us from listening with pleasure to any suggestions intended not to destroy, but to improve the bill; and if good reasons are shown for so doing, we are willing to accept any amendments which may make the language of a new reserve of six millions is now authorized by law. Of that new reserve, this author still thinks what he said once before—that it was a mistake! which economy, the science of administration, and the purity of the Government, required to be corrected.

the bill more clear, precise, or comprehensive, which will proportion the duties more justly, or which will adjust more equitably the several periods of the gradual reduction. All that we claim of this House is, that the bill should be received in the same spirit of frankness in which it is presented, and not assailed with vague and contradictory objections, without the offer of any better plan of impost, either in whole or in part.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 22.

Reduction of the Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

MR. APPLETON, of Massachusetts, said: What are the circumstances under which this measure is brought forward? Notwithstanding the greater part of the last, long protracted session was occupied on this subject; notwithstanding the result of those labors was the passage of a bill, by the votes of a majority of this House almost unprecedented in any important measure—a bill which was received throughout the whole country with all but universal satisfaction, as a fair compromise, as the harbinger of peace, of reduced excitement; notwithstanding all this, we are now informed, by authority, that we must review our work; that that bill will not do; that the whole matter must be gone over again.

The measure before us naturally presents two questions: the first, whether it is necessary, proper, or expedient, that we should pass any bill on this subject; the second, whether, on the supposition that that question is answered in the affirmative, this is such a bill as we ought to pass.

Notwithstanding the impatience of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. POLK,) that we should come to the details of the bill, I must first discuss the preliminary and previous question—are there any good reasons why we should pass any bill at all?

Why, Mr. Chairman, should we disturb the act of last July? Nobody dreamed of doing so before the meeting of Congress. All the reasons are to be found in the communications to this body from the Executive. Let us examine them. The duty is urged upon us of reducing the revenue to the expenditures of the Government; and the first question is, what relation do they now bear to each other?

The President informs us, in his annual message, that "It is expected, however, that, in consequence of the reduced rates of duty, which will take effect after the 3d of March next, there will be a considerable falling off in the revenue from customs in the year 1833. It will, nevertheless, be amply sufficient to provide for all the wants of the public service, estimated even upon a liberal scale, and for the redemption and purchase of the remainder of the public debt."

Well, sir, then for 1833 there is no difficulty. Notwithstanding the reduction in the term of credit for duties after the 3d of March, and the circumstance that a considerable portion of them will be payable in cash, thus concentrating a great part of the revenue of two years, the revenue is only expected to be amply sufficient for the expenditure, including the reimbursement of the balance of the public debt, so that for a year to come, at least, there can be no surplus.

We are next told that "the final removal of this great burden [the public debt] from our resources affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defence which the constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for them.

Here is a sentiment to which the whole nation will respond; the happy era of freedom from debt, presents an admirable opportunity for doing something liberal and glorious for the general welfare.

But, sir, without making any calculation for these proposed objects, of which the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report for the last year, furnished us a long list, have we arrived at a point where we can decide with any degree of certainty or confidence that the revenue, under the bill of last session, will exceed the proper and necessary expenditure of the Government? That bill was framed for the express purpose, and with the express view, to reduce the revenue to the amount of the expenditure, and at the same time, to preserve that incidental protection to manufactures which has always formed a part of our revenue system.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs us, in his last annual report, that he still believes that fifteen millions (as estimated in the report of 1831) is a fair estimate of the probable expenses of the Government, for all objects other than the public debt. I shall assume it to be so; and propose to inquire what reason there is to believe the revenue under the act of July last will exceed that sum.

In doing so, I put out of the question the sales of the public lands, as not furnishing any permanent fund for the expenditure of the Government. It is well known that a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of these sales amongst the several States, passed the other branch of the Legislature during the last session, and was postponed in this House, at the close of the session, by a small majority, on the ground that the time was too short for acting upon so important a matter. There are various other projects for the disposition of these lands; and we are told, by the same high authority under which this bill is brought before us, that "it is our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as may be, to be a source of revenue." It would, therefore, be absurd to take them into view, in an arrangement of the duties intended to be permanent.

Fifteen millions are wanted, then, as revenue from imports, and the question is, whether, under the act of July last, they will produce a greater sum. We find in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury the following paragraph: "Taking an average of the importations, for the last six years, as a probable criterion of the ordinary importations for some years to come, the revenue from customs, at the rates of duty payable after the 3d of March next, may be estimated at eighteen millions of dollars annually."

As the Secretary has not informed us of the process by which he comes to this result, its correctness can only be tested by such data as the official documents furnish; and I confess I cannot, by any calculation which I can make, come to the same result. But before presenting my own calculations, I must call the attention of the committee to another circumstance connected with this inquiry, of a character altogether extraordinary. The President, in his last annual message, urges the necessity of reducing the duties to the revenue standard; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report accompanying it, makes use of the following language, speaking of his report of 1831, communicated to this House at their former session:

"In the last annual report on the state of the finances, the probable expenses for all objects other than the public debt, were estimated at fifteen millions. This is still believed to be a fair estimate, and, if so, there will be an annual surplus of six millions of dollars."

"Still firmly convinced of the truth of the reasons then presented, for a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, I am again urged, by a sense of duty, to suggest that a further reduction of six millions of dollars be made, to take effect after the year 1833. Whether that shall consist altogether of a diminution of the duties on imports, or partly of a relinquishment of the public lands as a source of revenue, as then suggested, it will be for the wisdom of Congress to determine."

"Deeply impressed with these reflections, which are now rendered more urgent by the reduced and limited demands of the public service, I had the honor at the last session of Congress to recommend a reduction of the duties to the revenue standard. The force of those, and similar considerations, and of that recommendation, may be supposed to have received at that time the sanction of Congress, and to have formed a motive of the act of the 14th of July last, notwithstanding that it was not then deemed practicable fully to adopt the recommendation of the department."

Mr. Ohairman, on reading these passages in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I thought it the language of pretty severe reprimand, because we had failed to carry into effect his recommendations for reducing the revenue, and as urging that circumstance as the ground for requiring our further action. In the hurry in which that bill was made to take its final shape, it was not easy to calculate precisely the comparative reduction which it made, as compared with the bill from the treasury: my own impression, at the time, was, that it went quite as far, or farther, than that bill. The language of the Secretary, therefore, a good deal surprised me, as indicating a result so different from my own expectation. It occurred to me, in examining into this matter, to inquire, how far we had failed in our duty; how far we had fallen short of the Secretary's recommendation. I will not conceal my astonishment at the result; and, sir, I ask, what will be the astonishment of this House, should it turn out, after all, that the bill of July provides for as great a reduction of the revenue, as that furnished us by the Secretary himself? Nay, more, sir: what will they think, should the reduction under our own bill go beyond that proposed by the Secretary a full million of dollars? It is, indeed, passing strange; but it is said figures cannot lie, and I can bring them to no other result, as the following table will show:

[Here follow the tables, the results of which are stated in the argument.]

There may be a few other small items, operating both ways, but which cannot affect the result; besides, the addition on raw wool is altogether greater than will ever result in practice: the importation of 1831 being wholly unprecedented, and more than three times the amount imported in any one previous year. It may, therefore, be safely assumed, that the act of July, 1832, reduced the amount of duties more than a million of dollars below those proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, assuming the import of 1831 as the basis. It would seem, therefore, that if the duties have not yet been reduced to the revenue standard, it is not the fault of the two Houses of Congress, who have actually gone beyond the recommendation of the Executive.

The question then arises, have we any good ground for believing that we shall be overburdened with an excess of revenue under the existing law?

It is notorious that, at the present moment, instead of there being any money in the treasury, the balance is actually the other way. In the correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States Bank, it was admitted that the Government would be short at least some few hundred thousand dollars of the amount requisite to pay off the three per cents. on the first of January, and which it wished the Bank to advance on interest. So that, at present, we are in fact somewhat behindhand. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. INGERSOLL) of the Committee of Ways and Means, has shown conclusively, that, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, the balance in the treasury on the first of January, 1835, will be less than the appropriations which will then be outstanding. I do not perceive that this statement is at all impugned by that of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. VERPLANCK.) The only difference appears to be, that the latter thinks we ought to be constantly in debt to the outstanding appropriations some millions; trusting that they will not be called for until we can receive the amount from new sources. This appears to me rather a niggardly course, as a permanent one, for a Government free of debt, and with a reduced income, as it leaves them no available fund for possible contingencies.

Reduction of the Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The most important question, however, is, whether the permanent revenue under the act of 14th July, 1832, will probably exceed the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, the estimated necessary expenditure. In recommending the measure of reduction to us, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report of December, 1831, made use of the following very sensible language:

"It will be difficult precisely to graduate the revenue to the expenditure. The necessity of avoiding the possibility of a deficiency in the revenue, and the perpetual fluctuation in the demand and supply, render such a task almost impracticable. An excess of revenue, therefore, under any prudent system of duties, may be for a time unavoidable; but this can be better ascertained by experience, and the evil obviated, either by enlarging the expenditure for the public service, or by reducing the duties on such articles as the condition of the country would best admit."

I agree fully in these sentiments, and they would seem to offer an irresistible argument against disturbing the existing law, until tested by experience. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his communications of the last year, assumed the amount of imports for 1830 as the basis of his calculation, being 70,876,000 dollars. He now assumes the average of six years, including 1832, which gives 86,260,000 dollars, whilst the Committee of Ways and Means assume 100,000,000.

The importation of 1830 was a very small one. In fact, the only correct mode of estimation for the future is to take an average of years, and in the present case the result will be, as nearly as may be, the same, whether we take an average of four or six years. Taking, then, the average adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, as a fair basis of calculation, and I shall attempt to show that it is the utmost which can safely be taken, from the gross imports of 86,200,000 dollars must be deducted the amount of foreign goods exported, which, on an average of the same period of six years, amount to a fraction over 20,000,000, leaving 66,200,000 as the net amount of foreign imports, including those free and those liable to duty, consumed in the country, and from which the revenue from imposts is to be derived. The only accurate mode of estimating this revenue, under a change of duty, would be, to take the average amount of each article, liable to duty under the new act, imported for the last six years, and, deducting the quantities exported, calculate the duty on the balance, as the average net quantity consumed. We have been furnished with no such table; and, in the absence of it, I must take such data as we have. The table annexed to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means gives twenty-three dollars and sixty-six cents per cent. as the average duty payable on the entire import, under the act of July last, taking the importation of 1831 as a basis of calculation. This ratio will give on the net import of 66,200,000, a revenue of 15,660,000 dollars, subject, however, to a deduction for the expenses of collection, of about a million of dollars.

Now, sir, I think it can be made apparent, that this mode of estimation gives too high a result, because the import of 1831 embraced imports of certain articles paying the highest rates of duty, vastly greater than the average imports of the same articles for six years, or than can safely be calculated on for the future, as the following:

	Import of 1831.	Average of 4 years.	Rate of duty.
Wool costing over 8 cents,	1,234,000	400,000	54 per ct.
Woollens subject to high duties,	6,100,000	4,100,000	50 "
Cottons,	16,090,000	10,800,000	42 "

Now, it must be apparent that this excessive importation in these particular articles goes to increase the rate of duty on the whole importation very materially over any average of years which can be taken. From a calculation which I have made, these items will reduce the average rate of duty from twenty-three dollars sixty-six cents to twenty-two dollars forty-four cents per cent.; and in this table no allowance is made for the reduction of one-half the duty on wines after the 3d of March, 1834. Putting all these things together, I estimate the excess arising from this mode of estimation, as amounting to at least a million of dollars, on the net revenue, which will reduce it below $14,000,000, on the basis assumed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I am not insensible to the dangers which threaten the republic. One of the States of this Union is in rebellion, peaceable rebellion; or if that word sound too harsh, be it a crisis; or, to be more strictly correct, South Carolina is in a state of nullification. But is there any danger so imminent in this? She has done what it was apparent twelve months ago she would do. She has put in practice, as a remedy, a political theory nearly as absurd as the system of political economy on which she founds her grievances. But, sir, in my apprehension, the danger of the present crisis is past; nullification is nullified. The President's proclamation, ratified, as it has been, by one universal burst of public opinion, has killed it. It is true South Carolina is raising troops; but does any one apprehend danger to the Union from South Carolina, by force? with a white population of two hundred and fifty thousand, equally divided, and holding in her bosom three hundred thousand slaves? No, Mr. Chairman, no one apprehends danger from South Carolina alone. No one supposes that South Carolina will undertake to set herself up as a nation by herself. She is acting, and we shall act, under other views. Our sense of danger, and the real danger, lies in the circumstance, that throughout all the Atlantic States owning property in slaves, from the Potomac to the Mississippi, there is a strong feeling of common interest; a strong sympathy for South Carolina; a violent clamor, a great excitement against the protective system; an idea, more or less general, but certainly of a large majority, that the system is unequal in its operation, and injurious to them. Nor is it surprising that this state of feeling should exist. Whoever listened to, or has read the speeches which were delivered in this House, during the last session of Congress, by a certain party, and which were dispersed, thick as autumnal leaves, through the whole region of the South; with other incendiary tracts, all calculated, if not intended, to rouse the whole South to madness, cannot be surprised at the result. We were told in this hall that the protective system was a vampire, by which the North was sucking the warm blood of the South; that the free States were prairie wolves, gorging their jaws by instinct in the blood of the South, whilst oppression, robbery, and plunder were sounded to every note of the gamut. Is the result surprising? Those who could not understand the argument on which their wrongs were founded, could understand the application; and coming from such sources, can it be wondered at that the existence of these wrongs should be believed.

Now I suppose that it will be conceded that a great majority of the people of the States north of the Potomac, and of the West, believe the system of protection to be one of sound policy; that the practical operation of it has been beneficial to them, and injurious to none; that the prostration of the system will inflict real injury on them, by paralyzing their industry, without proving of any benefit to the South; but that, on the contrary, they will suffer in the general injury. This is the state of the case. It certainly presents matter for grave consideration, for wise and deliberate counsel. But do we lessen the danger by refusing to look it calmly in the face? The danger is disunion. Shall we strengthen this Union, and lessen this danger, by yielding up what a majority of this House in their consciences believe, what a majority of this nation believe, to be a great national good, in compliance to opinions which we believe to be wholly erroneous? That such is the opinion of a majority of this House, stands on record in the journals of the last session, under the sanction and responsibility with which we perform the duties of our high trust. Under these circumstances, I also ask, in the language of the President, what shall be done? Shall we sacrifice great interests, under the influence of panic, or shall we examine fearlessly into the nature of the malady, and ascertain if it be capable of a permanent cure.

It is apparent that this great difference of opinion grows out of one great circumstance in the condition of the different sections of the country—the existence and non-existence of slavery. The great question is, whether this circumstance presents any real incompatibility or difference of interests, so as to make a system which is favorable to one section actually injurious to another. This is rather a question of fact. I am favorably inclined to the proposition of the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Buzza), or something of similar character, for a large committee, or for commissioners, to inquire into the actual operations of the tariff; to bring the sufferings of the South into something like a tangible shape; to give us facts, of which we have so little, in the place of theory, of which we have so much. I should like an inquiry into the state and effect of manufactures, thorough and searching, like those which are gone into before committees of the British Parliament on all questions affecting great interests.

Then, sir, there is another consideration connected with this subject. The tariff is put forward as the great, the only ground of complaint; but is it the only ground of apprehension, of fear? Sir, it is idle to disguise it. Every man who hears me knows that there is a question behind the tariff, to which that is but as dust in the balance; a question which includes what may emphatically be called the Southern interest, the Southern feeling; which includes also the fear and apprehension of the South that the General Government may one day interfere with the right of property in slaves. This is the bond which unites the South in a solid phalanx, and this is the key to their jealousy of allowing a liberal construction of the constitution in relation to the powers of the General Government. Why does Virginia pass weeks together in discussing the abstract right of secession from the Union? Does she wish to secede? No, sir, except in one event. She wishes to keep the door open, in case the question of emancipation should ever be seriously brought before Congress. There lie on the table before you certain resolutions of the State of Georgia, proposing a convention of the States for certain enumerated purposes. I noticed, when these resolutions were reported in the Georgia Legislature, an additional proposition for the consideration of the convention, viz., what further security should be obtained for a certain description of property. This was struck out, by unanimous consent; and why? Was it that this last consideration, like the postscript to a letter, was not considered important? Not at all; but it was not thought expedient to express any distrust of the security under the present constitution. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I believe the South are unduly sensitive on this point. I know of no Northern statesman who calls in question the inviolability of the property in slaves under the constitution. I am sure the people of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, have no more disposition than they believe they have right to interfere in this matter in any way. But, sir, this extreme sensitiveness and apprehension on the part of the South in this matter, is an element too important to be overlooked in adjusting their supposed grievances.

There is another question. Does the South really wish the continuance of the Union? I have no doubt of the attachment of the mass of the people of the South to the Union, as well as of every other section of the country; but it may well be doubted whether certain leading politicians have not formed bright visions of a Southern confederacy. This would seem to be the only rational ground for accounting for the movements in South Carolina. A Southern confederacy, in which South Carolina should be the central State, and Charleston the commercial emporium, may present some temptations for individual ambition.

MONDAY, February 4.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEISTER, of Pennsylvania, presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that slavery may be abolished within the District of Columbia.

Mr. H. said he had had forwarded to him seven petitions of the same tenor, containing the signatures of more than one thousand citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of a law or laws for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Although it was not likely, at this late period of the session, and at a time when the attention of the National Legislature is engaged on subjects of primary and paramount importance, that any action could be expected during its present session, in reference to the subject matter of the petitions he held in his hand—yet every philanthropist might justly cherish the hope that the time was not remote when the Congress of the United States would deem it not unworthy of their serious consideration to devise some practical scheme for the gradual abolition of slavery, and its worse concomitant, the slave trade, in this District.

When we reflect, sir, for a moment, (said Mr. H.) on the gross inconsistency of the theory and practice of our Government, and look to the sentiment contained in that sacred instrument, the Declaration of our Independence, that all men are born free and independent, "with certain inalienable rights, amongst which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;" and see that, in practice, there exists the most abject slavery in this boasted land of liberty, and that, too, at the very portals of your hall of legislation, and in these "ten miles square," over which exclusive legislation has been confided to Congress—an anomaly such as this may be unhesitatingly pronounced unprecedented in any country, at the present or any other period of time.

We all know, said Mr. H., how the evils of slavery were entailed upon our country; that it is not a matter of censure, but of regret; and how delicate a subject it is to touch, or to legislate upon. And he would be among the last of those whose misguided zeal might desire Congress to interfere in any manner with this species of property within any of the States of this Union.

But whatever others might think with regard to the propriety of petitions coming from any other source than from the people of this District on a subject in which they alone may be supposed to be interested, he had no hesitation in saying that amongst the names attached to these petitions, there are those of men inferior to none in estimating the sacred rights of private property, and in a discriminating knowledge of legitimate subjects to be brought here for the consideration of this honorable body. And he would add that, in his humble belief, in common with theirs, the fair fame and character of the whole nation is deeply involved in the continuance of slavery and the slave trade in this District; and that the subject merited, and he trusted it would receive, the deliberate attention and consideration of this body, at no very remote period. He moved their reference, without reading, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On this motion, Mr. MASON, of Va., demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MASON observed, that this memorial came from persons not interested personally in the question of negro slavery; and the language of the memorial, and the remarks with which its presentation had been accompanied, referred to the existence of slavery very generally; and though the gentleman from Pennsylvania disclaimed any wish that Congress should abolish it in the States, yet this was but the commencement of a series of measures which tended to that result. It would be time enough for Congress to act respecting the District of Columbia when the people of the District should themselves request it.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, moved to lay the memorial upon the table.

Mr. DENNY observed that many similar memorials had already gone to the same committee.

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, was as much opposed to all impertinent interference by States not interested in slave property with the tenure of that property in the slave-holding States as his colleague could be; but the people of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, and all the Northern States, were as much concerned in all matters relating to the District of Columbia as those of the Southern States, and therefore the petition was perfectly regular, and such as the petitioners had a right to prefer, and should therefore be treated as other petitions were.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the question would be taken, if the gentleman from Virginia should not, on reflection, conclude to withdraw his call for the yeas and nays. If he would withdraw it, he would confer a benefit upon the House and the country, by preventing a very unpleasant debate. Mr. A. had last session presented fifteen memorials of a similar tenor with this one; they had all gone to the Committee on the District. A short report had soon followed, and then the subject was heard of no more during the session. Mr. A., though not in favor of the sentiments expressed in the memorial, was opposed to laying it on the table, as being disrespectful to the petitioners. The right of petitioning was guaranteed by the constitution, and nothing but very extraordinary circumstances should induce the House to treat a petition with disrespect.

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, renewed the motion to lay the memorial on the table. On this motion Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays. They were taken, and resulted: Yeas 75, nays 98. So the House refused to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. MASON then withdrew his opposition, and the memorial was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Reduction of the Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the Chair and resumed the consideration of the Tariff Bill.

Mr. LEAVITT, of Ohio, said: I am free to express it, as the strong conviction of my mind, that the gentlemen from the South, and their free trade friends from the North, ought not to have brought this subject before Congress at this session. I make this declaration, wholly uninfluenced by any feelings of prejudice or hostility towards the South. It is, I fear, but too true, that this feeling does exist, to no inconsiderable extent, between the Eastern and Southern portion of our country—but, for myself, I protest that I have none of it. I had lived, almost from the period of my infancy, in the Western country, and possess, I hope, some portion of that liberality of feeling, which so honorably distinguishes the great mass of the population of that prosperous and flourishing section of our Union. Occupying this position, I am constrained to say, that in my opinion the South ought not to have asked that the subject of the tariff should be agitated at this session. I am not unadvised of the state of feeling which exists in that section, in regard to the protective policy; nor have I been an uninterested spectator of what has been passing there. The voice of complaint and of discontent, which has come to us from that quarter, has not been unheard by me. I have been disposed to give it a respectful audience, and to pay it a respectful attention, without inquiring too astutely, whether the grievances complained of were fancied or real. In this spirit, I approached the consideration of the modification of the tariff, at the last session, and gave my vote for the bill which then passed. I voted for it, as a measure conciliatory in its character, and as making no inconsiderable concessions to the South. And, may we not justly infer, from the strong vote it received from gentlemen representing the South, that they too considered it in this light? The provisions of that act, in contrast with those of the act of 1828, are highly favorable to the South. It is estimated, that the operation of the act of last session, will result in an aggregate reduction of the duties on imports, to the amount of nearly eight millions per annum. And, among the articles upon which, by that act, the greatest reductions are made, is the cloth of which negro clothing is made, and negro blankets. These are permitted to come in under a mere nominal duty—a duty of five per cent. Sir, will gentlemen contend that this is no boon to the South, no mitigation of what they are pleased to call the oppressions of the tariff? I well remember with what feelings of high gratification the passage of the act of the last session was received, not only by myself, but by gentlemen opposed to the protective policy, and representing anti-tariff States. I rejoiced upon that occasion, because I had, as I thought, the best reason to believe, that while that act would afford competent protection to the manufacturing interests, it would allay the discontents, and quiet the excitement in the South, and restore once more the disturbed harmony of the country. That act passed both Houses of Congress by an almost unprecedented majority; and, as it regards the vote in this House, one strong item of testimony in favor of the justness and fitness of the arrangement of duties which it provided, is to be found in the fact, that the negative votes upon its final passage, are made up of gentlemen who belong to the extremes of the two parties on the tariff question; of those who may be called the highest toned friends of the tariff, and of those who, both upon the grounds of the constitutionality and expediency, are its unyielding and uncompromising enemies. But, again, sir, it should be borne in mind, that this subject of modifying the tariff was then laboriously examined, and amply debated in this House and also in the Senate. It occupied the almost undivided attention of Congress for many weeks—and, every gentleman here can bear witness of the arduousness of the duties of this House during that period. None will have forgotten how, day after day and week after week, we were doomed to encounter the noxious, I was going to say pestilential atmosphere of this Hall, when within it; and without, the burning rays of an almost midsummer sun. But the bill did pass, and became the law of the land, though made to take effect on the 2d of March next, a day to which we have not yet been brought in the revolution of time.

Reduction of the Tariff—Mr. Verplanck's Bill.

Sir, it is under these circumstances that we are again called upon to act on the subject. The law of last session making very material changes in the tariff law, sanctioned and passed by the very members who are now present, has not yet gone into operation. And we are now called upon to pass another act, making further and still greater alterations in our system of laying duties on imports. In view of all these facts and considerations, am I not fully justified in the assertion that Congress should not have been called upon for its action on this subject, at this session? Is it not due to the people, is it not due to the character and standing of the Congress of the United States, that the act of July, 1832, should be permitted to take effect, to the end that we may have a practical illustration of its bearing and operation, not only upon the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the nation, but upon its revenue?

The argument in favor of an immediate reduction of the tariff, predicated upon the supposition that the bill of last session is to give us a redundant treasury, is not, to my mind, conclusive or satisfactory. Is there, then, any other fact or consideration, which calls upon this Congress, at this session, to adopt the anomalous course of reviewing and repealing a law which was enacted by it, after great deliberation, so late as the month of July last, and which has not yet taken effect? I am aware that the State of South Carolina, acting in her sovereign capacity, "has adopted measures to nullify not only the act of last July, but all other laws for the imposition and collection of duties." I am aware, too, that she threatens to put her nullifying machinery into operation, with all the "pomp and circumstance of war." But certainly no gentleman is prepared to admit that this sort of military demonstration, this "peaceable" process of nullification, ought to induce Congress to pursue a course in relation to the tariff, different from what they would have done under other circumstances. If the tariff is now reduced, in pursuance of what may justly be called the dictation of South Carolina, will it not be to sanction the legitimacy and efficacy of the course she has adopted, and to make nullification triumphant? Sir, it was but a few days since, that, at a public meeting in South Carolina, it was openly avowed by a prominent orator and leader in the ranks of the nullifiers, that the bold stand which that State had taken against the tariff had caused Congress to pass the act of last session, and had been the means of inducing the Secretary of the Treasury to recommend a further reduction of six or eight millions. And what, sir, would be the language of the orator, if we were to pass the bill now before us? Would it not be ascribed to the fear of nullification; and would not the people reproach us with having pursued an extraordinary course of action in our legislation on the tariff, under the influence of this fear?

But we are told that, leaving South Carolina wholly out of view, justice to the other Southern States which do not sanction the course of that State, demands at our hands the immediate adoption of the measure under consideration. Sir, I cannot admit the legitimacy of this conclusion. Let gentlemen from the South view this subject candidly and dispassionately, and I think they will concede, that, in pressing the passage of this bill at this time, they are asking more than strict justice will warrant. Let them bear in mind what they have already achieved, in their efforts to modify and mitigate the protective policy, and what has already been yielded to them by its friends and advocates. Let them reflect that the prosecution of an extensive system of internal improvement by the General Government is no longer considered a part of its settled policy, and is not likely hereafter to afford a pretext for drawing money from the pockets of the people, to be expended for those purposes. Let them, moreover, bear in mind what they have gained by the passage of the tariff act of last July: and lastly, let them remember, that gentlemen on this floor, of all parties, and from all quarters of the Union, have united in avowing the opinion, that the revenue of the country ought not to exceed the wants of the Government, administered upon just and economical principles. It seems to me the South ought to be well satisfied with this state of things, and has no right either to ask or expect of the Northern, Middle, and Western States, a total sacrifice of their vital interests. Sir, I believe there is no such irreconcilable diversity of interests between the different sections of this Union, as that they cannot all exist and be prosperous under the same system of legislation. If the subject of adjustment of the tariff shall be approached at the proper time, and in the proper spirit—in the spirit of compromise and conciliation—I doubt not but it may be settled upon a permanent basis, in such a manner as that, while the great agricultural and manufacturing interests of the nation shall be adequately sustained, the South shall have no cause or pretext for complaint.

Mr. ADAMS said that he had some days since given notice of his determination, after the friends of the bill should have had an opportunity of rendering it as perfect as they could, to move to strike out the enacting clause; he would now fulfil his purpose, and would move that the enacting clause of the bill now before the committee be stricken out.

He would offer a few words in support of the motion. The merits of the bill, as well as its demerits, had been very fully argued, and he would not repeat what had been so well said by others. It was his opinion that neither this bill, nor any other at all resembling it, should pass at the present session of Congress. There was one idea which he had not heard suggested by any gentleman, and which was a decisive reason with him why the bill ought not to become a law. The bill would not, as it seemed to be calculated by many, reduce the amount of the revenue, but on the contrary, greatly increase it. To reduce the revenue was the professed object of the bill. The reasons for passing it had been assigned, first by the President in his message to Congress, then by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, and lastly by the Committee of Ways and Means. But the President himself had recommended the measure conditionally only; if it should be found upon examination that the existing protection on certain commodities manufactured in the country was excessive, that is, that it was greater than the good of the country required, that then a bill should be passed to reduce it. Had such an inquiry been instituted? It had not. No inquiry had taken place, and the House was consequently in possession of no evidence to show that the present protection was excessive. If the House then should pass this bill, which went so materially to affect great and widespread interests of the country, without any previous inquiry, it would not be following the recommendation of the President, but the contrary. Mr. A. did not say that if such an inquiry should be made, and it should then appear that the protection was too great, that he should oppose a bill to reduce it; but the investigation was an indispensable preliminary, and the fact must first be established.

There was another reason why Mr. A. should vote against the bill. From a certain quarter of the Union Congress had a most solemn declaration, made in the name of one of the States of the Union, and addressed to all the other States, that the protective system should no longer be carried into effect within that State. In the address from the convention of South Carolina to the people of the twenty-three other States of this Union, communicated by the President, with his recent message to Congress, are the following passages. The convention, speaking in the name of the people of South Carolina, say:

"We have, therefore, deliberately and unalterably resolved, that we will no longer submit to a system of oppression which reduces us to the degrading condition of tributary vassals; and which would reduce our posterity, in a few generations, to a state of poverty and wretchedness that would stand in melancholy contrast with the beautiful and delightful region in which the providence of God has cast our destinies. Having formed this resolution, with a full view of all its bearings, and of all its probable and possible issues, it is due to the gravity of the subject, and the solemnity of the occasion, that we should speak to our confederate brethren in the plain language of frankness and truth. Though we plant ourselves upon the constitution, and the immutable principles of justice and interest to operate exclusively through the civil tribunals and civil functionaries of the State, yet we will throw off this oppression at every hazard. We believe the Federal Government has no shadow of right or authority to act against a State of the Confederacy in any form, much less to coerce it by military power. But we are aware of the diversities of human opinion, and have seen too many proofs of the infatuation of human power, not to have looked with the most anxious concern to the possibility of a resort to military or naval force on the part of the Federal Government; and in order to obviate the possibility of having the history of this contest stained by a single drop of fraternal blood, we have solemnly and irrevocably resolved that we will regard such a resort as the dissolution of the political ties which connect us with our confederate States; and will, forthwith, provide for the organization of a new and separate Government."

And again, and in another passage, the convention still more pointedly say:

"We will not, we cannot, we dare not submit to this degradation, and our resolve is fixed and unalterable that a protecting tariff shall be no longer enforced within the limits of South Carolina. We stand upon the principles of everlasting justice, and no human power shall drive us from our position."

Now, with respect to the peaceful nature of this remedy, he never heard it spoken of but it reminded him of the first adventure of Gil Blas. Gil Blas had been furnished by his uncle with a sorry mule, and thirty or forty pistoles, and sent forth to seek his fortune in the world. He sat out accordingly, but had not proceeded far from home, when, as he was sitting on his beast counting his pistoles with much satisfaction into his hat, the mule suddenly raised her head, and pricked up her ears. Gil Blas looked round to see the cause of her alarm, and perceived an old hat upon the ground in the middle of the road, with a rosary of very large beads in it. This was the object which had startled his mule. At the same time he heard a voice addressing him in a very pathetic tone—"Good traveller! in the name of the merciful God, and of all the saints, do drop a few pieces of silver into the hat." Looking in the direction from which these sounds proceeded, he saw, to his great dismay, the muzzle of a blunderbuss projecting through the hedge, and pointing directly at his head. As he moved, this threatening muzzle moved also, still directed at his head. On looking more closely into the hedge, he perceived that it was supported on two cross sticks and aimed by a figure having the air of an old soldier. Gil Blas, not much pleased with the looks of this very pious mendicant, hastily dropped some pieces into the hat, and clapping his heels into the sides of his mule, rode off with all the speed he could from this peaceful solicitor of alms. This presented to Mr. A.'s mind one of the most perfect emblems of the pacific remedy of nullification he had ever seen.

But if it was indeed true that nullification was intended as a pacific remedy, Mr. A. had this consolation, that the execution of the laws was also a pacific operation, and would continue to be such, as long as the resistance to it was pacific; so long as nullification was pacific, the resistance to nullification would prove to be pacific too, and so there could be no danger that force would be used at all. This was one reason why Mr. A. should vote against the bill. Gentlemen supposed that if it should not pass, there would be great danger of bloodshed; but there could not be the least danger of this, provided those who adopted the principles of nullification acted according to their professions and promises. It was not their purpose to resort to force; and as there would then be no need of force to execute the laws, there would be no force in the matter, and, of course, no bloodshed. It was supposed that this very peaceable and friendly question might be settled without the intervention of force. Mr. A. wished it might; but he considered it of such a nature that the question ought to be settled. It ought to be known whether there were any measures by which a State could defeat the laws of the Union. For if there were, and the laws might be set aside at pleasure, we must seek for some other form of government to live under.

Mr. A. had heard this Union called a confederacy of States: and such was the idea put forth in the South Carolina address. It did not address the people of the United States; it recognized no such people. The constitution, according to that doctrine, was the work, not of the people, but of their attorneys. It was said that the act was the act of the States, and that this was a union of States. That was, in one sense, true. It was a union of the people and also a union of States. The convention of 1787 was the result of an act of the representatives of States; but, as it came from their hands, the instrument was nothing; it had no more force or value than a blank indenture, not sealed. It might as well be maintained that the attorney who drew an indenture was one of the parties to it, because he drew it. It was true that the States were also parties to it, because they had always been separate communities, and, after the establishment of the national independence, were still to continue so. That was the reason why the votes of the people were taken in separate masses, and not in one. It was more convenient; but it was not the State who gave force to the constitution. The convention sent the instrument to Congress, and asked them to submit it to the State Legislatures; but did the State Legislatures act upon it? No. And why? Because they could never use the language, "We the people." They were not the parties to it; they could not give it their sanction; they did not pretend to act upon it; they called conventions of the people to decide on the single question, and the people adopted the constitution, commencing with the words, "We the people." It had been the act of the people collected in separate communities, but forming one people, whose sanction alone gave to the constitution all its power. Even had the States, as States, unanimously ratified it, it would have been a dead letter until the people had acted upon it.

In fact, it was in this very point that the difference lay between this instrument and the confederation. The nullifiers would have them to be one and the same. The confederation has been created by the State Legislatures and by Congress. They went on the principle that this was not a Government, but a confederacy. Therefore it was first made by the State Legislatures, and afterwards by Congress. The people had never acted upon it at all; they had no part or lot in making it; and it was because such an instrument was found, in practice, to be wholly inefficient, and that it would be impossible for the people of this Union to live happily or peaceably under it, that they went to work another way.

Here, however, Mr. A. said that he was wandering from the subject before the committee.

The position he had assumed was, that the Government was bound to protect the great interests, all the great interests of the citizens. Wherever any great interest existed in the community, there the protection of Government must, of right, be extended. But protection might be extended in different forms to different interests. It was true that the interests of one portion of the community could often be protected only at the expense of some other portion of it. It was the complaint of the nullifiers that the Government took money out of the pockets of one portion of the Union to put it into the pockets of another. And in extending protection, this must always more or less be the case. But then, while the rights of one party were protected in this way, the rights of the other party were protected, equally, but in a different way. He would illustrate this position.

In the Southern and the South-western portions of this Union, there existed a certain interest, which he need not more particularly designate, which enjoyed under the constitution and the laws of the United States, an especial protection peculiar to itself. It was protected first by representation. There were on that floor upwards of twenty members who represented what in other States had no representation at all. Mr. A. believed that it was not three days since he heard it declared by a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. OLATON,) that the species of population he now alluded to constituted the "machinery of the South." Now, that machinery had twenty odd representatives in that hall; representatives elected, not by the machinery, but by those who owned it. Was there any such representation in any other portion of the Union? Did the manufacturers ask for any representation on their machinery? He believed their looms and factories had no vote in Congress; but the machinery of the South had more than twenty representatives on that floor. And if he should go back to the history of this Government from its foundation, it would be easy to prove that its decisions had been affected in general by majorities less than that.

Nay, he might go further, and insist that that very representation of which he had spoken, had ever been, in fact, the ruling power of this Government. Was this not protection? Was it not protection at the expense of another portion of the community? If it did not literally take money out of the pockets of some, and put it into the pockets of others, still it operated in precisely the same way. Yes; this very protection had taken millions and millions of money from the free laboring population of this country, and put it into the pockets of the owners of Southern machinery. Mr. A. did not complain of this. He did not say that it was not all right. What he said was, that the South possessed a great protected interest—an interest protected by that instrument—[Mr. A. held the constitution in his hand.] He was for adhering to the bargain, because it was a bargain. Not that he would agree to it if the bargain were now to be made over again.

But there was another great interest protected under the constitution. He referred to the interest of commerce and navigation. The country had a navy, which was now costing it two or three millions of dollars a year. Of what value was this to the manufacturer, or to the wool grower, if they should reason on the narrow and contracted principle, that their personal interest was the only interest in the community for which they ought to care? On such principles, the navy was nothing to them. It might achieve as many, and as glorious victories as ever had been won by the wooden walls of the fast-anchored isle: the manufacturer was not a cent the richer for them. But he was obliged to pay to support the navy, and to pay six or seven millions, including navy and army.

The House could not pass any bill that would not, of necessity, confirm the ordinance of South Carolina. No law upon this subject could, at this time, be enacted by Congress, but would be received and understood by all parties, friend and foe, to be the triumph of nullification. The State of South Carolina had said that the tariff law was null and void; and that it should not be executed within her limits. And Congress immediately replies, by declaring that that law should not be executed anywhere. Mr. A. admitted that such a proceeding might, for a moment, remove the question of nullification. But it would be for a moment only. Let Congress permit one State to declare that its laws should not be executed, and submit to have that declaration carried into effect, and they would soon have States enough tell them that the laws should not be executed within their limits. And, without intending any reflection on South Carolina, he might observe, that there were States in this Union, who, if they should say the same thing that South Carolina had said, might make it a much more serious question. And the House might take his word that they would have such language addressed to them.

Mr. A. was against the passage of any thing.

He wished to see the question settled. South Carolina had made up an issue; she said she wished it settled peaceably. Mr. A. was for meeting her, and settling the question she had made. This Union was now tottering. It was tottering to its foundation on the question whether a single State possessed the power to annul laws enacted by the whole Union. He averred that this was a question on which the continuance of the Union depended. It was a question that must be settled, and this was the time to settle it. There was no time in which it could be so fitly and so advantageously settled, as at this time, because those who raised the question declared their desire to be, that it should be settled peaceably. Mr. A. wished that it might be settled peaceably. He believed that it would be, because he believed that the nullifiers would not strike the first blow; and that the Government would be too wise and too cautious to do it; and if neither party struck the first blow, it must be settled peaceably. Either the laws would be executed, or the tariff annulled, and the protecting system destroyed. If that system should be destroyed, he would not say in what form the question would come up, as a question far more serious than was now made, and to be settled in reference to a different interest. At present the interests of the South were protected, and superabundantly protected, by the provisions of the constitution. Let that protection be destroyed, and they would find their security put in question in a manner not so easily gotten rid of. The notion held out in favor of the bill was, that it was to allay discontents. And the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had delivered a very pathetic and very eloquent eulogium upon fear. Mr. A. had listened to it with great delight; but as he knew that gentleman to be an accomplished classic scholar, he would venture to remind him that there were other virtues besides fear, suitable for the exercise of a patriot and a statesman, on which as just and eloquent eulogiums might be pronounced. Among these was the virtue of fortitude—a virtue, which he was under a solemn conviction that every member of this House, and every intelligent citizen of this community, would at no distant day be called upon to exercise; in commendation of which he would refer the gentleman to a classic authority, which no one better understood, or was more qualified to appreciate. He alluded to the sentiment so eloquently expressed by the great Roman poet:

*Iustum et tenacem propositi virum
Non cietum ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instantis Tyranni, Mente quatit solida.*

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

Bank of the United States—Sale of Stocks.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bill:

FEBRUARY, 1833.] Bank of the United States—Sale of Stocks—Presidential Election.

[H. OF R.]

AN ACT authorizing the sale of the Bank Stock of the United States.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell the shares owned by the United States in the Bank of the United States, on such terms as he may deem most for the interest of the United States: Provided, That no stock be sold for less than the market value thereof, or for less than the par value.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Bank of the United States to purchase said stock, or any part thereof, any thing in any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill having been read, and the question of course being on ordering it to a second reading,

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, objected, (which at this stage is equivalent to a motion for rejection;) and the question being then stated in the form required by the rule, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he was impelled, by a sense of his duty to his constituents and to his country, to do, in this case, what he had never done since he had had a seat on this floor—to move the rejection of a bill at its first reading. There are cases, said Mr. W., in which courtesy should yield to the demands of justice and public duty; and this, in my humble judgment, is one of them. I do believe that the passage of this bill is not demanded by any public consideration. It is fraught with incalculable ruin to all private interest, except the interest of the stockjobbers of Wall street. I will say nothing of the interest which political stockjobbers may feel in the measure now before you. This measure will inflict injury, perhaps ruin, upon many of your honest, and I might say, in reference to the interest which they have in this institution, unprotected citizens. Its immediate effect would be to reduce thirty-five millions of the stock of the country, performing, in a great measure, the functions of a circulating medium in our commercial exchanges, ten per centum in its value. Possibly I may over-estimate the loss; but I think not. This time last year this stock commanded, in the markets of the world, from twenty to twenty-five per centum advance. The ruinous policy which the administration of the country has pursued towards this institution has sunk the value of this capital twenty per cent., equal to seven millions. The United States has sustained a loss in the value of the stock held by the Government, equal to one million four hundred thousand dollars, and yet the Committee of Ways and Means propose a measure by which the Government will inevitably sustain a further loss of more than one million. For what reason? And why is this mad policy, sir, I might be allowed to say this wicked measure, proposed? I have heard none, nor can I discover any, save that the President of the United States has recommended it.

Is it wise to sell, at a sacrifice, stock yielding an interest of six per centum to the Government, that money may lie idle in the treasury? Is not our treasury, at this time, said to be overflowing? Has not the administration told us that the present tariff will yield us at least six millions of money more than is needed for all the wants of the Government?

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, demanded the previous question; which motion being seconded, the previous question was ordered: Yeas 94, nays 90.

The main question was then put in the following form: "Shall this bill be rejected?" and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Allison, Arnold, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, N. Barber, Barringer, Barstow, Isaac C. So the bill was rejected.

Presidential Election—Counting the Votes.

The hour of one having arrived, the Senate attended in the hall of the House of Representatives—the President of the Senate taking the chair of the House—and in the presence of the two Houses proceeded to open the votes of the Electors in the several States for President and Vice President of the United States. Messrs. GRUNDY, of the Senate, and DRAYTON and HUBBARD, of the House of Representatives, acted as a committee to read and enumerate the votes; and the whole having been gone through, the result was ascertained to be as follows:

Whereupon, the President of the Senate proclaimed that ANDREW JACKSON, of Tennessee, having a majority of the whole number of votes, was elected President of the United States for four years, from the 4th day of March next; and that MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, having a majority of votes therefor, was elected Vice President of the United States for the same term.

The Senate then withdrew, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 23.

Death of the Representative, James Lunt, Jr., Esq.

Mr. HOFFMAN rose, and announced to the House the decease of JAMES LUNT, Jr., a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York. After some appropriate remarks, Mr. H. submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of JAMES LUNT, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of New York, by wearing crape on the left arm for the remainder of the present session of Congress.

2. Resolved, That this House will attend the funeral of the late JAMES LUNT to-morrow, at eleven o'clock, A. M., and that a committee be appointed to take order for, and to superintend, the said funeral.

3. Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate, to notify that body of the death of JAMES LUNT, late a member of this House, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, February 25.

Message from the President.

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1833.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the House, a letter from General Lafayette to the Secretary of State, with the petition which came enclosed in it of the Countess d'Ambugeac and Madame de la Goree, grand-daughters of Marshal Count Rochambeau, and original documents in support thereof, praying compensation for services rendered by the Count to the United States during the revolutionary war; together with translations of the same. And I transmit, with the same view, the petition of Messrs. de Fontenille de Jeumont and de Rosignol Grandmont, praying compensation for services rendered by them to the United States in the French army, and during the same war, with original papers in support thereof; all received through the same channel, together with translations of the same.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Message, with the petitions and papers, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

The House arrived at the Senate's bill further to enforce the collection of the revenue.

Mr. CARSON moved to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He made this motion, because he thought that on a question of so much importance the fullest and freest discussion ought to be allowed. The present measure was of a similar character to one already reported upon by the Judiciary Committee of that House, and which had been consigned to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; consistency, therefore, demanded that the bill before them should be referred to the same committee. If it went at once to the House, the previous question might be called, and all deliberation cut off. Mr. C. concluded by deprecating the present bill as of a more despotic character than the alien and sedition law.

FEBRUARY, 1853.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WAYNE wished it to be understood, that when gentlemen designated the bill as one which was calculated to dissolve the Union, as a bloody bill, and so on, they misrepresented it grossly. He had hoped that something would have been done to compose the country; and probably his hopes would have been verified, if the action of the House had not been delayed by the death of a member. Why, he asked, should that important measure be now set aside, and another substituted? But it seemed as if it was not intended that the tariff bill should pass. The time had now arrived when men ought to act together for one common object—to have the tariff reduced, and the country pacified. He knew such a disposition to exist on the part of a sufficient number of members, although others would not suffer the bill to pass.

Mr. WARREN R. DAVIS said the House would do him the justice, and those with whom he acted, to own that they were in no way responsible for the snail-pace of the tariff bill; they had not impeded it by the frivolous amendments alluded to, or by propositions of any sort. They acquiesced in and followed the suggestions of friends on this floor, and remained silent on this deeply interesting subject, lest to their participation in the debate should be attributed whatever of a dilatory or stormy character it might assume. You have all witnessed, he said, that we submitted in silence to the reading and discussion of public documents, containing false, malicious, and defamatory libels on the State and people of South Carolina; to language of contumely and reproach upon our public functionaries, (friends whom we dearly love,) that shot like fiery arrows through our veins. Yet we were dumb. Still more, sir, the bitter cup was not yet full—it might not even thus pass. We felt it our duty to let the sacrifice be complete. We remained in our places, we kept our seats, and bore the torture. You all knew, from the beginning of the session, that such would be our course; yet we were baited at the start. What friendly voice of truth or justice was heard in our vindication during those hours, days, weeks, of burning agony? What did we hear from those who ought to have defended us? Why, that South Carolina was precipitate! After ten years of petition, prayer, and suffering; after witnessing all our Southern sister States taken up last summer with the presidential election, as if the shirt of Nessus were not upon their backs. Precipitate! away with such stuff and nonsense. And what, sir, do we now see? The tariff question, that has been creeping, loitering, drivelling, dragging itself through six weeks of the session; the very bill we were desirous to abstain from discussing, lest we might shake too rudely the leaves of its olive branch—a bill entitled, by all parliamentary right and usage, to precedence, is to be shoved aside, and this firebrand to be flung before it. Why? Because, forsooth, the President wills it! And by whom is the attempt made to substitute this sword in the place of the olive branch? By the organs and fast friends of the President on this floor. Can I be mistaken? That I may not be, I desire now to ask of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee (if he be in the House), I do not see him in his seat—[Here Mr. BELL rose from a different part of the House,] to ask, and the terms of former kindness between us entitle me to a candid answer, whether it is the intention of the party with which he acts, to give precedence and preference to the bill for collecting revenue.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, would answer the question in the same spirit of candor in which it was asked: it was desired to have this measure passed as soon as practicable, and, for that purpose, to give it precedence. He exonerated the delegation of South Carolina from all responsibility for the delay of the tariff bill, and approved their course on the occasion.

Then, said Mr. DAVIS, we understand it now. The President is impatient to wreak his vengeance on South Carolina. Be it so. Pass your measure, sir; unchain your tiger; let loose your war dogs as soon as you please. I know the people you desire to war on. They await you with unflinching, unshrinking, unblanching firmness. I know full well the State you strike at. She is deeply enshrined in as warm affections, brave hearts, and high minds, as ever formed a living rampart for public liberty. They will receive this bill, sir, whether you pass the other or not, with scorn and indignation, and detestation. They never will submit to it. They will see in it the iron crown of Charlemagne placed upon the head of your Executive; they will see in it the scene upon the Lupercal, vamped up and newly varnished; they will see in its hideous features of pains and penalties a declaration of war in all but its form; they cannot (for they are the best informed people on the face of the earth, or that ever have been on it, on the great principles of civil and political liberty) but see in it the utter prostration and demolition of State rights, State constitutions, ay, and of the federal constitution too. But, say gentlemen, and I am surprised at their blindness and hardihood, it is all a mistake; it is a mere bill for collecting the revenue—intended for the preservation of peace, and to prevent civil war. Civil war with whom? Sir, all usurpations are attempted on such mild, lovely, and benevolent pretexts as these. Peace, is it? Shame, Shame! You pour fire and brimstone on our heads, and bid us, in the language of a departed friend, "Be quiet; it is Macassar oil—myrrh—frankincense!" You tell us, with this bill of pains and penalties, of army, and navy, and militia in your fist, that it is a mere matter of revenue collection; a very quiet, peaceable affair. You collect taxes at the point of the bayonet, and call it civil process!

I have intimated, and I repeat, that I will not oppose the taking up this bill by any indirect means; I am ready to meet and expose its deformity; I only ask that you will not gag us with your previous question. Vouchsafe me that, you may go your ways; but that you can apply the gag, is but too manifest, since the cordial junction pro tanto of two hostile parties; the one opposed to the President, and who declares that he is not worthy of his office, or of the trust and confidence of the country; and another that seems willing to grant him any thing he asks.

I heard a gentleman somewhere near me say that the whole question is one of dollars and cents. To be sure, it is the very gist and marrow of it; if it were not that there were such things as Southern dollars and cents, we would never have heard the question made; the nefarious system would never have grown up. All governmental oppressions, exactions, and tyranny throughout the world, and through all time, have been perpetrated for the dollars and the cents of honest people, earned by the sweat of their brow, for the purpose of giving them to the powerful or roguish, who did not earn them. If, however, it is meant to say that South Carolina makes a question of the mere amount, the more or less, to be contributed for the support of the Government, the short answer is, it is not true. What does her bright and glorious history tell you? To coin her heart for money; to drop her blood for drachms! Her objection is to your taking her dollars and cents, not for the support of the Government she jointly made with her sister States, but for the purpose of putting them in your pockets, or of the people or States you represent. The amount, even then, she might have borne as a temporary injustice, had you not declared it a perpetuity. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. WAYNE) has informed us that this bill will be harmless, as a tariff project, not yet submitted, will certainly be adopted, that is better than either yet proposed. I am delighted to hear it; but why, in the name of liberty, is it not offered to us instead of this outrage on the constitution? Why arm the President with powers so dangerous to peace and freedom; and in the face of a recorded refusal by your predecessors to give the pacific civilian, the mild, virtuous, humane Jefferson, the much lesser power of suspending the habeas corpus act? Is this thing so coveted by, and gratifying to the President? Is this bloody bill, this Boston port bill, so delightful to him that it is to be preferred to that which is said to be pacificatory? Why, sir, if he must be gratified—must be amused and pleasurably employed, buy him a tee-to-tum, or some other harmless toy, but do not give him the purse and sword of the nation, the army and navy, and whole military power of the country, as peaceful playthings to be used at his discretion. If, however, this bill must pass; if there be no substitute so palatable as blood, I withdraw my opposition to its being taken up, and only ask the privilege of exposing its details; although

I clearly see that the interested passions on one side, and a supple subserviency on another, will ensure its passage by a very large majority. In what I have said, no individual allusion was pretended: I fired at the flock. My allusion was to a state of things as notorious as noon-day. Our situation is peculiar, and some allowances should be made. Our representatives on this floor are small in number. Our people love honor as they do liberty: both have been assailed. We value highly the opinion of the wise and good; many, very many of whom we recognize in the ranks of our adversaries. It is when they show a disbelief or suspicion of the integrity of our purposes, or purity of our motives, that we feel the iron enter our hearts.

One word, sir, to the gentleman over the way—entirely over the way—who says this bill is necessary, because South Carolina has not yet repealed her ordinance. "Has not yet," I presume, means, notwithstanding the President's proclamation. Sir, South Carolina has received the insolent mandate of the President commanding her to retrace her steps, tear from her archives one of the brightest pages of her glory, and alter the fundamental principles of her constitution; and she sends him back for answer (through her humble representatives) the message sent from Utica to Caesar—

"Bid him disband his legions;
Restore the commonwealth to liberty;
Submit his actions to the public censure,
Abide the judgment of a Roman Senate,
And strive to gain the pardon of the people."

That, sir, is her answer.

Introduction of the Senate Compromise Tariff bill into the House: motion to make it a House measure by striking out the whole of Mr. Verplanck's bill, Tariff bill, and inserting the whole of the Senate bill as an amendment.

Mr. LETCHER moved to strike out all the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert another bill in lieu thereof, [the bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. CLAY.]

This being objected to,

Mr. LETCHER moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to report his bill to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. ARNOLD, and Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, rose together to ask for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the motion was agreed to: Yeas 96, nays 54.

The question being stated on engrossing the new bill,

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of hasty legislation under any circumstances, but it is especially to be deprecated in matters of great importance. That this is a measure of great importance, affecting, more or less, the entire population of the United States, will not be denied, and ought, therefore, to be matured with care, and well understood by every gentleman who votes upon it. And yet, sir, a copy has, for the first time, been laid upon our tables, since I rose to address you; and this is the first opportunity

The Tariff—Compromise Bill.

we have had even to read it. I hope others feel well prepared to act in this precipitate manner; but I am obliged to acknowledge I do not; for I hold even the best of intentions will not, in legislation, excuse the errors of haste.

I am aware that this measure assumes an imposing attitude. It is called a bill of compromise; a measure of harmony, of conciliation; a measure to heal disaffection, and to save the Union. Sir, I am aware of the imposing effect of these bland titles; men love to be thought generous, noble, magnanimous; but they ought to be equally anxious to acquire the reputation of being just. While they are anxious to compose difficulties in one direction, I entreat them not to oppress and wrong the people in another. In their efforts to save the Union, I hope their zeal will not go so far as to create stronger and better founded discontents than those they compose. Peacemakers, mediators, men who allay excitement, and tranquillize public feeling, should, above all considerations, study to do it by means not offensive to the contending parties, by means which will not inflict a deeper wound than the one which is healed. Sir, what is demanded by those that threaten the integrity of the Union? An abandonment of the American system; a formal renunciation of the right to protect American industry. This is the language of the nullification convention; they declare they regard the abandonment of the principle as vastly more important than any other matter; they look to that, and not to an abatement of duties without it; and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. DAVIS,) with his usual frankness, told us this morning it was not a question of dollars and cents; the money they regarded not, but they required a change of policy. They demand the pound of flesh, with the unyielding obstinacy of Shylock, and they require this House to apply the knife nearest to the heart; and shall it be cut away? Is it patriotic? Is it harmonizing public feeling? Is it saving the Union to drain out the life-blood? What is this bill? I will not say it goes at once to such extremities, but it seems to me to contain a principle which works an unqualified abandonment of the protective policy, unless changes greater than we have a right to look for shall take place in our condition.

It proposes to descend, by a reduction, once in two years, of two-tenths of the excess of duties over and above twenty per cent. for nearly eight years. It then proposes to divide the residue of such excess, into two equal parts, and to remove the whole in two years, so that all duties on all imports will be run down to a level of twenty per cent. ad valorem, in between nine and ten years. The first part of the descent may be termed gradual; but in the last two years, the strides are, I fear, decidedly too long to be met by any preparation for them. Our course then is down hill during this time, wearing out the American system; and when we arrive at the foot, we pass out from under the protection of that parental benefactor, and place ourselves under the guardianship of the Carolina system. I say from the American to the Carolina system, because duties which are now below 20 per cent., are to be raised to that amount, and all free articles, with the exception of an unimportant list of dyestuffs, are to be subjected to duties. Duties are, therefore, at the end of our declivitous course, to fall on all imported merchandise at an equal rate of twenty per cent. This is the Carolina system.

What will be the effect of this bill? The protection will be diminished from year to year. This will check the operations of capital; it will, I fear, stop investments, if it does not crush that enterprising, valuable class of young men who have entered upon business, relying upon their industry and capacity to carry them forward. They are in debt, and I fear timid creditors may fall upon them. Business then will be brought to a stand at any rate, and, if bankruptcies ensue, will be diminished. This is precisely what some interested in manufacturing are selfish enough to desire, for they have money; wages will be cheaper, if a portion of the mills cease to run, and no new ones are erected, and the capitalists will, by this means, in the end, gain more by a diminution in the competition in business, and the reduction in wages, than they will lose by the reduction in duties. But, sir, this is a policy founded in such naked selfishness; it is built up so manifestly at the expense of those who have small capital, and of the laborers; it is so hostile to the first principles of protection which invite the free investment of capital from all quarters, that goods may be made cheap by the competition, and the public be thus benefited, that no friend of American labor can give it his approbation on that ground. It may answer for a time the purposes of a few, if it operates as they anticipate; but should this prove so, it will be an unanswerable argument with the public for disapproving of it, for the causes which will make the measure valuable to some, will make it injurious to the public.

Again, sir, I can vote for no bill which abandons protection. I think this does. It adopts the Carolina system for equalizing duties, by bringing them all to 20 per cent. It abandons the exercise of all right to discriminate, and in that, give me leave to say, abandons common sense, for the system of equalization has never, to my knowledge, until now, found an advocate among financiers or political economists. It is, however, a very cunningly-devised plan, and worthy of its origin, (Gallatin, in the free trade report,) for it contains a sweet poison that will destroy the last remnant of protection. Who ever heard of so absurd a system as equalizing duties? What, impose the same duties on ardent spirits as upon tea and coffee! But why do the free traders desire an equalization? Why do they insist that the duty on hats, on shoes and boots, on leather, on scythes, hoes and axes, shall be reduced to 20 per cent. ? Why do they at the same time insist that there shall be a duty of 20 per cent. on tea and coffee, pepper, spices, fruits, and a thousand other things which we do not, and never shall produce, and which are now free of duty ? It is to level all protection with the dust. They start with the proposition that the public debt is paid, that we have too much revenue, and it must be reduced. We have always contended, not that the revenue shall not be reduced, for we are not the advocates of an accumulating surplus, but that it shall be reduced by letting goods in free, or by diminishing the amount of duty when the whole cannot be spared, and that this principle shall be applied to merchandise not produced in this country, that our labor may have the benefit of the revenue as a protection. While we contend that the revenue shall be levied in this manner, the free traders insist that nothing shall be free, and that the duty on all shall be alike. The revenue, say they, is too abundant, and must be reduced. The bill before us, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, is for that purpose. What a happy mode of reducing the revenue, to diminish the duty on hats, shoes, boots, leather, axes, &c., from 30 per cent. and more, to 20 per cent., when the articles are so entirely produced here, under the present protection, that none are imported, and no revenue is realized. Is not the direct and obvious effect of such a reduction an experiment, to see if the foreign articles cannot be introduced, and the revenue increased instead of diminished ? It is a still more singular mode of reducing revenue to restore the duties on articles which are free. Sir, the farmers, the mechanics, the manufacturers, cannot be blind to such an insidious scheme. They will not fail to discover that the reductions of duty on a vast variety of articles produced wholly in this country are made under a false pretence of reducing the revenue ; and that the restoration of duties to free articles is also made under the delusive pretence of making taxes more equal. It will not escape their observation that this crafty plan of reducing revenue is apparently devised for the purpose of overstocking the treasury, and creating a surplus from year to year, so as to call for further and further reductions, till you come, as the politicians of South Carolina declare you shall, to twelve and a half per cent. Is it not plain that an equalization gives the least protection which industry can possibly have, unless you make the duties on articles which we do not produce, higher than you rate them on such as we do produce ? When you have arrived at twenty per cent., if there is a surplus, you have, I believe, the right to discriminate below that : but of what value is such a right ? Twenty per cent. ad valorem upon the foreign cost ; what is that ? Go to the officers of the custom-house in New York, who witness the daily frauds and impositions of importers. Go to the head of that establishment, who, it is said, declared openly in this city, it was a railroad for legalized smuggling, and inquire what a twenty per cent. ad valorem duty, or any other ad valorem duty, is. And if they tell you the truth, it will be, that it is whatever the importer chooses to have it.

This bill, after we have made our descent, facilis descensus Avernus, carries us into the free trade system, which may be summed up under three heads :

1. All specific duties are abolished, and all duties are to be ad valorem ; all free traders, and especially the Yorkshire men and Lancashire men of England, have always earnestly contended for this. For what reason, it is difficult to imagine, unless it is because frauds are perpetrated with greater facility.

2. All duties are to be equal, and to be assessed upon all imports, except a few articles of little importance, and consequently the discriminating principle is abandoned.

3. The gradual reduction which is professedly made to reduce revenue, is applied to all articles, as well those on which no revenue is raised, as those which produce revenue ; thus tending, by every reduction, to bring the American producer into greater peril at every step. If this be not a total, unqualified abandonment of the protective policy, unless twenty per cent. is protective, then I know not what is an abandonment. The bill, it is true, provides that after we come to the twenty per cent. ad valorem, the duty is to be assessed on the valuation in the home market. About the meaning of this, however, there is already a dispute. The South say it means the price of the goods by the duties and charges ; that is, it means the foreign cost ; and a distinguished gentleman declared in debate distinctly, that he supported the bill upon that exposition of its meaning. If this be a true interpretation, the provision is worth nothing. That valuation is to be regulated by law, according to the terms of the bill, and what that regulation will prove to be, no one can foresee.

Sir, I regret that discontent and signs of violence have manifested themselves in this country ; but I am not disposed to meet it with a faint heart, or to falter for a moment in support of the Union and constitution. I would face these disturbers of the public tranquillity on their own ground, and accede to the general proposition that the revenue shall be reduced to the demands of the Government ; but the amount of expenditure shall be fixed by Congress, and not by South Carolina ; and the revenue should be raised in such a manner as to give the most efficient protection to American labor. For one, sir, while I would do South Carolina justice, ample justice, I would not destroy the Union by attempting to save it. I would not bring the power of Congress and the constitution into contempt, by establishing a precedent, that a little knot of uneasy, discontented politicians can, by threatening to dissolve the Union, make the Government itself bow down, humble itself in the dust, abandon its policy, and promise in future to give no offence. If these are the terms on which the Union exists; if this Government holds and exercises its powers upon such contingencies as these, I was about to say, the sooner the Union is at an end the better, for the rude breath of treason will dissolve it at any moment. But, sir, whether South Carolina is well or ill pleased, whether she declares herself in or out of the Union, I am not prepared, on any compromise, to give up the protective policy; and I do contend that an equalization of duties as low, or lower, than twenty per cent. protection, is incompatible. Yes, when you surrender the right to discriminate, you surrender all.

The Tariff—Compromise Bill.

This is a bill to tranquillize feeling, to harmonize jarring opinions; it is oil poured into inflamed wounds; it is to definitively settle the matters of complaint. What assurance have we of that? Have those who threatened the Union accepted it? Has any one here risen in his place, and announced his satisfaction and his determination to abide by it? Not a word has been uttered, nor any sign or assurance of satisfaction given. Suppose they should vote for the bill; what then? They voted for the bill of July last, and that was a bill passed expressly to save the Union; but did they not flout at it? Did they not spurn it with contempt? And did not South Carolina, in derision of that compromise, nullify the law? This is a practical illustration of the exercise of a philanthropic spirit of condescension to save the Union. Your folly and your imbecility was treated as a jest. It has already been said that this law will be no more binding than any other, and may be altered and modified at pleasure by any subsequent Legislature. In what sense then is it a compromise? Does not a compromise imply an adjustment on terms of agreement? Suppose, then, that South Carolina should abide by the compromise while she supposes it beneficial to the tariff States and injurious to her; and when that period shall close, the friends of protection shall then propose to re-establish the system. What honorable man, who votes for this bill, could sustain such a measure? Would not South Carolina say, you have no right to change this law, it was founded on compromise; you have had the benefit of your side of the bargain, and now I demand mine. Who could answer such a declaration? If, under such circumstances, you were to proceed to abolish the law, would not South Carolina have much more just cause of complaint and disaffection than she now has?

It has been said, we ought to legislate now, because the next Congress will be hostile to the tariff. I am aware that such a sentiment has been industriously circulated, and we have been exhorted to escape from the hands of that body, as from a lion. But, sir, who knows the sentiments of that body on this question? Do you, or does any one, possess any information which justifies him in asserting that it is more unfriendly than this House? There is, in my opinion, little known about this matter. But suppose the members shall prove as ferocious towards the tariff as those who profess to know their opinions represent, will the passage of this bill stop their action? Can you tie their hands? Give what pledges you please, make what bargains you may, and that body will act its pleasure without respecting them. If you fall short of their wishes in warring upon the tariff, they will not stay their hand; but all attempts to limit their power by abiding compromises, will be considered by them as a stimulus to act upon the subject, that they may manifest their disapprobation. It seems to me, therefore, that if the next Congress is to be feared, we are pursuing the right course to arouse their jealousy, and excite them to action.

Mr. Speaker, I rose to express my views on this very important question, I regret to say, without the slightest preparation, as it is drawn before us at a very unexpected moment. But, as some things in this bill are at variance with the principles of public policy which I have uniformly maintained, I could not suffer it to pass into a law without stating such objections as have hastily occurred to me.

Let me, however, before sitting down, be understood on one point. I do not object to a reasonable adjustment of the controversies which exist. I have said repeatedly on this floor, that I would go for a gradual reduction on protected articles; but it must be very gradual, so that no violence shall be done to business; for all reduction is necessarily full of hazard. My objections to this bill are not so much against the first seven years, for I would take the consequences of that experiment, if the provisions beyond that were not of that fatal character which will at once stop all enterprise. But I do object to a compromise which destines the East for the altar. No victim, in my judgment, is required, none is necessary; and yet you propose to bind us, hand and foot, to pour out our blood upon the altar, and sacrifice us as a burnt-offering, to appease the unnatural and unfounded discontent of the South; a discontent, I fear, having deeper root than the tariff, and will continue when that is forgotten. I am far from meaning to use the language of menace, when I say such a compromise cannot endure, nor can any adjustment endure, which disregards the interests and sports with the rights of a large portion of the people of the United States. It has been said that we shall never reach the lowest point of reduction, before the country will become satisfied of the folly of the experiment, and will restore the protective policy; and it seems to me a large number in this body act under the influence of that opinion. But I cannot vote down my principles, on the ground that some one may come after me who will vote them up.

Mr. Speaker, I have done my duty, in an imperfect manner, I confess; but I perceive it is in vain to discuss the matter, and I will detain the House no longer.

Mr. H. EVERETT asked the attention of the House for a few minutes. He said he was unwilling that his dissent should be given by a mere silent vote. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. LETCHER) had said the House had had ample time to examine the bill, and he presumed the minds of the members were made up. It was true that the Senate bill had been laid on their tables some days ago: the amendments which had since been made in the Senate were adopted in the bill now before the House; these, he admitted, had improved the bill, but still had not rendered it satisfactory to him. For one, Mr. E. said, he did not complain of want of time; he had formed an opinion, and that opinion he now rose to express. He considered the bill, as originally reported in the Senate, as a total, an absolute abandonment of the protective system after 1842—at best, it was but a lease to the manufacturers for seven or eight years, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, a notice to wind up their concerns within that time: their destruction was slow, but sure. The existing protection was to go down, down, from year to year, until the end of the term, when the existing establishments were to be abandoned by the Government: he said the existing establishments, for new ones could not be expected. Prudent capitalists would not adventure in a sinking concern. About the same time was given that was allowed the bank to wind up; and were theirs a mere money business, they would have less reason to complain; but, unfortunately, their capital was fixed, and must be sacrificed. Factories and machinery were of no value unless in operation. The owners of flocks were not in a much less hopeless condition. He repeated that the bill, as originally laid on their tables, abandoned, totally abandoned, the protective policy. It reduced all duties to the same level, twenty per cent. Even the principle of discriminating duties was abandoned. In its present form, he admitted that principle was faintly perceptible. "Congress were not to be prevented from altering the rates of duties on articles which are now subject to a less duty than twenty per cent. in such manner as not to exceed that rate;" that is, they may raise or lower the rates of duties on the unprotected articles, but may not raise the duties on the protected articles above twenty per cent. This is the only discriminating principle now in the bill; and this, poor as it was, he should show was wholly illusory; that the wants of the Government would require the full duty of twenty per cent. on the unprotected articles. The change of the foreign for the home valuation, he admitted, was a valuable improvement, though its principal value must, in a very considerable degree, if not wholly, depend on the regulations which "may be hereafter established by law." The gentleman from Kentucky had echoed the cry of alarm which had been heard from another quarter, that the protective system was in danger; that the next Congress would prostrate it. Such alarms tended to create the peril they announced. That system, in his opinion, had no greater peril to encounter than the one of which St. Paul complained as the chief of perils. He was willing to trust it to the next Congress: they, he trusted, would protect the great interests of the country. This projet had come upon the manufacturers from an unexpected source: the blow had not been anticipated from that quarter. If there should be a majority in the next Congress against the protective policy, the manufacturers, the farmers would submit with what grace they may. If the system should then fall, it would fall under the superior force of the enemy. But, said Mr. E., the occasion had excited feeling—better, perhaps, suppressed than uttered. He had heard it said, out of the House, that we were only bending to the blast; that we should right when it had passed over us. But was such a forecast just? Should not they who present, and they who accept this bill as a measure of conciliation, do it in good faith, without mental reservations? For one, he did not join in the offer, nor would he pledge himself or his constituents to abide by it. He would ask the gentleman from Kentucky what would be the financial operation of the bill? What would be the amount of revenue accruing under it, particularly in 1841 and 1842—the period when it was to settle down as the revenue system of the Government! These were the periods to which the manufacturers would look (he would not say they had been encouraged to look) for the restoration of the protective system. Taking the excessive importations of 1831 as the basis of calculation, the amount of the proposed reduction of duties on the protected articles (paying over twenty per cent.) would be nearly twelve millions, ($11,924,000;) the whole amount of the customs, in 1841, would be between ten and eleven millions, ($10,846,000;) and after the final reduction in 1842, about seven millions, ($7,268,000.) How would the deficiency of revenue be supplied? The last section proposes it should be supplied by raising the duties on the dutiable, unprotected articles up to twenty per cent. This would give short of eight millions, ($7,679,000;) making the whole revenue from the customs less than fifteen millions, ($14,947,000.) What then becomes of the discriminating principle of protection? If additional revenues are to be raised, in what manner could it be done? It must be done either by raising the duties on the protected articles, or by laying duties on the articles now free.

Should this bill pass, said Mr. E., he should be almost prepared to concur in the opinion he had heard expressed in the House this morning, that it would do away the necessity of passing the enforcing bill. The duties were eventually to come down to the same rate on all dutiable articles—to twenty per cent., the South Carolina standard. With her it was only a question of time, unless she should still insist that there should be no articles imported free of duty. This was one of her unalterable resolutions. Mr. E. said he did not wish to prolong the debate. He had risen to state the light in which he had viewed the bill, and in which he thought it would be viewed by the country—as the ultimate abandonment of the protecting policy.

Mr. DICKSON also opposed the bill, and moved its postponement till to-morrow. Negatived.

Mr. LETCHER spoke in reply, and in defence of the bill; when the question was put on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and carried:

TUESDAY, February 26.

The Tariff—Compromise Bill.

The engrossed bill to reduce the tariff (as amended by the adoption of Mr. CLAY's bill of the Senate) was read a third time, and the question stated to be on its passage.

Mr. BURMAN, of Rhode Island, said: I have not risen, at this time, to enter into any extended discussion of the bill just now read to the House: it is my purpose to do no more than to pronounce an humble protestation against the provisions of this measure; to state a solemn denunciation of the purposes intended to be effected by its enactment; and, in a few words, to express my utter abhorrence of the causes which, as I think, must have brought such a scheme before Congress.

I protest against this measure, because, like that which has been stricken out of the bill, to make room for its insertion, it proposes to provide for the wants of Government, but does not propose to make any provision for the wants of the nation. It calls on the people for money to feed that Government, and at the same time takes away that protection of their labors, by which the people have hitherto been enabled to feed themselves. Not less than one million seven hundred and fifteen thousand free white working men are annually employed in the agricultural, mechanic, and manufacturing labor of the Eastern, Northern, and Western States of this Union. That part of these men thus employed in mechanic and manufacturing labor, depend on that part of them employed in agricultural labor, in the same and other States, for a market for their fabrics; and a supply in return of food; of corn, wheat, flour, beef, pork, and other provisions, amounting annually to more than $37,000,000. They also look to them, and to other producers in many of the States, for a further market for like fabrics; and expect, in exchange, the products of their lands and mines, equal to $15,000,000 in amount annually. Those employed in the farming and mineral labors of these States, look to such as are engaged in these mechanic and manufacturing labors, for this market for their products, and therein for their supply, by this exchange of those various manufactured fabrics annually to this great amount.

By the destruction of this mechanic and manufacturing labor, men employed in agriculture, whether on their own lands, or farming the lands of others, must lose that market; and not only lose their annual supply of those fabrics heretofore purchased in it, but their annual production left on their hands for want of a market, must, to this amount, annually be utterly lost to them. For in no other market of the world could they sell their breadstuffs and provisions, their wool, their lead, their iron and steel.

This loss will take from those thus engaged in the labors of farming and the mines, not only the ability to obtain manufactured fabrics, but also the power to purchase and consume annually, as they do now, four or five millions in amount of sugar, produced in Southern Georgia and Louisiana; and thereby leave this production, to that amount, on the hands of the planters of those States. There it must perish, unless they can find a market for it in Europe, where such a market for United States sugar has not, I believe, ever been found to the amount of ten hogsheds in any one year.

I pass over the rice and tobacco, drawn from the South by the owners of manufacturing capital in the North; nor mention the cotton, on which their great fabrics now so much depend; in all amounting probably to $10,000,000 annually. This omission is made because the great, rich, and independent manufacturing capitalists of the North can and will stand their ground, though they will stand that ground alone, under the provisions of this bill. When those provisions shall be carried out into perfect operation, as they will be at the end of ten years, the great, independent, manufacturing capitalist will then not depend on the South for the raw materials which he can then bring from any country at a mere revenue duty of twenty per cent.; a tax of no importance to him, because it must be paid finally by the domestic consumer of his fabric. Nor will the Southern planter then depend, for he does not now depend, on the domestic market, for the sale of his great staples. These two classes, the rich owners of great manufacturing capital in the North, or of capital in land and slaves in the South, are perfectly independent of each other's production, by the provisions of this bill; and may stand with perfect impunity, under those provisions of this measure, which must be so ruinous to all those, at this time, operating with that limited capital, or employed in those various labors, now encouraged or protected by that system of laws intended to be destroyed by these provisions.

How do the provisions of this bill ensure the destruction of that system? By the utter abandonment of even the very principle of discriminating, countervailing, or protecting duties of impost on imported goods, wares, and merchandise. At the end of ten years these duties, that is, the whole system of imposts, are to be reduced to twenty per cent. ad valorem, and to stand at that rate upon all imported commodities, such as are produced in our own country, by our own domestic industry. So utterly is protection, in its very principle, abandoned by this bill, that if more revenue shall be wanted than may be obtained, by this rate of impost on protected commodities, such impost shall not be raised on such commodities above twenty per cent.; but such impost for such revenue shall be placed on tea, coffee, and other articles unprotected, because not produced in this country; and such impost may, for revenue, be raised up to twenty per cent. This bill, therefore, not only takes from all the free labor of the free States the whole benefit of the present system of encouragement and protection, but may, and doubtless will, in its progress, still further discourage such free labor by a heavy tax placed on the imported food of that labor; tea, coffee, and sugar—a tax from which the slave owners of the South will be exempted, in respect of all their labor; because neither tea, nor coffee, nor sugar, is ever consumed by the slaves.

This bill provides concerning all impost on any protected commodity, that whenever such impost exceeds twenty per cent. ad valorem, all such excess shall be divided into ten parts; and that a tithe of this whole excess shall annually be taken away, until at the end of ten years no impost shall remain at a higher rate, on any commodity, than twenty per cent. on its value.

The taking away a tenth part of this protection, annually, will, in two or three years, so expose the middling interest men, concerned in manufactures, to the first effects of foreign competition, created by excessive importation, that they must give up the conflict, and submit to the ruin provided for them by this measure.

This will leave the war of the trade in the hands of capitalists, who can afford to lose; and, outliving those losses, which ruin the less wealthy, they will take all the benefits resulting to them, as the survivors of their ruin. That ruin, and the certainty that all protection will terminate at the expiration of ten years, will discourage all owners of small, or middling, or even great capital from embarking in these manufactures, and will leave the whole concern to the over-wealthy now engaged in this business; these fortunate men, united with foreigners, will continue the trade, and supply the market. They will do this at such a rate of cost to the consumers in our country, as may be charged upon all manufactured fabrics sold in our market by the producers of such fabrics in foreign countries. Whatever the cost of them may be in England or elsewhere, to that cost will be added the cost of importation, not less than fifteen per cent., and in like manner the amount of impost, twenty per cent., will so much further enhance the whole cost to the American consumer. The wealthy capitalists, the only surviving manufacturers of the North, then exempted from all domestic, will receive the full benefit of foreign competition—a competition which, in its first movements, by excessive importations, will have ruined all competitors of limited capital in our own country; and will thus finally enable those men, more abundant and independent in their means, to share with the wealthy manufacturer of other nations the spoils of our consumption, taxed, as it must then be, by the final effects of this measure, with not less than thirty-five per cent. more in amount, for our whole supply of manufactured fabrics, than would have been their cost, if wholly furnished by domestic production, under that system of encouragement and protection, and domestic competition, which the provisions of this bill are intended to destroy.

This evil will fall on the whole country, and will be a just retribution for the cruel and unrelenting ruin which this profligate measure will have brought on the many hundreds of thousands of free white working men, now employed in the mechanic, manufacturing, and agricultural labors of the free States. When the domestic manufacturers, the owners of the mills and machines, by the working of which those men now earn their bread, and that of their families; when these owners find they must surrender a tenth part of their protection—a tenth part of their impost over and above twenty per cent. of the whole, they will call on their working men to surrender a like tenth part of their wages, or to leave their employment. When will this first call be made? In the very dead of the next winter, when they and their families must perish or have employment. It will be repeated annually at that season. They will surrender, rather than hear their children cry for bread when they have none to give them. This demand on labor for a reduction of wages will be repeated once a year, just as often as this bill makes a like reduction of the rate of that impost by which manufacturing labor and capital are now protected. At the end of ten years, when the whole protection is taken away, the wages of labor will be reduced to twenty per cent. of its present amount. What a consummation of what a scheme!

Mr. FORTZ said he considered the reduction too slow, and the period for arriving at the revenue point too distant. He feared, also, that in the intervening time, by reason of the reduction being so gradual, there would be a large accumulation of surplus revenue in the treasury, the scramble for which was easily foreseen; and the corrupting tendency of which must be obvious to all.

Mr. F. also protested against the pledge which seemed to be contained in that part of the bill which provides that "the duties, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected" until June, 1842. We had no power to bind our successors, and Mr. F. would not bind his constituents, or even himself, by any such engagement as that which is alleged to be thus implied. He had great difficulty in bringing his mind to the conclusion to vote for the bill, and he voted for it solely upon the ground of an adjustment of the agitating and distracting question which had brought this Union to the verge of dissolution. As a compromise, he considered it far short of what the South was entitled to; but he was prepared to concede much; to make a willing sacrifice to preserve the Union of these States, and to restore peace and harmony to the country. He had therefore expressed the opinion, that this object could only be effected by a spirit of mutual conciliation and concession, and it was by this spirit that he was now actuated. In pursuing this course, he had no doubt he represented truly the feelings and opinions of his high-minded and patriotic constituents; but he had no authority to pledge them to any future course of measures, nor would he do it. This bill he regarded as an experiment; and if in its operation it should be found to be defective, it will be subject, like all other laws, to repeal or modification.

Mr. DENNY said that he owed thanks to the gentleman from Georgia for the frank and candid expression of the sentiments which he had now given to the House. It now appeared that this bill was considered by the South as a mere experiment, which might or might not prove satisfactory on trial. And was that

House to experiment on the livelihood of millions of men? Were they to be driven into the adoption of such a course by a faction existing in a single State? A gentleman from Kentucky, whom it would not be parliamentary to name, had, out of benevolent feeling, proposed the present bill as a compromise of the existing duties between the North and the South. But did gentlemen from the South say that they would accept the bill as a compromise? Not at all. The House had just heard one of those gentlemen declare that he considered the proposition as a mere experiment. Had it been demonstrated to the House that the South would accept the bill, and would rest satisfied with it? It had not. Let the House pass this bill, and next year the Southern interest would come up and drive the House from its position. Once give them the power, and every thing like compromise would depart forever. The State which Mr. D. represented was to be the chief sufferer in this arrangement: it was sentenced to die. But was it certain that they should perish by so slow a death as this bill had provided for them? Was the Kentucky gentleman able to restrain and hold down the fiery spirits of the South? When they came to press the advocates of American industry to the wall, would it be in the power of that gentleman to hold back their fury, and rescue the manufacturing interest from their remorseless blow? He believed not. The bill did nothing more than to hold out to foreigners all that protection and encouragement which ought to be reserved for our own citizens. If the object was to compromise with foreigners, the British themselves could propose no better terms to advance and secure their own prosperity. They would willingly take this bill, because they would see in it the slow, but certain death of the manufactures of our country. Its provisions would give vitality and strength to their own industry; it would diminish the numbers in their pauper houses; it would make paupers in this country, by feeding the paupers of Great Britain. The friends of the protective system had little expected such a blow from the quarter from whence it came. From the hand of their avowed opponents they might have been prepared to meet it. If it came from them, however it might prostrate the best interests of the country, it might be better borne; but it came with added force from the hand of one who had been himself the strongest advocate of the system. The American people had not looked for any thing like this. They knew that a bill to reduce the tariff had just passed, and they were willing to wait another year to see what the effect of that bill would be; but this was not permitted them. They must here take their leave of the protecting policy. Its knell sounded in this bill, and he had only to regret that the task had not fallen to abler hands of pronouncing its funeral oration. The system of internal improvement was also to be murdered; and where the devastation was to stop, who could tell? But one consolation still remained. The country had its own relief in its own hands. Freemen were not bound, like slaves, to work upon a plantation all their lives, while their masters disposed of them according to their pleasure.

There was one provision in this bill which ought to alarm every man that was interested in the American system. It proposed eventually to equalize all duties, reducing them to twenty per cent. ad valorem. Here was deception on the very face of the bill. All ad valorem duties were necessarily deceptive. A specific duty was known; everybody knew, at once, what they had to pay; but ad valorem duties varied continually. The bill laid a twenty per cent. duty on articles of all sorts. All sorts of mechanical work were to be brought down to twenty per cent., while some of them were produced by machinery, and others not. The same machinery worked as well here as it did in Europe, and our mechanics worked at as cheap a rate; but to meet the European, they must work on half wages, because the foreign operative obtained half his living from the parish.

Where was the discrimination under such a bill? The owner of a cotton mill, with his power looms, was to have a protection of twenty per cent., while the poor weaver who sat, from day to day, toiling at a hand loom, obtained no more. In England, such a man obtained the residue of his living out of the parish. Was this pauper system of England to be combined with the slave system of South Carolina, against the free labor of the United States? Must American industry be thus nullified? Must the manufacturers submit, and see all their workshops closed within ten years? Could it be expected that, with such a prospect before them, those who now contemplated investing their capital would continue such a purpose? It could not. The moment the passage of this bill was announced, the whole manufacturing enterprise of the country would at once be paralyzed. The emulation would be, who should wind up their affairs the soonest. As one factory went down after another, the monopoly would increase, from year to year, until, at length a few overgrown establishments would be left standing in solitary opulence, melancholy monuments in the wide-spread ruin.

Mr. DANIEL said: The gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BUREAU) said that this bill was virtually an abandonment of the protective system. The bill allowed the manufacturers a little lifetime to come down to the point to which all agreed that they must at last come, viz., to a revenue duty. How was it an abandonment of protection? He should think that any man, in seven years, with a protection of sixty per cent., might make his fortune. What farmer made half as much? What farmer made twenty per cent. upon his capital? No, he did not make ten per cent., nor five either. But this bill was willing the manufacturers should enjoy their fifty or sixty per cent. until it was gradually reduced to a permanent tax upon the people of the United States of twenty per cent. for the support and encouragement of manufactures. It really seemed to Mr. D. that no man ought to raise his voice against it. It was a free gift—a mere gratuity. What had the great West to do with manufactures? What benefit was it to Kentucky that the manufacturers of Rhode Island should get a bounty on their industry? They paid a million and a half into the treasury, and got about six or seven hundred thousand dollars out of it, by which they gained an annual loss of about seven hundred thousand dollars. Still they supported the tariff. They supported it because they supposed it was for the benefit of the country. They were not willing, however, to press the system to the separation of the Union. Rather than such should be the result, they were ready to abandon it altogether. He did not believe that one-fifth of the people of the nation would give up the Union to save the tariff. The individual who had recommended this compromise had acted on other principles. He chose rather to retire than to remain in public life at any such cost. He did not seek any office. Mr. D. trusted the people of this country would ever continue to remember him as having proved their political saviour at the two greatest crises the nation has yet known. Who had it been that had saved the country when the Missouri question threatened to rend the Union; and who had now saved it from war and bloodshed? The same same individual had effected both these deliverances.

Mr. STEWART was opposed to all further legislation, at this time, on the subject of the tariff. This Congress had already acted upon the subject. We have passed one law, and are functus officio. If the act of the last session, passed with so much unanimity as a final adjustment of this vexed question, is again to be disturbed, let it be by other hands—let us not be driven by a handful of nullifiers into a repeal of our own legislation before it has gone into effect, and before any one can foresee whether its operation is to be beneficial or injurious. If we degrade ourselves by such an act of inconsistency, the world can assign but one reason for our course, and that will be, that a majority of two to one have been compelled to surrender their own deliberate judgment to the threats of a few nullifiers, thereby recognizing and establishing nullification, not only as a peaceable, but as an efficient and constitutional remedy, proclaiming to the world that the United States is not a Government, but a thing to be governed by the passions, whims, and caprices of each and every State in this Union. What, sir, is our present position? Last session we passed a tariff, as a final compromise and settlement of the question. South Carolina was dissatisfied, and she has nullified it; she says her will, and not that of the Union, shall govern. The President says the law shall be executed, and South Carolina shall submit—we join the nulli-fiere, repeal the law, and South Carolina triumphs; Rhode Island, or some other State voting against the repealing act, next nullifies, puts herself on her sovereignty, demands the repeal of this law; and, upon the authority of the precedent now established, you must again repeal this act, and so on, as long as any State in the Union is dissatisfied. The constitution and Government would be by such doctrines subverted and overturned; it could not be preserved, and would not be worth it if it could. Our Union would be a rope of sand, a cobweb to be broken by every breeze. Until South Carolina, therefore, repealed her ordinance, and laid down her weapons of rebellion, he, for one, was opposed to all legislation on this subject. But this objection out of the way, and no sufficient or even plausible reason had been assigned for "posting with such dexterity" to the repeal of our own deliberate act. What were the reasons assigned? Sum them all up, and they were embraced under three heads: 1. To reduce the revenue; 2. To reduce taxation; and, 3. To appease the nullifiers. That the act of the last session would produce too much revenue, was an assumption, he said, unsupported by evidence. The act has not yet gone into operation. No one could say what was to be its effect upon the revenue. He believed that, instead of a surplus, there would be a deficiency of revenue. There is no surplus now, we all know. That there would be a surplus hereafter, no one could foretell.

Mr. S. said he would not trespass longer on the time and attention of the House, but he did hope that gentlemen would not be so soon driven from the act of the last session by a few disappointed and ambitious men in the South—men who seemed determined to rule or ruin the country. To yield to their dictation, would not only be disgraceful but ruinous in the extreme. These people of the South have already been spoiled by indulgence; they cannot bear to see any prosper but themselves. What has been their course, and what has brought about the present alarming and unhappy state of things? Let us go back a few years and inquire. Let us see how Southern jealousy has operated, and how it has been indulged. Having by non-intercourse, embargoes, and war, broken up the navigation of the North, and compelled them to turn their capital and industry to manufactures, they next determine to break down manufactures; and, to accomplish this, what is the plan? First, to hasten the payment of the public debt, and then to repeal the duties, as no longer necessary. And how is the payment of the debt to be hastened? First, internal improvements must be arrested to swell the annual surplus applicable to the payment of the debt. They are indulged in this, and internal improvements have been arrested. Next, the act limiting the sinking fund to ten millions a year must be repealed, and this was also done. Next, the United States Bank, being suspected of affording capital and other facilities to the manufacturing States, must be put down also. They were again indulged last session. The tariff was attacked and reduced six or eight millions; but, like spoiled children, they grow worse from indulgence. They now demand that the protective principle shall be utterly abandoned, and the whole people of the Northern and Middle States sacrificed at once, or they will dissolve the Union! Grant this, and next we must elect a President south of the Potomac, or we shall have another nullifying ordinance—more threats of civil war and bloodshed; and where was this system of concession to end? It would end only when all political power was surrendered to the South, and the free people of the Northern and Middle States reduced to a condition more miserable and degraded than that of the Southern slave. It was time to stop and tell these gentlemen plainly that we will go no further, and to play out their game of nullification and civil war if they dare—civil war! Where is it to be? and who is to suffer by it? It will be confined to South Carolina. It will be a war between her own people, the union men and nullifiers, and the former would be able to put down the latter with little or no aid from the Federal Government. But why should we of the Northern and Middle States sacrifice our people by repealing the tariff to prevent these madmen of South Carolina from cutting each other's throats? But there was no danger; they were not rash and crazy enough to do so. There can be no war in the North; it would be entirely a Southern affair. They would have all the glory and all the sufferings of this war among themselves. All would commiserate and none envy their condition under this glorious reign of nullification.

Mr. SUTHERLAND would put it to all who heard him, whether a bill presented in the manner, and under the circumstances that this had been, ought to pass. It was out of all reason. It was against the course of all legislation. The ink was hardly dry with which a bill had been engrossed and passed at the last session, settling this very question, and settling it by compromise. Would the House be doing justice to those who had relied upon that act, so soon to overturn what had been so deliberately resolved upon—a law which had commanded the votes of two-thirds of that House, and two-thirds of the Senate? But he was told that the bill must pass, because a spirit of opposition had appeared in South Carolina, and was running through all the Southern country, which nothing could allay but the passage of such a bill. On that subject he must be allowed one word of reply. He asked, where did this whole protecting system come from? With whom did it originate? Where was it born? The system was started in South Carolina. It had originated in the early days of this Government, and it had been sustained in Virginia, by one of the ablest statesmen that ever graced that proud and ancient commonwealth. He meant Thomas Jefferson. Yes, it was Mr. Jefferson, who had given it his most decided sanction. He had appeared in his native State, on our great national anniversary, in 1808, dressed from head to foot in homespun. All the military, horse and foot, had paraded in uniforms of American manufacture. And the reverend clergy were clad in the same. And so entirely was the system approved of, that prayers were offered up on that occasion for its maintenance and perpetuity. This House was asked to repeal the protective system, although the very people who brought the system into being, now declared it to be unconstitutional: and although there had not lived scarce a distinguished man, since the revolution, who had not been, or was not now, the approver and advocate of the American system, and its constitutionality. It had been a member from South Carolina, a Mr. Burke, who had first proposed in that House a protecting duty upon hemp, to enable the people of his State to raise that commodity upon their rice grounds. With this view the duty had been imposed. The same individual had then asked a protecting duty upon indigo, all for the benefit of his State and the South; and this duty had, in like manner, been laid on. But now, South Carolina had discovered that every protecting duty was a flagrant and alarming violation of the constitution.

"We think our fathers' fools—so wise we grow;
No doubt our wiser sons will think us so."

At the first session of the first Congress, one of the signers of the constitution had offered an address to George Washington, as being the devoted friend to the whole system, which address had been unanimously adopted, by men who were themselves the fathers of our revolution. Southern gentlemen might rave as they would. The constitutionality of that system stood beyond their power. In a debate which had taken place in the first Congress, as to the duty proper to be laid upon tobacco, the celebrated Roger Sherman, a member from Connecticut, had proposed to lay sixpence a pound on that article, avowedly as a prohibition. This was carrying protection to its extreme; and had a single Southern man so much as whispered an objection? Not one. Why should the law be altered now? Protection was as constitutional at this day as it had been at that day.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, should vote for this bill, not because it was what he wished, but because it was the best thing that could be procured. The bill proposed to impose a less degree of taxation on the country, so soon as January next. Had this bill been offered to him at the commencement of the session, he should have felt himself bound to reject it. Had himself or any of his friends proposed such a measure to the South at that time, he should have felt that he was offering them an insult. But circumstances had since occurred which showed that now the South was willing to accept the bill as a compromise that would settle the distracted state of the country. Such being the case, he was bound to accept it. He rejoiced to find, that somehow, or somewhere, an arrangement had at length been effected. The fact proved either that the injuries complained of by the South were not so serious as they had been represented to be, or that the South had been governed by a laudable patriotism, which led them to assent to an offer which came short of that which they had a just right to demand. He hoped and believed that it was from the latter. He would now say a word or two on the subject of pledges. The House had been told that, having voted for the bill of 1822, they were pledged to leave the subject of the tariff at rest. But Mr. B., though he had voted for that bill, had not voted for it as the best that was possible: he had voted for it as the best he could then get; but he had not considered himself as bound never to get a better, when it should be in his power. He had never pledged either himself or his constituents. Whether it was or was not, in the opinion of some, implied that the system was to remain untouched for eight or ten years to come, was a matter of mere moonshine to him. He had never pledged himself for a single session ahead. His successors, he knew, would act as he had acted, independently.

Mr. PENDLETON, of New York, viewed the bill as a compromise. It was an exchange of intermediate protection for ultimate reduction: and those who voted for it voted for it as a whole. There was no reason why gentlemen who voted on one side should be more reflected on than those on the other. Gentlemen who chose to reject the compromise could do so; but those who took it, took it as a whole. They consented to the continuance of protection for a certain course of years for the sake of ensuring its reduction in the end. In his judgment this was altogether illusory, because this Congress could not bind its successors; for himself he never would consent to take a measure so entirely uncertain.

Mr. McDUFFIE did not believe that the bill made all the concession to the demands of the South which justice required; much more ought to have been allowed. The South had a right to demand more, much more. But he had nevertheless made up his mind to vote for the bill. He wished to give quiet to the country; he believed this bill would give quiet to the country: and in that view he should give it his vote.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, had no inclination to go into a discussion of the bill, but he wished to state the grounds upon which he should vote against its passage, that he might stand fairly before his constituents, and before the country, upon this deeply interesting subject. He did not share in the apprehension expressed, that the South would not abide by the provisions of the bill. He had no fear on that score, for the bill is an abandonment—gentlemen may say what they will to the contrary—the bill is an abandonment of the protective principle, progressively and slowly, but certainly and fatally. Nor had he any disposition to join in the denunciations, although he shared largely in the regrets of the occasion. Had the cup which the friends of the tariff are called upon to take been mingled by other hands, he could have borne it; but, presented and forced upon them as this has been, it becomes as unpleasant and ungrateful as unexpected.

FEBRUARY, 1853.]

The Tariff—Compromise Bill.

[H. OF R.]

He would state, that he might be distinctly understood, that the advocates of the protective system admit—

1st. That the revenues of the Government ought to be no more than the wants of the Government; that they do not ask, by way of protection, for a dollar beyond this. But,

2d. They maintain that, so far as the revenue is derived from impost, it ought to be from duties imposed for protection. And,

3d. That, in the apportionment and assessment of duties, reference ought to be had to the condition and wants of the interests to be protected. Acting upon these principles, he said, there would be ample means of protection for all needed purposes; but, in his opinion, the bill under consideration was in utter disregard of every one of them.

So far as derivable from duties on protected articles, this bill will augment the revenue, and thus will diminish protection, while it will increase the demands upon the people.

The duties upon protected articles, it will be observed, are to be progressively reduced to twenty per cent. in 1842, and afterwards at pleasure; but, in no event, peace or war, is the progress of reduction to be stayed; and in no event, after 1842, is the rate of duty to exceed twenty per cent. The bill contains a formal enactment, and gives an express pledge to this effect. And both before and after 1842, in case of a deficiency or excess of revenue, recourse is to be had to such unprotected articles as are not made free by the bill. This he considered an abandonment of the great protective principle. It is an express agreement that the duties for protection shall not exceed twenty per cent., and that duties for the mere purposes of revenue may be imposed upon unprotected articles when they are needed for protection. It is, therefore, not only an abandonment of the principle, but a limitation upon the power. The duties upon the unprotected may transcend the duties upon the protected articles themselves.

But how, he inquired, does this bill propose to reduce the duties? It changes all the specific into ad valorem duties after 1842. In the mean time it reduces them equally, without any regard to the magnitude or wants of the different interests, their importance in war or peace, their character as connected with agriculture or commerce, with necessities or luxuries, with the capabilities or exigencies of the country; it reduces them all as a gardener trims a hedge, cutting every thing to the same level, without reference to any thing but uniformity. Whatever may be the legislation of foreign Governments, whatever the competition and power brought to bear upon a given department of industry, this bill fixes its position and condition immovably, and leaves it at the mercy of those who may choose to assail it, and in any way they choose. Mr. B. said that he would detain the House no longer. The victim is bound, and he would not delay the sacrifice. But he could have wished the offering had been made by other hands.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the previous question, and the House sustained the motion: Yeas 93, nays 65.

The previous question was carried: Yeas 109, nays 85.

The main question, viz., "Shall the bill pass?" was then put and decided by:

WEDNESDAY, February 27.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

The Senate's bill further to provide for the collection of the revenue (the enforcing bill) coming up,

Mr. VERPLANCK moved that the consideration of that bill be postponed until the next day, in order that the House should take up the appropriation bills, several of which remained to be acted upon.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed that there seemed to exist a disposition in the House to pass this bill; but he put it to gentlemen whether it was right and fair to postpone the consideration of it so far that those who might be opposed to its passage should have only time left them to say no, but not to state the reasons for their vote. The House was bound to allow at least time enough for a fair discussion of the bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said: This was the last day of the session on which bills could be discussed. The appropriation bills would have to be read a third time to-morrow—to postpone would be to destroy them.

The motion to postpone was decided in the negative: Yeas 70, nays 127.

Mr. CARSON said that the bill being now before the House, he wished to offer a few ideas upon some of its provisions.

From the obvious majority against him, it would have been useless for him to persevere in attempting to get the bill committed; and therefore it was that he had withdrawn his motion. He now rose to perform a solemn duty; such a one as he had once hoped would never have been his lot, and one which filled him with the deepest regret: it was to part with a number of gentlemen with whom it had been his pride and pleasure heretofore to act. But the hour was come in which he was called to separate himself from them. He regretted this the more, as he knew that it would operate as a banishment of himself from the regard of a man whom he had delighted to honor; a man whom he had served, if not with as much ability, at least with as much honest zeal as ever son felt toward the person and the reputation of his own father. Never had his heart known such a feeling of devotion toward any human being, unconnected with himself by blood, as toward Andrew Jackson. But he had arrived at the spot where they must part. Lear had banished his Cordelia, and had divided his estate between Regan and Goneril, because they were more vociferous in the profession of their attachment than his poor Cordelia. He had banished, too, the honest Kent. Yet Mr. C. felt it to be difficult, when the affections of the heart had once been so devoted, to indulge in any expression of censure, even where the object of those affections was most in error. He felt, on the contrary, that he would rather hide such things from the world, and let them be consigned to perpetual oblivion. But this bill—how could it be hidden? He met it on his way; he had not gone to seek it; it met him, and he could not avoid it. God knew what had been his feelings on first perusing it. He saw at once that the line of separation was drawn forever. The fault was not his. The measure had broken upon the nation like a thunder-clap; it was not merely Mr. C.'s misfortune, but that of the whole American people. With the popularity he enjoyed, that individual could have done more good than any other man since the days of Washington. But, in proportion to the power of doing good, was the corresponding power of doing injury. That injury was now about to be inflicted. It would be inflicted by this bill. Mr. C. might be mistaken in this foreboding; and when he saw himself separated from so many of his friends in relation to it, he wished he could believe that he was; but he could not see such a bill about to pass without offering some feeble opposition to it. He would remind gentlemen with whom he had formerly acted, and who now were prepared to vote for this bill because it had the Executive recommendation, of some things that seemed to be forgotten. He was well aware that they acted under a high sense of duty, and considered themselves as having a high moral duty to perform. But he would recall their recollections to the sessions of 1826-7 when a gentleman was President who now sat near him in that House, (Mr. ADAMS.) The Executive had sent, during that session, a message to the House having reference to the execution of a treaty with the Creek Indians. In that paper he had very strongly squinted at the employment of force. He had spoken in it of a "superadded obligation" arising from his oath of office. Mr. C. and his coadjutors had pounced upon the passage as hungry pikes would pounce upon a roach. They were all ready in a moment, with their gaffs on, to fly at the man who had presumed to send such a message to that House.

[Mr C. here quoted the message.]

In the first part this paper said that the author abstained from using the force in his control, because he knew that those who opposed the execution of the treaty were acting under the laws of a sovereign State, and believed that they were doing their duty. Now, Mr. C. would say to gentlemen who had voted with him on that occasion, that before they voted for the present bill they ought to go to that gentleman and ask his pardon. It was due to themselves. It was due to him. Every one recollected what a sensation that message had produced in the House; every one must remember the able report upon it in the Senate. Yet there, the Executive abstained from using force, because the individuals were acting under the authority of a State. Compare this language with the bill now before the House; it was Hyperion to a Satyr. Compare the bill with the alien and sedition law—that odious act which had been virtually repealed by the public sentiment of the American people

FEBRUARY, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

[H. OF R.]

—and it dwindled into insignificance. A comparison of the two bills would be sufficient to convince any man of the character of this measure. The alien law empowered the President to order such as he might consider dangerous and suspected aliens to depart from the country; and if they refused, to imprison them.

[Here Mr. C. quoted the alien law.]

That bill permitted a man to be tried by his peers; but did this bill permit any such thing? Did the alien bill send a sword? No; but look at what this bill provided. [Here Mr. C. quoted the clause in relation to unlawful assemblages of people.] "May be deemed"—deemed by whom? Why, by the President, to be sure; or by a creature he should appoint. What did this bill do but put a sword into the hand of the Executive against his fellow-citizens? It empowered him to ride rough-shod over the sovereignty of a State of this Union. The advocates of the bill might deny the fact; but what had produced the act? Was it not the sovereign action of a sovereign State? And what had the House heard this day and yesterday from a native son of Carolina? from a gentleman indebted to her for his birth and his existence? That this bill was all-important to heal the wounds of a minority of that State.

[Here Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, interposed, and flatly denied that he had said any such thing.]

The gentleman certainly had said that it was due to the Union party of South Carolina that the bill should pass. And why? It gave the collector of the revenue at Charleston, with one or two others, power to call out the forces of the whole American nation, to put down the sovereignty of a State acting through a majority of its citizens. That was plainly the view of the bill, and of those who supported it; it was to put South Carolina down; it was to put her leaders down; none could doubt this. The law, indeed, was general in its language; and it might even now be brought to bear upon Massachusetts, as rightfully as upon South Carolina; for the Massachusetts Legislature had passed a law which certainly squinted hard at nullification; the weasel was in part out of the bag, though they could not yet see the whole of him. And the tariff bill might yet raise storms at the North, which would require such a bill as this to quell. Though now the bill was receiving the aid of all the Eastern States, the time might yet come when those States would themselves be lashed with the whip they had put in the hands of the Executive.

The bill, it appeared, must pass, for the sake of the Union party in South Carolina. The State, he knew, had many distinguished citizens within the limits of that party; men, whose characters and motives he believed to be perfectly honorable and patriotic, and he regretted that any man should request, on their behalf, that such an act as this should pass against his own State. While he heard that request preferred, he could not but think of the beautiful lines of Moore in relation to Ireland. Had this bill been directed against North Carolina, and Mr. C. had been a member of a large minority of that State, and a majority of the State (to which his allegiance was due) had resolved itself into an elementary assembly, and had decided that the constitution had been violated by any law of the Union, he should have scorned to ask the aid of the General Government or of any other foreign Government, to put down his mother, to trample on his parent, and send down her name dishonored to posterity.

Evening Session.

The House resumed the consideration of the revenue collection bill.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia, rose in opposition to the bill. It has been well said by an old author, said Mr. C., that when a Government intends to commit violence upon the rights of the people, its first attempt is to put out the lights, as others, on like occasions, put out the lights. We allow the disburdening of a ship in imminent peril of wreck, but this will not excuse those who, upon a feigned foresight of a State tempest, shall immediately cast law and conscience overboard, discard and quit rudder and compass, and so assist the danger they pretend to fear. As a pretext to fall upon the people, they are to be visited with frequent vexations; and lest these should be healed by that generous forbearance peculiar to a love of country, their sores are to be regained and exasperated, under all the urging circumstances that come within the invention of scandal. And hence it is a principle in the politics of tyranny to make every infirmity a fault, and every fault a crime. Such as study to be great by any means, must by all means forget to be just; and they that will usurp dominion over others, must first become slaves to the worst of tyrants—a lust after power. Power, when unchained, stops at nothing short of full gratification, and by nothing is it so much delighted as the red ruins of wasted countries, desolated fields, and demolished habitations; and this scene is greatly heightened in its hell-smitten aspect, if there be left to brood over the mischief the solitude of widowhood, and the destitution of orphanage. Such may be the result of this day's legislation, and there is to come out of it this lesson, that, in the promptings of ambition, power cannot be purchased too dear, though it cost the blood of millions. In the contemplation of a principle so desponding, there is left one consolation, poor, I confess, that it will not be the first supremacy that has been won and worn upon the length and keenness of a usurping sword.

The bill we are called on to pass, amounts to a declaration, without mincing the matter, that the States of this confederacy, as States, may be compelled by the military force of the Government to yield implicit obedience to the laws of a majority of Congress, no matter what may be their character; and that there is no other relief but the virtue of the longest sword and the strongest arm, wielded under the dread alternative of triumph or treason. And what is worse, though one is the creature of the other, yet the creator alone can commit treason. The creature has nothing to lose in the conflict. It draws its resources from the author of its own being, by which it makes its conquests, and is subject to no pains or penalties; while, on the contrary, the State has every thing to forfeit, and pays the expense of the war on both sides. Is this a false statement of the case? Then what has produced this state of things? That which has produced more real discontent than all other matters besides; I mean taxation. In countries where the people are taxed to support the splendor of kings, the luxurious indulgence of noble families, of particular dynasties, and are educated to believe that such impositions are all right, and is the very essence of duty, it is a matter of little concern how much their oppressors afflict them. But in this enlightened country, where men know their rights, and are taught, from the republican simplicity of their Government, that taxes are property, and just so much and no more is required, as is honestly necessary for the frugal purposes of Government to protect the residue left in the hands of the contributor, it becomes a subject of just complaint whenever these limits are transcended. For whom, then, are these taxes levied? Are they for the Government? Not so. The President has said they are not necessary, more than is wanting ought to be reduced; recommends it, and considers the South badly treated. A reduction of six millions of taxes, which the Secretary of the Treasury says can be readily spared, will end all our strifes, and render this odious law perfectly unnecessary. Why can it not be done? Was there ever before an instance of one portion of the people fighting the other to keep on the taxes, and the Government standing by, with its pockets as full as it wants, encouraging the battle? Look at the matter in its true colors. The South has been complaining for ten years, in every form that undressed injury can suggest; and they have been as constantly repelled by every excuse that insatiable avarice could invent, and none so often urged as the public debt. Well, now the public debt is paid. What next? Behold the Government, in honest truth, comes out and says, we have as much as we want out of you, and more too; but here are a few eager manufacturers standing at our back, who state that they are not yet satisfied, and urge as a reason why we should let them subsidize you a little longer, that you are putting on the signs of rebellion, and it will never do, the pride of the Government will not suffer it, to permit you to question our authority to tax you for whatever purpose we please. True, these manufacturers have driven you to desperation, and to drive you out of it again becomes a pretext to keep on the taxes. Lay down your arms, fall on your knees, and raise your hands and eyes in supplication, and we have no doubt they will take the matter into their serious consideration at the next session of Congress! Now, Mr. Speaker, you may think this is no hard matter to bear, and that we ought to try it a little longer; but mark me, we are in and about the very point where it can be endured no longer, and this Congress would do well to pause before they move any further. What is it you want—taxes! For what! For the Government? Take what you please to any amount for its honest purposes. Have you ever been stinted? Your Secretary says you cannot possibly spend more than fifteen millions, and the allowance of this sum will reduce our burdens six millions. Why will you not do it! Do you want more for yourselves? Only observe for a moment how bountifully you are supplied out of these fifteen millions. Bear with me while I tell the people, who are working under God's curse for what little they earn, how sumptuously their governors live.

First, go with me to the palace of your President; see the splendors of his household, view the lawns and artificial hills and dales that surround his mansion, made on purpose to regale his eye, and varied every year to relieve his vision from the dulness of monotony! All this comes out of the estimate of fifteen millions, said to be wanted for the use of the Government! Come with me to the gaudy exhibitions displayed in both halls of Congress; see our hundred white servants, subject to our beck and call, and we can hardly lift a draught of water to our lips without their help! See the splendid gardens and enclosures provided for our special comfort and refreshment! One pavement, of ninety feet in length and forty in breadth, has cost four thousand dollars! One enclosure of eight acres, for a botanic garden, in front of this magnificent building, is about to cost us twenty thousand dollars. The bringing of water from a spring in the adjacent country, to sport in a fountain before the Capitol, is to cost thirty thousand more. It was but last night you gave away to this city, alone, eight hundred thousand dollars, besides one hundred thousand for paving its streets. The appropriation for what is so wastefully scattered over this building and its various apartments, I mean fuel and stationery, is one hundred thousand dollars a year, a sum sufficient to defray the separate civil list of half the States in the Union. Two thousand dollars to paper three rooms in the President's palace, enough to build forty habitations for those in the humbler walks of life, who are the tax-paying people. All this, and I barely mention a few items, to show the character and extravagance of public expenditure, also comes out of this estimate of fifteen millions of dollars, intended to supply the wants of the Government.

Yes, sir, the wants of the Government! And when the people, with a holy devotion for the Government of their choice, are willing to submit to these impositions, and to gratify these frugal wants, it is not enough; they must contribute to the similar wants of private gentlemen, and to the gratification of the like kind of splendor; because, forsooth, they have idle money about them that must be put to profitable employment, through the agency of the Government, and at the expense of the great mass of the laboring South. And when the South complains, they are told, your conduct is insolent, your course is rebellious, and your doctrines are treasonable! It becomes our duty, and is demanded by the dignity of our Government, in the language of the Chief Magistrate of the nation to a member of this House, "to put you down." These additional taxes, over and above the wants of the Government, so long complained of, and now of a character no longer to be borne, have brought up the South to the point of resistance. South Carolina has said she submits no longer. The rest of the South will soon follow. Tyranny, always cowardly, has taken the alarm. Every thing is magnified into rebellion. Wonderful signs, as of old, have appeared. The earth and air are filled with prognostica. Expresses frighten the country from Washington to Charleston. A steamboat has been seen to reverse its flag, the Union down. One star on a blood-red flag has been seen in the South. On the morning the proclamation made its appearance in the Senate, no prayers had been said in that body. The flag of Congress, on that same morning, was observed to be flapping in confusion, only half-mast high. One of the thirteen stars, representing the thirteen States, in the Virginia Capitol, fell on the day that that grave body were discussing federal relations. These were fearful omens of approaching war and rebellion; and as history plainly shows, should never be disregarded by a cautious and wise Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, these wonderful signs have produced another wonderful consequence; like the Dutch apparitions that frightened the English King, they have brought out a similar proclamation. A proclamation, I will venture to say, that may safely challenge the world for its parallel. By what authority was it issued? Sir, I am about to make a declaration that I dare any man to deny. I affirm that there is no authority in this Government for any proclamation from the President of the United States, that is not founded upon some notorious law. The King of Great Britain dare not issue his proclamation unless supported by some known statute. Now, show me the law that authorizes the proclamation in question: I boldly say there is none. What! have we come to this, that a proclamation, like the edicts of the Grand Sultan, is to be the rule of action for the free people of these United States? That the President shall proclaim in written instruments what he considers to be the law; what is his interpretation of the constitution; and that, according to his views of either, the sovereign States shall be bound? Is any here so credulous as to believe that if such a paper had been issued by the expected successor of the present incumbent against such a State as Virginia, it would have been tolerated for a single moment south of the Potomac? No sir, it would have been burnt in every town and hamlet throughout all that region. And pray, sir, what is the nature of it? In one breath it reasons; in the next it threatens; now it argues, then it raves; here it is pathetic, there it is satiric; in one moment it is serious, in another it is ironical; sometimes grave, at others petulant; in some places it is persuasive, in others intolerant; in many parts absolute, and everywhere dictatorial. It arraigns the motives of men; is abusive of particular characters; imputes base designs to the public authorities of a State, and denounces the leaders of the people of that State as traitors: losing sight of the dignity of a State paper emanating from the Chief Magistrate of a great Government, it descends to personalities, and those are directed against personal enemies; its author calls himself the father of the misguided people of South Carolina. The "father!" mind that! the language used to the red people of the West. Your "great father" says so and so; in the name of every thing, have we come to that? The States sunk into Indian tribes! But, Mr. Speaker, the worst part of this matter is to be told; that while this friendly, feeling, flattering, fatherly, and fighting proclamation is reclaiming a State from the error of its ways, it is delivering over the whole of the States into the hands of the General Government to be consolidated, and henceforth to be known no more as sovereign States. The republican party, who have been contending for State rights for upwards of thirty years, and fondly believed they had gloriously achieved their object, have had their trophies levelled in the dust at a single blow, and themselves bound, hand and foot, and thrown into the power of their old vanquished enemies. What a revolution! and how suddenly accomplished!

But it is said the proclamation, though erroneous in principle, was issued from the best of motives. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is not a whipping-post, a jail, or a gallows, that may not claim the same merit; but when they are abused for the purposes of fraud and oppression, it is but of little comfort to the sufferer to point him to the good motives that lie at the foundation of their institution. I wish, however, this celebrated instrument had even the virtue of their design for its appearance.

This proclamation has been followed up by a cool, calculating message, confirming all its principles, and demanding the bill now under discussion. This bill requires force to put down, not the tumult of a few individuals acting upon their own responsibility, but the solemn and deliberate act of the people of a whole sovereign State, assembled in convention in the same manner in which they assented to the federal constitution, and asserted under all the forms known to a well-organized and independent Government. Sir, this bill does not blink the question; it asks for the power of declaring war against a State, and for the use of the army and navy, to give success to that war. And, sir, we are about to grant it. We are about to do that against a sister State, which we dare not do against a foreign nation. We dare not, without a formal declaration of war, which alone rests with the representatives of the people, where it should rest, for they are answerable for unnecessary wars, confer upon the President the power to use the army and navy against any nation that should prove unmindful of its obligations. Sir, the message contemplated war, whatever persons may say as to its peaceable character. Did not the President enter into a learned legal disquisition, displaying his usual profound research into the depths of that science, even down to the feudal origin of his subject, to show that the posses comitatus was a military force, and as such might be resisted? What was this for? That if South Carolina should attempt to use this instrument, which she and all other Governments have used time out of mind, to carry into effect her legal process, and which she will continue to use, when necessary, in all other cases where her own citizens are alone concerned, it is to be considered the use of force on her part. It must cease to be employed in cases where the General Government is a party, and, if used, it is to be treated as a military force, and shot down by the army and navy of the United States. As well may the courts and their sheriff be considered as a military force, and treated in like manner. Does not every one perceive that this is the way the civil war is to commence? The sheriff, and his unarmed posses, are, by a forced construction, and at the special instance of the President, to suit the occasion, made a hostile array as against the Federal Government, (but perfectly lawful as against the State's own citizens,) and, as such, are to be murdered by the United States troops. Does any man in his proper senses believe that, when such a scene commences, the good people of South Carolina are going to stand around the dead bodies of their sons with folded arms, and tamely submit to such butchery? And if they will not, where is it to stop? Do gentlemen flatter themselves it will be confined to South Carolina alone? They must have a very contemptible opinion of the other Southern States, either as respects their courage or veracity, for they have more than once said they will not submit to the tariff; and I trust they will have discernment enough to see that the destruction of Carolina is sought on that very account. The South may prove recreant; it may falsify all its former strong asseverations; it may abandon South Carolina after the work of death begins; they may turn out to be a talking, and not a fighting people; but I shall not believe it till I see it, notwithstanding the proclamation and this bill are supported by some Southern members. The first and fifth sections of this bill allow the President to use military force, and these are to remain in operation to the end of the next session of Congress. The other sections confer great powers on the federal court, and are intended to be permanent. I think I can perceive that in some of these provisions my own State is to have another difficulty, either with the Indians or the General Government; but as she can, as heretofore, take care of herself, I shall not now moot this point with the House, but go on to show that, under the fifth section a common marshal, especially if he be opposed to his own State, a thing not very unlikely, may involve this whole country in one universal blaze of civil war. The President is authorized to call out the military force, when informed by a federal judge that "any law or laws of the United States, or the execution thereof," is obstructed by "any unlawful means, too great to be overcome by the power vested in the marshal." Now, who informs the federal judge of this fact? Does not every one see it must be the marshal? Who judges of the "unlawful means, too great to be overcome?" Is it not the marshal? And must not the judge certify, upon his information? Should he choose, in the plenitude of his great wisdom and caution, to consider an assemblage of the good people of Charleston, at the circus, convened to express resolutions on federal relations as "unlawful means, too great to be overcome," and should they not disperse upon the coming of the proclamation, what is to hinder the army and navy from doing their deeds of death upon this unoffending people? Sir, the power is too tremendous to be given to any one man that ever did or ever will live upon this earth, especially in times like these, of personal passion, party prejudice, and powerful excitement. I would not grant it to the President, even if he could be personally present, with all his peculiar moderation and love of peace, to judge of the "unlawful means" himself, much less a partisan marshal, bent upon the triumph of his party, even at the expense of the lives of his adversaries, a passion which has not been without its manifest exhibition, even within these walls.

Mr. ISAACS, of Tennessee, said: I will advance such reasons as occur to me, and which I have not heard given by others, why this bill ought, at this time, to be passed. I can truly say that I rejoice with those who do rejoice, that, by the passage of the bill for the reduction of the tariff, the olive branch of peace has been extended to the discontented people of the South, and nothing could have afforded me more pleasure than to find it acceptable (so far as we can judge) to Southern members, and that, I admit, gives a great degree of assurance that it will be satisfactory to their constituents; and some have expressed their belief that it would, while others have doubted. But they cannot give, neither can we receive from them a pledge that it will be accepted. Though much has been conceded, still it stops short of the demands of South Carolina, and may be rejected. God grant it may not. But are our laws such light and empty things that they are to be observed or resisted at pleasure? After what South Carolina has already done, after she has left nothing undone that could render resistance effectual, shall we leave every thing to chance, and do nothing to counteract their operations, by providing the means for the effectual execution of our laws? If, contrary to all our hopes, Congress should adjourn, and our new tariff law share the fate of the former, unless this bill become a law, the work of nullification and secession would then go on triumphantly. But what would the country say of us? We should have to meet the just reproaches of our constituents, and be convinced, when it was too late, that we had been too confiding, that we had risked every thing, and lost all that our inaction could lose. The ordinance of South Carolina has at one sweep pronounced our whole system of revenue laws null and void, and declared a conditional secession from the Union; and her legislative acts have carried out the scheme. Now, I will not stop to dispute whether all this can be (as they call it) a peaceable remedy, or what is meant by nullification and secession. In the plain English definition and common sense view of their proceedings, I pronounce them to be revolutionary in their character and tendencies. And who will peril the safety of the country upon the uncertainty of their going backward rather than forward? Our acquaintance with human nature and the history of ages, even farther back than the time of Lord Somers, should remind us that when the elements of society are agitated, disturbed, and shaken asunder, as when the fountains of the great deep are broken up, they are not readily quieted and confined, and often defy all bounds. And it sometimes happens that those who start foremost in the career, either of revolution or reform, are outrun, and even run over, and left far behind by their more ardent and reckless followers.

This may, or may not, come to pass in South Carolina. There is in that State perhaps more talent than in any other in proportion to their number of free inhabitants; but I have seen and read enough from there to convince me that there are amongst them many bold, impatient, and ambitious spirits, who, for aught I know, may think some of their present leaders too moderate and easily satisfied; especially if they could get the lead themselves. In speaking of the nullification party collectively, as I do, I must not be understood to say that they are bad men; far from it; I have seen enough of human nature to learn that, under the influence of high excitement, surrounded and propelled by concurring circumstances, good men will often go to as great excesses and commit as great errors as bad men; and the difference between them can only be found in the motives by which they are actuated. But it may be said that all this is mere speculation, from which no certain results can be shown. Be it so. In providing the means of security, it is not necessary that the danger should be inevitable. We know the threatening position which they have taken; they may proceed to put in practice what they have put on parchment. That is enough for us to know. If with this knowledge we refuse to act, we make ourselves answerable for the consequences.

Mr. Speaker, I have adverted to future probabilities, merely in connection with the realities of the present and the past; and, upon the strength of these realities, I shall insist that if we would vindicate the authority and honor of the Government, we have no choice but to pass this bill. How stand the facts? South Carolina, in the highest attitude she could assume, and in the most decisive form, has ordained that all the revenue laws of this Government are null and void, and shall not be carried into effect within her limits. That the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act, which this House a few years ago, by a large majority, very properly, as I think, refused to repeal, shall have no effect in that State. And, upon certain conditions, amounting to this, that if she is prevented from making effectual resistance to the laws, she will no longer be a member of this Union, but will forthwith proceed to form a separate and independent Government. This ordinance of the convention has been fully carried out and adapted to practical purposes by the enactments of the Legislature. And, to complete the work, a large military force is provided, companies, regiments, and it might not be going too far to say, armies, are organized, equipped, and ready for the field. We learn, also, that they have mounted the blue cockade. I wonder how it came to be blue. I have heard of blue laws and blue lights, of the blue bells of Scotland, and the bonnets of blue; but I never before heard of blue cockades! But, without respect to color, it is a badge of hostility—an emblem of war.

[Mr. McDUFFIE denied the flag.]

I return, said Mr. ISAACS, to the far weightier matters; the ordinance, the statutes, the military preparations. These are undeniable, and here I will hold. How long these are to abide, we know not; but this we know, that they now exist in all their force and vigor. And shall these measures of resistance and defiance be taken in the face of the American people, and the world, and meet with no rebuke? Shall nothing be done that will tell to all, now and hereafter, what is the sense of the nation on this procedure? We cannot do less than provide adequate means to counteract the progress of nullification, if it is persisted in; and if it is not, so much the better, our act will then be inoperative.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, followed:—I repeat now, what I have said again and again, that I shall regard the rejection of this

H. OF R.]

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

bill as a negative sanction of nullification, and an indirect rebuke of the Union party in South Carolina. I have not asked this, or any other measure, for the personal safety of the Union party: I have repeatedly disclaimed it, entirely and unconditionally. We ask not personal protection: we would suffer annihilation before we would invoke aid in that respect. But we think there is something due to our character and feelings. And I submit it to the candid consideration of this House whether it would be generous or politic to make a "scapegoat" of the "Union party," to bear away the sins of nullification to the wilderness, in order to conciliate the disorganizers in South Carolina. Suppose you do so on this occasion, what encouragement would an orderly, well-disposed minority in a refractory State have to stand up for the dignity of this Government, and the execution of its laws in a coming day? Could you expect such a minority in a rebellious State to hazard their personal liberty, their lives and fortunes, to subject themselves to civil and political disfranchisement, to obloquy and reproach, and to peril their all, as the Union party in South Carolina have done, in defence of the Union, and the institutions of the country? No, sir, you could not expect it. They would remind you of the fate of the "Union party" in South Carolina. I can assure the gentleman from North Carolina, and I assure this House, that the duty now imposed on me in relation to this bill, is far from being a pleasant one. It will be remembered that, at the commencement of the session, I asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the Military Committee, of which I was a member. I did this under an impression that possibly it might become the duty of that committee to recommend some coercive means to counteract the rash measures of the ruling party in the State from which I came. Had I remained a member of that committee, I could not oppose any proposition that might be deemed necessary for putting down nullification and its concomitant measures, without indirectly aiding and abetting what I consider a rebellious proceeding, or, at least a proceeding of rebellious tendency; and it was repugnant to my feelings to assist, as a member of a committee, in recommending to this House any measures or means of coercion against the misguided State of South Carolina. I was unwilling to subject myself to the appearance, or to the reproaches even of the nullifiers, of aiding to inflict blows on the State which I in part represent. The public interest and safety did not require that I should make that sacrifice of feeling. My place on the committee could be easily, perhaps advantageously, supplied, without detriment to the action of this House, or injury to the public service. But now the case is different; I feel myself differently situated. I am called upon, not only as a representative of South Carolina, but as a representative of the American people, to discharge a solemn and conscientious duty, which cannot be performed by a substitute. Here is an unpleasant duty to be performed, which cannot be evaded by referring it to a committee of which I am not a member. The question presents itself to this House, and is not to be blinked by any member here unless he proves recreant to the trust reposed in him. I have come to the conclusion, some time since, that it is my bounden duty to vote for this bill, and I shall not shrink from the responsibility of doing so, be the consequences to myself what they may. Were I to vote against this bill, I should consider myself as giving an indirect sanction to nullification, secession, and all the absurdities which accompany these political heresies. It is impossible, therefore, that I should vote against the bill; and to withhold my vote, would be nearly equivalent to my negation of the bill.

THURSDAY, February 28.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed the consideration of the revenue collection bill.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said: It is not to be disguised that this is an administration measure; it comes to us not only approved, but asked for by the Executive; and, therefore, as a friend of the administration, it would have given me great pleasure to have been able to yield it my feeble support. But, however high my respect for the President and his constitutional advisers, I cannot sustain their policy at the sacrifice of my own principles and opinions. I shall never be so much the partisan or friend of any man as to surrender the honest convictions of my own judgment. In opposing, however, the recommendations of the President with regard to South Carolina, I take the occasion to disclaim any imputation whatever on his motives. In the integrity of his motives and the purity of his patriotism, I have the utmost confidence—quite as much, certainly, as many gentlemen around me who are so zealously sustaining these recommendations.

I owe it to myself, Mr. Speaker, also to say that I do not appear here as the advocate of South Carolina. I do not approve her recent measures. Do not imagine, however, that I am about to join in those unmeasured censures and denunciations which have been so lavishly bestowed upon her. No, sir; this is a crusade in which I shall be among the last to enlist; it is an enterprise which presents no temptations to my ambition; it is a field in which I shall gather no laurels. Sir, South Carolina is the natural ally, the sister of Georgia. Her gallant sons are our neighbors, our brethren, our fellow-sufferers; and, while disapproving their acts, I can most truly say, that "with all their faults I love them still."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill will be another deep (God grant it may not be a fatal) stab to the constitution. And really I had hoped that its already mangled body would have protected it from further outrage. The condition to which your repeated attacks have reduced it, is sufficient, it might be supposed, to disarm even its most vindictive enemies. Let me entreat you, then, to stay the uplifted arm, and withhold, it may be, the finishing blow. Sir, had I the power, like Mark Antony, "I would put a tongue in every wound" which your ill-judged legislation has made, to implore your forbearance.

Revenue Collection Bill—Nullification.

To those around me who have recently evinced so much zeal in the cause of the constitution, and affected so much anxiety to save it from sacrilegious hands, I particularly appeal. I especially invoke the aid of an honorable gentleman, (Mr. VINTON, of Ohio,) who, a few evenings ago, in the fervency of his patriotism, was ready to see all our rivers running with blood, and this great confederacy converted into one vast slaughter-house, rather than have one tittle of the constitution obliterated by force. And, sir, had I but a small portion of that powerful and commanding eloquence, which I heard on a recent occasion,* in another place, in the anticipation of dangers to this sacred instrument, "calling on all the people to its rescue," in a tone and manner which I can never forget, and which filled me with emotions too big for utterance—I repeat, sir, did I possess a particle of his overpowering eloquence, I would call in loud strains, not upon "all the people," but upon these their representatives, in this hour of imminent peril, to come to the aid of the constitution, and save it from the danger which threatens it, from specious and subtle construction. For if it must fall, it matters little whether by the hand of violence, or by the unperceived and undermining process of ingenious and plausible sophistry. I would, indeed, prefer the attack by open violence, because then we could see the extent of the danger, and might prepare to encounter it.

But, Mr. Speaker, the first section of this bill further provides that, to enable the collector more effectually to exact the payment of cash duties, as proposed, he shall seize and detain all vessels and cargoes until the duties are paid; and in the event of an attempt to take such vessels or cargoes from the possession of the collector by any force, combination, or assemblage of individuals, or by any process other than from a court of the United States, the President, or such person as he shall empower for that purpose, may employ such part of the land and naval forces, or militia of the United States, as may be necessary to prevent the removal of the vessels or cargoes from the possession of the officers of the customs, &c.

Sir, that proneness to resist the exercise of all powers not delegated to us, of which the House has had some evidence, prompted me, when a proposition was made to confer power so great, and of such dangerous tendency, to consult again the charter under which we act. On examining, with great care, I find in the constitution that "Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." The very object of the bill on your table is, to enable the President to execute the laws. Now, I will not say that, in extreme cases, when no other means could be available, Congress might not, under the power to "pass all laws necessary" to carry the granted powers into effect, resort to the regular army and navy; but I will say that the very provision for calling forth the militia shows very clearly, that in the view of the framers of the constitution, the execution of the laws, if military force should be necessary, should be left to the militia, the yeomanry of the country. Our ancestors, in their difficulties with the mother country, had learned a lesson as to the enforcement of laws by the aid of a standing army, from which they seem to have profited; and they confided this dangerous trust to those who were most deeply interested in a faithful, but mild execution of the laws—the great body of the people. And, upon the legal maxim, that "the inclusion of one is the exclusion of all others," the provision for calling forth the militia to execute the laws, excludes the idea that any other force was contemplated for this purpose.

That this was the view of those who were concerned in the formation of the constitution, is plainly inferrible, from the fact that the first laws passed for the suppression of insurrections in 1792 and 1795, were entitled acts "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion," in the very words of the constitutional provision.

But, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the present attitude of South Carolina does not furnish such a case as was contemplated by the constitution, where the laws were to be executed even by the militia. There is no "insurrection" there, within the meaning of the constitution, nor is there such a "combination to obstruct the execution of the laws" as contemplated by the acts of 1792 and 1795. Whatever proceeding is had under the ordinance of South Carolina is the act of a sovereign State—it is the exercise of sovereign power. Whether this right belongs to the State, it is not necessary, for the purpose of this argument, to inquire. She claims it, and has exercised it, and any act done under the authority of the State, will be protected by the State. To attempt, therefore, to reduce individuals, acting under this authority, to obedience to your laws, will be an attempt to coerce the State—it will be making war upon the State. And this power, as stated in the report of the Judiciary Committee, and as all who have read the journals of the Federal Convention know, was several times proposed to be given to Congress, but uniformly rejected. But, on this point, I shall adhere to the course pursued by the committee. I will not be drawn into a discussion of the right of this Government to make war upon one of the States. Far, far distant be the day when such an inquiry shall become necessary.

But it is said by my colleague, (Mr. WAYNE,) and the suggestion has been made by others, that we have no assurance that South Carolina will repeal her ordinance, or that she will not nullify the tariff law which we now pass, as she has those of 1828 and 1832. Sir, let us be candid with ourselves on this occasion. It is indeed possible that this may be the case; but does any one believe it will be? At the intercession of a sister State, the convention by which this ordinance was passed, have been ordered to reassemble; and it is notorious that the object of this reassembling is to suspend the operation of the nullifying laws until the close of the next session of Congress. This, too, let it be remembered, was done at a time when all hope of a modification of the tariff by this Congress had been nearly extinguished. With these facts before us, then, and with the still more striking fact that every Senator and Representative in Congress from South Carolina has voted for this modification, where is the man who can for a moment indulge a serious apprehension that that State will attempt to arrest the operation of the law? If there be a member of this House who does really entertain such apprehensions, I have some curiosity to know him. It will certainly entitle him to a distinction which he should not lose the opportunity of acquiring, and I will, therefore, pause to see if there be one who will make the avowal. [Mr. F. here paused, but no gentleman rising, he proceeded:] As I expected—a death-like silence! No, sir, there is not an intelligent man here or elsewhere, who entertains a reasonable doubt that South Carolina will not acquiesce in the compromise which has been effected.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is further argued that unless we pass the bill now on your table, the modification of the tariff will have the appearance of concession—a yielding to the demands of South Carolina—that it will seem as though the General Government had been bullied into measures. At the same time, it is admitted that the complaints of the South are just, and ought to be redressed. Sir, I have been more than astonished at the frequent repetition of this objection during this session. What, sir, is the legislation of the American Congress to be governed and regulated by such fastidiousness? How many a noble and gallant spirit has met an untimely fate under the misguidance of these false notions of honor! refusing to make just reparation—to atone for an injury, because a challenge had been given! And yet we, to whose hands are confided, in an eminent degree, the destinies of fifteen millions of people, are prepared to resign their high and important interests—nay, to stake the very existence of the Union upon this delusive idea! Sir, how long before we shall be able to sink the feelings of the man in the noble and elevated and enlarged views of the statesman?

Gentlemen tell us, however that, by decisive measures on the part of the Federal Government, all opposition to its authority will be put down, and the majesty of the laws vindicated. How soon we forget the teaching of history and experience! What instructive lessons do they give us as to the consequences, in national as well as individual quarrels, of a course of menace on one hand, and defiance on the other! Collisions and violence have scarcely ever failed to be the result. But we are told, with a triumphant, if not an unfeeling air, that it will be an easy matter to put down South Carolina; that the President has assured us that the laws shall be executed, and his character is a sufficient guaranty for the redemption of the pledge. All this may be very probable. From the accounts we have of popular meetings, and the numerous offers of patriotic volunteers to enlist in this glorious enterprise, you have certainly little cause to doubt your success. But how would you enjoy it, when purchased at the expense of the blood of your valiant and chivalrous Southern brethren? Who would rush madly on to crush even what some consider a rebellion, when the lives of hundreds of our own countrymen must be the cost? Sir, I envy no man his feelings, who can either boast of such an anticipated victory, or could exult in the bloody achievement.

But do you not run the hazard of provoking the other Southern States to take part with South Carolina? Much as they disapprove her course, the origin of this controversy is common to them all; there is an identity of interest and of oppression, which is rapidly producing an identity of feeling. Sir, are not the present indications sufficient to warn gentlemen? Do not the unquiet state and feverish excitement in many parts of the Southern country admonish you of what may follow the first act of violence? Sir, once kindle this fire in the South, and who shall extinguish it? Excite the resentment and passions of a gallant and high-spirited people, and who shall control them? Raise the tempest, and who shall allay it, or calculate its ravages? Where is the master spirit that "can ride on the whirlwind, and direct the storm?" What hand shall chain the billows of the raging ocean? Believe me, sir, these are not the suggestions of an excited imagination. Violent and oppressive measures in other countries have generally resulted in convulsions and civil wars; and beware that you do not make the history of your own a mere transcript from their records.

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, demanded the previous question, which was seconded—Yeas 103.

The previous question was then put, as follows: "Shall the main question now be put?" and carried.

The main question was accordingly put—"Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time?" and determined as follows:

SATURDAY, March 2.

Bank of the United States.

The following resolution, reported yesterday by the Committee of Ways and Means, coming up for consideration,

“Resolved, That the Government deposits may, in the opinion of the House, be safely continued in the Bank of the United States:”

[On this resolution an animated debate took place, in which Messrs. Polk, Wickliffe, Ingersoll of Connecticut, and McDuffie, were the principal speakers; and the question being put, on the adoption of the resolution, it was carried by the following vote:]

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Appleton, Arnold, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, Noyes Barber, John S. Barbour, Barnwell, Barringer, Barstow, Isaac C. So the House resolved that the Government deposits may, in the opinion of the House, be safely continued in the Bank of the United States.

The House then took a recess from 4 to 6 o'clock.

Evening Session.

Mr. HOWARD moved the following resolution, (Mr. TAYLOR having been temporarily called to the chair by the Speaker:)

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Hon. ANDREW STEVENSON, Speaker, for the fairness, dignity, skill, and impartiality, with which he has discharged the duties of the chair, during the twenty-second Congress.

The question being put, the resolution was passed nem. con.

Mr. SEVIER moved to go into committee on three bills for territorial objects. The yeas and nays were called, and it appeared that only 90 members answered to their names.

From this time until near 5 o'clock, successive attempts were made to obtain a quorum to vote on different motions, but in vain.

At a little before 5 o'clock, a motion was made to appoint a joint committee on the part of the House, to join a committee on the part of the Senate, to inform the President that the two Houses were ready to adjourn.

The question was put, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 70, nays 19.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, and Mr. POLK, were appointed the committee; and in a short time after, they returned, and reported that the President had no further communication to make to Congress.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the House adjourned sine die.

The SPEAKER then rose, and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: I pray you to accept my grateful acknowledgments for this renewed expression of confidence and approbation, in the discharge of the official duties of this high office.

I receive it in the same spirit of kindness in which I flatter myself it has been offered, and shall cherish it with feelings of profound respect, and the deepest gratitude. For the last six years it has been your pleasure that the arduous duties of this chair should be assigned to me.

This whole period of service has, as you well know, gentlemen, been distinguished by events well calculated to render this station one of more than ordinary labor and responsibility.

I have zealously and faithfully endeavored to meet this responsibility, and I hope I shall not be deemed arrogant when I say, that I feel a proud consciousness that the duties of this high trust have been discharged by me with a single eye to the character and dignity of this House, the interest of my country, and my own honor.

That I have often erred, I most readily admit; but they have been errors of rule and principle, not caprice or passion; and if there has been any apparent rigor or harshness in the Chair, you will do me the justice to believe that it was unintentional and indiscriminate.

If, gentlemen, in moments of excitement and commotion, any thing unkind has occurred between myself and the individual members of the House, let me assure you it has long since passed from my memory, and been forgiven and forgotten.

I have no injuries to complain of, and no memory for them, if they existed, and I shall part with you all this night in the spirit of peace and good will.

Before we separate, gentlemen, will you pardon me for a moment in offering a single suggestion?

Our councils of late have been greatly divided, and their harmony and peace disturbed.

Our country has been deeply and painfully excited, and the safety and security of the Union itself threatened.

May we not all now hope that the causes of excitement are hourly subsiding and passing off? That peace and harmony and brotherly affection will soon shed their holy, calm, and blessed influences around us; and that our beloved country will again become united, peaceful, and happy?

In assuming this station, some years ago, I took the liberty of then expressing to the House a sentiment which I had long cherished, and which I now seize this fit occasion of repeating from this chair. It is this: that our confederated republic can only safely exist under the influence of wise, equal, and just laws; by the ties of common interests and brotherly affection; a spirit of mutual forbearance and moderation, (collectively and individually,) and by cherishing a devotion to that liberty and Union secured to us by the blood of our common fathers. These are the stable foundations upon which our liberties and free institutions can alone rest; and God grant they may be eternal. This, gentlemen, in all human probability, is the moment of separation with many, very many of us, forever. Is there one individual present to whose bosom a final separation from those with whom he has been so long and intimately associated, will not cast a painful and bitter pang? If there be, I confess I envy not his feelings.

You will carry with you, gentlemen, my cordial and best wishes for your individual prosperity and happiness, and I pray you to receive this my most affectionate, and, possibly, last farewell.

The SPEAKER then adjourned the House sine die.

his intention to offer any opinion on the merits of the course which had been adopted by the State of Rhode Island, but merely to say, that it seemed to him to be a matter of course that the Senator first elected, and whose credentials were presented at the last session of the Senate, should be permitted to approach the chair and take the oath; and that the other gentleman, who contests the election of Mr. ROBBINS, should present his credentials either to the Committee on Elections, or the Committee on the Judiciary, and that the Senate should afterwards receive the report of that committee, and determine which of the gentlemen is duly elected. But he was not prepared at this time to question the election of the gentleman whose credentials were before the Senate at the last session, until a committee of the Senate should have decided that he was not fairly elected. He was not prepared at present to offer an opinion on these points, but he thought that the Senator in his seat should approach and take the oath.

He then moved that Mr. ROBBINS do take the customary oath.

Mr. CLAY suggested the propriety of making the collateral motion, that the credentials of Mr. POTTER be laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, it was then ordered that the credentials of Mr. POTTER do lie on the table.

Mr. ROBBINS then took the oath.

Death of Senator Buckner.

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, submitted a resolution proposing the usual mourning in honor of the memory of Hon. R. A. BUCKNER, late a Senator from Missouri; which was read and agreed to.

Death of Senator Josias Stoddard Johnston.

Mr. CLAY then rose and said, that the adoption of this resolution reminded him of a severe loss which the public and he himself had sustained since the last session, and concerning which he did not now deem himself qualified to speak. He felt regret that the gentleman had not been able yet to take his seat, on whom it would more properly have devolved to submit the motion which he now proposed to offer. He desired to call the attention of the Senate to the melancholy death of a member of this body, who had been summoned away since they last met together, under circumstances of the most distressing nature. He was a man who possessed the rare quality of making a favorable impression on all persons who knew him, and who never failed, on acquaintance, to conciliate the esteem both of friends and of opponents; for whenever he fought, he fought manfully, but always afterwards cherished the kindest feelings towards those who had been his adversaries. During the last summer, perhaps all the members of the Senate had had reason to regret some bereavements, and none more than himself. In the course of it, a pestilential disease had traversed his neighborhood, and swept off many valuable citizens, among whom he numbered some of his oldest friends and acquaintances. So it had been in other parts of the country; but, amidst all this desolation, there had occurred no instance of individual loss more afflicting to him, nor more to be lamented on the public account, than that of the Senator from Louisiana.

With feelings oppressed with pain, he rose to ask the Senate to adopt a resolution similar to that which had just been agreed to, in reference to the late Senator JOHNSTON. No man in the country had attended more ardently and more faithfully to his public duties, or had brought to their discharge a more clear, enlightened, and determined judgment. No man ever more happily united blandness and affability with firmness and decision. None could be more true and faithful to friends, nor more courteous and respectful towards opponents. This expression, he hoped, would be permitted from a heart which had bled profusely when the tidings of this afflicting event reached him, amidst the wrecks which the pestilence had scattered around him.

He had not expected to be called on to offer this resolution, but he trusted that it would be received, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. C. then submitted his resolution, which was unanimously agreed to.

TUESDAY, December 8.

The annual Message was received from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

On your assembling to perform the high trusts which the people of the United States have confided to you, of legislating for their common welfare, it gives me pleasure to congratulate you upon the happy condition of our beloved country. By the favor of Divine Providence, health is again restored to us: peace reigns within our borders: abundance crowns the labors of our fields: commerce and domestic industry flourish and increase: and individual happiness rewards the private virtue and enterprise of our citizens.

Our condition abroad is no less honorable than it is prosperous at home. Seeking nothing that is not right, and determined to submit to nothing that is wrong, but desiring honest friendships and liberal intercourse with all nations, the United States have gained throughout the world the confidence and respect which are due to a policy so just, and so congenial to the character of the American people, and to the spirit of their institutions.

In bringing to your notice the particular state of our foreign affairs, it affords me high gratification to inform you that they are in a condition which promises the continuance of friendship with all nations.

With Great Britain the interesting question of our North-eastern boundary remains still undecided. A negotiation, however, upon that subject, has been renewed since the close of the last Congress, and a proposition has been submitted to the British Government, with the view of establishing, in conformity with the resolution of the Senate, the line designated by the treaty of 1783. Though no definitive answer has been received, it may be daily looked for, and I entertain a hope that the overture may ultimately lead to a satisfactory adjustment of this important matter.

Message of the President of the United States.

[SENATE.]

I have the satisfaction to inform you that a negotiation which, by desire of the House of Representatives, was opened, some years ago, with the British Government, for the erection of light-houses on the Bahamas, has been successful. Those works, when completed, together with those which the United States have constructed on the western side of the Gulf of Florida, will contribute essentially to the safety of navigation in that sea. This joint participation in establishments interesting to humanity and beneficial to commerce, is worthy of two enlightened nations, and indicates feelings which cannot fail to have a happy influence upon their political relations. It is gratifying to the friends of both to perceive that the intercourse between the two people is becoming daily more extensive, and that sentiments of mutual good will have grown up, besetting their common origin, justifying the hope that, by wise counsels on each side, not only unsettled questions may be satisfactorily terminated, but new causes of misunderstanding prevented.

Notwithstanding that I continue to receive the most amicable assurances from the Government of France, and that in all other respects the most friendly relations exist between the United States and that Government, it is to be regretted that the stipulations of the convention concluded on the 4th of July, 1831, remain, in some important parts, unfulfilled.

By the second article of that convention, it was stipulated that the sum payable to the United States should be paid at Paris, in six annual instalments, into the hands of such person or persons as should be authorized by the Government of the United States to receive it; and by the same article the first instalment was payable on the second day of February, 1833. By the act of Congress of the 18th July, 1832, it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the several instalments, with the interest thereon, to be received from the French Government, and transferred to the United States, in such manner as he may deem best; and by the same act of Congress, the stipulations on the part of the United States, in the convention, were, in all respects, fulfilled. Not doubting that a treaty thus made and ratified by the two Governments, and faithfully executed by the United States, would be promptly complied with by the other party, and desiring to avoid the risk and expense of intermediate agencies, the Secretary of the Treasury deemed it advisable to receive and transfer the first instalment by means of a draft upon the French minister of Finance. A draft for this purpose was accordingly drawn in favor of the cashier of the Bank of the United States, for the amount accruing to the United States out of the first instalment, and the interest payable with it. This bill was not drawn at Washington until five days after the instalment was payable at Paris, and was accompanied by a special authority from the President, authorizing the cashier, or his assigns, to receive the amount. The mode thus adopted of receiving the instalment, was officially made known to the French Government by the American chargé d'affaires at Paris, pursuant to instructions from the Department of State. The bill, however, though not presented for payment until the 23d day of March, was not paid, and for the reason assigned by the French minister of Finance, that no appropriation had been made by the French Chambers. It is not known to me that, up to that period, any appropriation had been required of the Chambers; and although a communication was subsequently made to the Chambers by direction of the King, recommending that the necessary provision should be made for carrying the convention into effect, it was at an advanced period of the session, and the subject was finally postponed until the next meeting of the Chambers.

Notwithstanding it has been supposed by the French ministry that the financial stipulations of the treaty cannot be carried into effect without an appropriation by the Chambers, it appears to me to be not only consistent with the character of France, but due to the character of both Governments, as well as to the rights of our citizens, to treat the convention, made and ratified in proper form, as pledging the good faith of the French Government for its execution, and as imposing upon each department an obligation to fulfil it; and I have received assurances through our chargé d'affaires at Paris, and the French minister plenipotentiary at Washington, and more recently through the minister of the United States at Paris, that the delay has not proceeded from any indisposition on the part of the King and his ministers to fulfil the treaty, and that measures will be presented at the next meeting of the Chambers, and with a reasonable hope of success, to obtain the necessary appropriation.

It is necessary to state, however, that the documents, except certain lists of vessels captured, condemned, or burnt at sea, proper to facilitate the examination and liquidation of the reclamations comprised in the stipulations of the convention, and which, by the sixth article, France engaged to communicate to the United States by the intermediary of the legation, (though repeatedly applied for by the American chargé d'affaires under instructions from this Government,) have not yet been communicated; and this delay, it is apprehended, will necessarily prevent the completion of the duties assigned to the commissioners within the time at present prescribed by law.

The reasons for delaying to communicate these documents have not been explicitly stated, and this is the more to be regretted as it is not understood that the interposition of the Chambers is in any manner required for the delivery of those papers.

Under these circumstances, in a case so important to the interests of our citizens and to the character of our country, and under disappointments so unexpected, I deemed it my duty, however I might respect the general assurances to which I have adverted, no longer to delay the appointment of a minister plenipotentiary to Paris, but to despatch him in season to communicate the result of his application to the French Government at an early period of your session. I accordingly appointed a distinguished citizen for this purpose, who proceeded on his mission in August last, and was presented to the King early in the month of October. He is particularly instructed as to all matters connected with the present posture of affairs, and I indulge the hope that, with the representations he is instructed to make, and from the disposition manifested by the King and his ministers in their recent assurances to our minister at Paris, the subject will be early considered and satisfactorily disposed of at the next meeting of the Chambers.

As this subject involves important interests, and has attracted a considerable share of the public attention, I have deemed it proper to make this explicit statement of its actual condition; and should I be disappointed in the hope now entertained, the subject will be again brought to the notice of Congress in such a manner as the occasion may require.

The friendly relations which have always been maintained between the United States and Russia have been further extended and strengthened by the treaty of navigation and commerce concluded on the 6th of December last, and sanctioned by the Senate before the close of its last session. The ratifications having been since exchanged, the liberal provisions of the treaty are now in full force; and, under the encouragement which they have secured, a flourishing and increasing commerce, yielding its benefits to the enterprise of both nations, affords to each the just recompense of wise measures, and adds new motives for that mutual friendship which the two countries have hitherto cherished towards each other.

It affords me peculiar satisfaction to state that the Government of Spain has at length yielded to the justice of the claims which have been so long urged in behalf of our citizens, and has expressed a willingness to provide an indemnification as soon as the proper amount can be agreed upon. Upon this latter point, it is probable that an understanding had taken place between the minister of the United States and the Spanish Government before the decease of the late King of Spain; and, unless that event may have delayed its completion, there is reason to hope that it may be in my power to announce to you, early in your present session, the conclusion of a convention upon terms not less favorable than those entered into for similar objects with other nations. That act of justice would well accord with the character of Spain, and is due to the United States from their ancient friend. It could not fail to strengthen the sentiments of amity and good-will between the two nations, which it is so much the wish of the United States to cherish, and so truly the interest of both to maintain.

By the first section of an act of Congress passed on the 18th July, 1832, the tonnage duty on Spanish ships arriving from the ports of Spain was limited to the duty payable on American vessels in the ports of Spain, previous to the 20th October, 1817, being five cents per ton. That act was intended to give effect, on our side, to an arrangement made with the Spanish Government, by which discriminating duties of tonnage were to be abolished in the ports of the United States and Spain on the vessels of the two nations. Pursuant to that arrangement, which was carried into effect, on the part of Spain, on the 20th of May, 1832, by a royal order dated the 29th April, 1832, American vessels in the ports of Spain have paid five cents per ton, which rate of duty is also paid in those ports by Spanish ships; but, as American vessels pay no tonnage duty in the ports of the United States, the duty of five cents payable in our ports by Spanish vessels, under the act above mentioned, is really a discriminating duty, operating to the disadvantage of Spain. Though no complaint has yet been made on the part of Spain, we are not the less bound by the obligations of good faith to remove the discrimination; and I recommend that the act be amended accordingly. As the royal order, above alluded to, includes the ports of the Balearic and Canary Islands, as well as those of Spain, it would seem that the provisions of the act of Congress should be equally extensive, and that, for the repayment of such duties as may have been improperly received, an addition should be made to the sum appropriated at the last session of Congress for refunding discriminating duties.

As the arrangement referred to, however, did not embrace the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, discriminating duties, to the prejudice of American shipping, continued to be levied there. From the extent of the commerce carried on between the United States and those islands, (particularly the former,) this discrimination causes serious injury to one of those great national interests which it has been considered an essential part of our policy to cherish, and has given rise to complaints on the part of our merchants. Under instructions given to our minister at Madrid, earnest representations have been made by him to the Spanish Government upon this subject, and there is reason to expect, from the friendly disposition which is entertained towards this country, that a beneficial change will be produced. The disadvantage, however, to which our shipping is subjected by the operation of these discriminating duties, requires that they be met by suitable countervailing duties during the present session—power being, at the same time, vested in the President to modify or discontinue them as the discriminating duties on American vessels or their cargoes may be modified or discontinued at those islands. Intimations have been given to the Spanish Government that the United States may be obliged to resort to such measures as are of necessary self-defence, and there is no reason to apprehend that it would be unfavorably received. The proposed proceedings, if adopted, would not be permitted, however, in any degree to induce a relaxation in the efforts of our minister to effect a repeal of this irregularity by friendly negotiation, and it might serve to give force to his representations by showing the dangers to which that valuable trade is exposed by the obstructions and burdens which a system of discriminating and countervailing duties necessarily produces.

The selection and preparation of the Florida archives, for the purpose of being delivered over to the United States, in conformity with the royal order, as mentioned in my last annual message, though in progress, has not yet been completed. This delay has been produced partly by causes which were unavoidable, particularly the prevalence of cholera at Havana; but measures have been taken which it is believed will expedite the delivery of those important records.

Congress were informed, at the opening of the last session, that, "owing, as was alleged, to embarrassments in the finances of Portugal, consequent upon the civil war in which that nation was engaged," payment had been made of only one instalment of the amount which the Portuguese Government had stipulated to pay for indemnifying our citizens for property illegally captured in the blockade of Terceira. Since that time, a postponement for two years, with interest, of the two remaining instalments, was requested by the Portuguese Government; and, as a consideration, it offered to stipulate that rice of the United States should be admitted into Portugal at the same duties as Brazilian rice. Being satisfied that no better arrangement could be made, my consent was given; and a royal order of the King of Portugal was accordingly issued on the 4th of February last for the reduction of the duty on rice of the United States. It would give me great pleasure if, in speaking of that country, in whose prosperity the United States are so much interested, and with whom a long subsisting, extensive, and mutually advantageous commercial intercourse has strengthened the relations of friendship, I could announce to you the restoration of its internal tranquillity.

Subsequently to the commencement of the last session of Congress, the final instalment payable by Denmark, under the convention of the 28th day of March, 1830, was received. The commissioners for examining the claims have since terminated their labors, and their awards have been paid at the Treasury as they have been called for. The justice rendered to our citizens by that Government is thus completed, and a pledge is thereby afforded for the maintenance of that friendly intercourse becoming the relations that the two nations mutually bear to each other.

It is satisfactory to inform you that the Danish Government have recently issued an ordinance by which the commerce with the island of St. Croix is placed on a more liberal footing than heretofore. This change cannot fail to prove beneficial to the trade between the United States and that colony; and the advantages likely to flow from it may lead to greater relaxations in the colonial systems of other nations.

The ratifications of the convention with the King of the Two Sicilies have been duly exchanged, and the commissioners appointed for examining the claims under it have entered upon the duties assigned to them by law. The friendship that the interests of the two nations require of them being now established, it may be hoped that each will enjoy the benefits which a liberal commerce should yield to both.

A treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Belgium was concluded during the last winter, and received the sanction of the Senate; but the exchange of the ratifications has been hitherto delayed, in consequence, in the first instance, of some delay in the reception of the treaty at Brussels, and, subsequently, of the absence of the Belgian minister of Foreign Affairs, at the important conferences in which his Government is engaged at London. That treaty does but embody those enlarged principles of friendly policy which, it is sincerely hoped, will always regulate the conduct of the two nations, having such strong motives to maintain amicable relations toward each other, and so sincerely desirous to cherish them.

With all the other European powers with whom the United States have formed diplomatic relations, and with the Sublime Porte, the best understanding prevails. From all, I continue to receive assurances of good will towards the United States—assurances which it gives me no less pleasure to reciprocate than to receive. With all, the engagements which have been entered into are fulfilled with good faith on both sides. Measures have also been taken to enlarge our friendly relations and extend our commercial intercourse with other States. The system we have pursued of aiming at no exclusive advantages, of dealing with all on terms of fair and equal reciprocity, and of adhering scrupulously to all our engagements, is well calculated to give success to efforts intended to be mutually beneficial.

The wars of which the southern part of this continent was so long the theatre, and which were carried on either by the mother country against the States which had formerly been her colonies, or by the States against each other, having terminated, and their civil dissensions having so far subsided, as, with few exceptions, no longer to disturb the public tranquillity, it is earnestly hoped those States will be able to employ themselves without interruption in perfecting their institutions, cultivating the arts of peace, and promoting, by wise counsels and able exertions, the public and private prosperity which their patriotic struggles so well entitle them to enjoy.

With those States our relations have undergone but little change during the present year. No reunion having yet taken place between the States which composed the Republic of Colombia, our chargé d'affaires at Bogota has been accredited to the Government of New Granada, and we have, therefore, no diplomatic relations with Venezuela and Ecuador, except as they may be included in those heretofore formed with the Colombian Republic. It is understood that representatives from the three States were about to assemble at Bogota, to confer on the subject of their mutual interests, particularly that of their union; and if the result should render it necessary, measures will be taken on our part to preserve with each that friendship and those liberal commercial connections which it has been the constant desire of the United States to cultivate with their sister republics of this hemisphere. Until the important question of reunion shall be settled, however, the different matters which have been under discussion between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, or either of the States which composed it, are not likely to be brought to a satisfactory issue.

In consequence of the illness of the chargé d'affaires appointed to Central America at the last session of Congress, he was prevented from proceeding on his mission until the month of October. It is hoped, however, that he is by this time at his post, and that the official intercourse, unfortunately so long interrupted, has been thus renewed on the part of the two nations, so amicably and advantageously connected by engagements founded on the most enlarged principles of commercial reciprocity.

It is gratifying to state that, since my last annual message, some of the most important claims of our fellow-citizens upon the Government of Brazil have been satisfactorily adjusted, and a reliance is placed on the friendly dispositions manifested by it that justice will also be done in others. No new causes of complaint have arisen; and the trade between the two countries flourishes under the encouragement secured to it by the liberal provisions of the treaty.

It is cause of regret, that, owing probably to the civil dissensions which have occupied the attention of the Mexican Government, the time fixed by the treaty of limits with the United States for the meeting of the commissioners to define the boundaries between the two nations, has been suffered to expire without the appointment of any commissioners on the part of that Government. While the true boundary remains in doubt by either party, it is difficult to give effect to those measures which are necessary to the protection and quiet of our numerous citizens residing near that frontier. The subject is one of great solicitude to the United States, and will not fail to receive my earnest attention.

The treaty concluded with Chili, and approved by the Senate at its last session, was also ratified by the Chilean Government, but with certain additional and explanatory articles of a nature to have required it to be again submitted to the Senate. The time limited for the exchange of the ratifications, however, having since expired, the action of both Governments on the treaty will again become necessary.

The negotiations commenced with the Argentine Republic, relative to the outrages committed on our vessels engaged in the fisheries at the Falkland islands, by persons acting under the color of its authority, as well as the other matters in controversy between the two Governments, have been suspended by the departure of the chargé d'affaires of the United States from Buenos Ayres. It is understood, however, that a minister was subsequently appointed by that Government to renew the negotiation in the United States, but, though daily expected, he has not yet arrived in this country.

With Peru no treaty has yet been formed, and with Bolivia no diplomatic intercourse has yet been established. It will be my endeavor to encourage those sentiments of amity and that liberal commerce which belong to the relations in which all the independent States of this continent stand towards each other.

I deem it proper to recommend to your notice the revision of our consular system. This has become an important branch of the public service, inasmuch as it is intimately connected with the preservation of our national character abroad, with the interest of our citizens in foreign countries, with the regulations and care of our commerce, and with the protection of our seamen. At the close of the last session of Congress I communicated a report from the Secretary of State upon the subject, to which I now refer, as containing information which may be useful in any inquiries that Congress may see fit to institute with a view to a salutary reform of the system.

It gives me great pleasure to congratulate you upon the prosperous condition of the finances of the country, as will appear from the report which the Secretary of the Treasury will, in due time, lay before you. The receipts into the Treasury during the present year will amount to more than thirty-two millions of dollars. The revenue derived from customs will, it is believed, be more than twenty-eight millions, and the public lands will yield about three millions. The expenditures within the year, for all objects, including two million five hundred and seventy-two thousand two hundred and forty dollars and ninety-nine cents on account of the public debt, will not amount to twenty-five millions, and a large balance will remain in the Treasury after satisfying all the appropriations chargeable on the revenue for the present year.

The measures taken by the Secretary of the Treasury will probably enable him to pay off, in the course of the present year, the residue of the exchanged four and a half per cent. stock, redeemable on the first day of January next; it has, therefore, been included in the estimated expenditures of this year, and forms a part of the sum above stated to have been paid on account of the public debt: the payment of this stock will reduce the whole debt of the United States, funded and unfunded, to the sum of $4,760,082 08; and, as provision has already been made for the four and a half per cent. above mentioned, and charged in the expenses of the present year, the sum last stated is all that now remains of the national debt; and the revenue of the coming year, together with the balance now in the Treasury, will be sufficient to discharge it, after meeting the current expenses of the Government. Under the power given to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, it will, I have no doubt, be purchased on favorable terms within the year.

From this view of the state of the finances, and the public engagements yet to be fulfilled, you will perceive that, if Providence permits me to meet you at another session, I shall have the high gratification of announcing to you that the national debt is extinguished. I cannot refrain from expressing the pleasure I feel at the near approach of that desirable event. The short period of time within which the public debt will have been discharged, is strong evidence of the abundant resources of the country, and of the prudence and economy with which the Government has heretofore been administered. We have waged two wars since we became a nation, with one of the most powerful kingdoms in the world; both of them undertaken in defence of our dearest rights—both successfully prosecuted and honorably terminated; and many of those who partook in the first struggle, as well as the second, will have lived to see the last item of the debt incurred in these necessary but expensive conflicts, faithfully and honestly discharged; and we shall have the proud satisfaction of bequeathing to the public servants who follow us in the administration of the Government, the rare blessing of a revenue sufficiently abundant, raised without injustice or oppression to our citizens, and unencumbered with any burdens but what they themselves shall think proper to impose upon it.

The flourishing state of the finances ought not, however, to encourage us to indulge in a lavish expenditure of the public treasure. The receipts of the present year do not furnish the test by which we are to estimate the income of the next. The changes made in our revenue system by the acts of Congress of 1832 and 1833, and more especially by the former, have swelled the receipts of the present year far beyond the amount to be expected in future years upon the reduced tariff of duties. The shortened credits on revenue bonds, and the cash duties on woollens, which were introduced by the act of 1832, and took effect on the 4th of March last, have brought large sums into the Treasury in 1833, which, according to the credits formerly given, would not have been payable until 1834, and would have formed a part of the income of that year. These causes would of themselves produce a great diminution of the receipts in the year 1834, as compared with the present one, and they will be still more diminished by the reduced rates of duties which take place on the 1st of January

Message of the President of the United States.

[SENATE.]

next on some of the most important and productive articles. Upon the best estimates that can be made, the receipts of the next year, with the aid of the unappropriated amount now in the Treasury, will not be much more than sufficient to meet the expenses of the year, and pay the small remnant of the national debt which yet remains unsatisfied. I cannot, therefore, recommend to you any alteration in the present tariff of duties. The rate as now fixed by law on the various articles was adopted at the last session of Congress as a matter of compromise with unusual unanimity; and unless it is found to produce more than the necessities of the Government call for, there would seem to be no reason, at this time, to justify a change.

But, while I forbear to recommend any further reduction of the duties beyond that already provided for by the existing laws, I must earnestly and respectfully press upon Congress the importance of abstaining from all appropriations which are not absolutely required for the public interests, and authorized by the powers clearly delegated to the United States. We are beginning a new era in our Government. The national debt, which has so long been a burden on the Treasury, will be finally discharged in the course of the ensuing year. No more money will afterwards be needed than what may be necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. Now, then, is the proper moment to fix our system of expenditure on firm and durable principles; and I cannot too strongly urge the necessity of a rigid economy, and an inflexible determination not to enlarge the income beyond the real necessities of the Government, and not to increase the wants of the Government by unnecessary and profuse expenditures. If a contrary course should be pursued, it may happen that the revenue of 1884 will fall short of the demands upon it; and after reducing the tariff in order to lighten the burdens of the people, and providing for a still further reduction to take effect hereafter, it would be much to be deplored, if, at the end of another year, we should find ourselves obliged to retrace our steps, and impose additional taxes to meet unnecessary expenditures.

It is my duty, on this occasion, to call your attention to the destruction of the public building occupied by the Treasury Department, which happened since the last adjournment of Congress. A thorough inquiry into the causes of this loss was directed and made at the time, the result of which will be duly communicated to you. I take pleasure, however, in stating here, that, by the laudable exertions of the officers of the Department, and many of the citizens of the District, but few papers were lost, and none that will materially affect the public interest.

The public convenience requires that another building should be erected as soon as practicable, and, in providing for it, it will be advisable to enlarge, in some manner, the accommodations for the public officers of the several Departments, and to authorize the erection of suitable depositories for the safe keeping of the public documents and records.

Since the last adjournment of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury has directed the money of the United States to be deposited in certain State banks designated by him, and he will immediately lay before you his reasons for this direction. I concur with him entirely in the view he has taken of the subject, and some months before the removal I urged upon the Department the propriety of taking that step. The near approach of the day on which the charter will expire, as well as the conduct of the bank, appeared to me to call for this measure, upon the high considerations of public interest and public duty. The extent of its misconduct, however, although known to be great, was not at that time fully developed by proof. It was not until late in the month of August that I received from the Government directors an official report, establishing beyond question that this great and powerful institution had been actively engaged in attempting to influence the elections of the public officers by means of its money, and that, in violation of the express provisions of its charter, it had, by a formal resolution, placed its funds at the disposition of its president, to be employed in sustaining the political power of the bank. A copy of this resolution is contained in the report of the Government directors, before referred to; and, however the objects may be disguised by cautious language, no one can doubt that this money was, in truth, intended for electioneering purposes, and the particular uses to which it is proved to have been applied, abundantly show that it was so understood. Not only was the evidence complete as to the past application of the money and power of the bank to electioneering purposes, but that the resolution of the board of directors authorized the same course to be pursued in future.

It being thus established, by unquestionable proof, that the Bank of the United States was converted into a permanent electioneering engine, it appeared to me that the path of duty which the Executive department of the Government ought to pursue was not doubtful. As, by the terms of the bank charter, no officer but the Secretary of the Treasury could remove the deposits, it seemed to me that this authority ought to be at once exerted to deprive that great corporation of the support and countenance of the Government in such a use of its funds and such an exertion of its power. In this point of the case, the question is distinctly presented, whether the people of the United States are to govern through representatives chosen by their unbiased suffrages, or whether the money and power of a great corporation are to be secretly exerted to influence their judgment and control their decisions. It must now be determined whether the bank is to have its candidates for all offices in the country, from the highest to the lowest, or whether candidates on both sides of political questions shall be brought forward, as heretofore, and supported by the usual means.

At this time the efforts of the bank to control public opinion through the distresses of some and the fears of others, are equally apparent, and, if possible, more objectionable. By a curtailment of its accommodations more rapid than any emergency requires, and even while it retains specie to an almost unprecedented amount in its vaults, it is attempting to produce great embarrassment in one portion of the community, while, through presses known to have been sustained by its money, it attempts, by unfounded alarms, to create a panic in all.

These are the means by which it seems to expect that it can force a restoration of the deposits, and, as a necessary consequence, extort from Congress a renewal of its charter. I am happy to know that, through the good sense of our people, the effort to get up a panic has hitherto failed, and that, through the increased accommodations which the State banks have been enabled to afford, no public distress has followed the exertions of the bank; and it cannot be doubted that the exercise of its power, and the expenditure of its money, as well as its efforts to spread groundless alarm, will be met and rebuked as they deserve. In my own sphere of duty, I should feel myself called on, by the facts disclosed, to order a scire facias against the bank, with a view to put an end to the chartered rights it has so palpably violated, were it not that the charter itself will expire as soon as a decision would probably be obtained from the court of last resort.

I called the attention of Congress to this subject in my last annual message, and informed them that such measures as were within the reach of the Secretary of the Treasury, had been taken to enable him to judge whether the public deposits in the Bank of the United States were entirely safe; but that, as his single powers might be inadequate to the object, I recommend the subject to Congress, as worthy of their serious investigation: declaring it as my opinion that an inquiry into the transactions of that institution, embracing the branches as well as the principal bank, was called for by the credit which was given throughout the country to many serious charges impeaching their character; and which, if true, might justly excite the apprehension that they were no longer a safe depository for the public money. The extent to which the examination, thus recommended, was gone into, is spread upon your journals, and is too well known to require to be stated. Such as was made, resulted in a report from a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, touching certain specified points only, concluding with a resolution that the Government deposits might safely be continued in the Bank of the United States. This resolution was adopted at the close of the session, by the vote of a majority of the House of Representatives.

Although I may not always be able to concur in the views of the public interest, or the duties of its agents, which may be taken by the other departments of the Government, or either of its branches, I am, notwithstanding, wholly incapable of receiving otherwise than with the most sincere respect, all opinions or suggestions proceeding from such a source; and in respect to none am I more inclined to do so, than to the House of Representatives. But it will be seen, from the brief views at this time taken of the subject by myself, as well as the more ample ones presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the change in the deposits which has been ordered, has been deemed to be called for by considerations which are not affected by the proceedings referred to, and which, if correctly viewed by that Department, rendered its act a matter of imperious duty.

Coming as you do, for the most part, immediately from the people and the States, by election, and possessing the fullest opportunity to know their sentiments, the present Congress will be sincerely solicitous to carry into full and fair effect the will of their constituents in regard to this institution. It will be for those in whose behalf we all act, to decide whether the Executive department of the Government, in the steps which it has taken on this subject, has been found in the line of its duty.

The accompanying report of the Secretary of War, with the documents annexed to it, exhibit the operations of the War Department for the past year, and the condition of the various subjects intrusted to its administration.

It will be seen from them that the army maintains the character it has heretofore acquired for efficiency and military knowledge. Nothing has occurred since your last session to require its services beyond the ordinary routine of duties, which upon the seaboard and the inland frontier devolve upon it in a time of peace. The system, so wisely adopted and so long pursued, of constructing fortifications at exposed points, and of preparing and collecting the supplies necessary for the military defence of the country, and thus providently furnishing in peace the means of defence in war, has been continued with the usual results. I recommend to your consideration the various subjects suggested in the report of the Secretary of War. Their adoption would promote the public service and ameliorate the condition of the army.

Our relations with the various Indian tribes have been undisturbed since the termination of the difficulties growing out of the hostile aggressions of the Sac and Fox Indians. Several treaties have been formed for the relinquishment of territory to the United States, and for the migration of the occupants to the region assigned for their residence west of the Mississippi. Should these treaties be ratified by the Senate, provision will have been made for the removal of almost all the tribes now remaining east of that river, and for the termination of many difficult and embarrassing questions arising out of their anomalous political condition. It is to be hoped that those portions of two of the Southern tribes, which, in that event, will present the only remaining difficulties, will realize the necessity of emigration, and will speedily resort to it. My original convictions upon this subject have been confirmed by the course of events for several years, and experience is every day adding to their strength. That those tribes cannot exist, surrounded by our settlements, and in continual contact with our citizens, is certain. They have neither the intelligence, the industry, the moral habits, nor the desire of improvement, which are essential to any favorable change in their condition. Established in the midst of another and a superior race, and without appreciating the causes of their inferiority, or seeking to control them, they must necessarily yield to the force of circumstances, and ere long disappear. Such has been their fate heretofore, and if it is to be averted, and it is, it can only be done by a general removal beyond our boundary, and by a reorganization of their political system upon principles adapted to the new relations in which they will be placed. The experiment which has been recently made has so far proved successful. The emigrants generally are represented to be prosperous and contented, the country suitable to their wants and habits, and the essential articles of subsistence easily procured. When the report of the commissioners now engaged in investigating the condition and prospects of these Indians, and in devising a plan for their intercourse and government, is received, I trust ample means of information will be in possession of the Government for adjusting all the unsettled questions connected with this interesting subject.

The operations of the navy during the year, and its present condition, are fully exhibited in the annual report from the Navy Department.

Suggestions are made by the Secretary of various improvements, which deserve careful consideration, and most of which, if adopted, bid fair to promote the efficiency of this important branch of the public service. Among these are the new organization of the Navy Board, the revision of the pay to officers, and a change in the period of time, or in the manner of making the annual appropriations, to which I beg leave to call your particular attention.

The views which are presented on almost every portion of our naval concerns, and especially on the amount of force and the number of officers, and the general course of policy appropriate in the present state of our country, for securing the great and useful purposes of naval protection in peace, and due preparation for the contingencies of war, meet with my entire approbation.

It will be perceived, from the report referred to, that the fiscal concerns of the establishment are in an excellent condition; and it is hoped that Congress may feel disposed to make promptly every suitable provision desired, either for preserving or improving the system.

The General Post Office Department has continued, upon the strength of its own resources, to facilitate the means of communication between the various portions of the Union with increased activity. The method, however, in which the accounts of the transportation of the mail have always been kept, appears to have presented an imperfect view of its expenses. It has recently been discovered that, from the earliest records of the Department, the annual statements have been calculated to exhibit an amount considerably short of the actual expense incurred for that service. These illusory statements, together with the expense of carrying into effect the law of the last session of Congress establishing new mail routes, and a disposition on the part of the head of the Department to gratify the wishes of the public in the extension of mail facilities, have induced him to incur responsibilities for their improvement, beyond what the current resources of the Department would sustain. As soon as he had discovered the imperfection of the method, he caused an investigation to be made of its results, and applied the proper remedy to correct the evil. It became necessary for him to withdraw some of the improvements which he had made, to bring the expenses of the Department within its own resources. These expenses were incurred for the public good, and the public have enjoyed their benefit. They are now but partially suspended, and that where they may be discontinued with the least inconvenience to the country.

The progressive increase in the income from postages has equalled the highest expectations, and it affords demonstrative evidence of the growing importance and great utility of this Department. The details are exhibited in the accompanying report of the Postmaster General.

The many distressing accidents which have of late occurred in that portion of our navigation carried on by the use of steam power, deserve the immediate and unremitting attention of the constituted authorities of the country. The fact that the number of those fatal disasters is constantly increasing, notwithstanding the great improvements which are everywhere made in the machinery employed, and in the rapid advances which have been made in that branch of science, show very clearly that they are in a great degree the result of criminal negligence on the part of those by whom the vessels are navigated, and to whose care and attention the lives and property of our citizens are so extensively intrusted.

That these evils may be greatly lessened, if not substantially removed, by means of precautionary and penal legislation, seems to be highly probable; so far, therefore, as the subject can be regarded as within the constitutional purview of Congress, I earnestly recommend it to your prompt and serious consideration.

I would also call your attention to the views I have heretofore expressed of the propriety of amending the constitution in relation to the mode of electing the President and Vice President of the United States. Regarding it as all important to the future quiet and harmony of the people that every intermediate agency in the election of these officers should be removed, and that their eligibility should be limited to one term of either four or six years, I cannot too earnestly invite your consideration of the subject.

Trusting that your deliberations on all the topics of general interest to which I have adverted, and such others as your more extensive knowledge of the wants of our beloved country may suggest, may be crowned with success, I tender you, in conclusion, the co-operation which it may be in my power to afford them.

WASHINGTON, December 3, 1833.

5,000 extra copies of the Message, and 1,500 of the accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, December 4.

Government Deposits—Removal.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the removal of the public deposits from the United States Bank and its branches.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, 5,000 copies of the report, and 1,500 copies of the documents, were ordered to be printed.

Rhode Island Senators.

Mr. S. WRIGHT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, now upon the table of the Senate, showing the appointment of ELISHA R. POTTER as a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, be referred to a select committee of five Senators, to inquire and report upon the claim of the said ELISHA R. POTTER to the seat in the Senate now occupied by the Hon. ASHER ROBBINS.

Veto of the Land Bill.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, enclosing a communication of the reasons which had induced him to refuse his assent to the bill of the last session, authorizing an appropriation for a limited time, of the proceeds of the public lands. The Message having been read,

Mr. CLAY rose, and stated that this Measure had been first introduced into Congress at the session before the last, under circumstances which must be within the recollection of every member of the Senate. Its object was to dispose of the proceeds of the public lands for a limited time. The subject had been greatly discussed, not only in Congress, but throughout the country. The principles and provisions of the bill were well and generally understood. The subject had attracted the attention of the Chief Magistrate himself, and this bill was made the subject of commentary in his Message at the commencement of the last session of Congress. It must, therefore, be considered as a subject perfectly well understood by the President; for it was not to be supposed that he would have commented upon it, and recommended it to the attention of Congress, if it had not been understood. During the last session, this bill, which had previously been before the House, was introduced in this body, and was passed, and sent to the other House, whence it was returned with a slight amendment, taking away the discretion which had been invested in the State Legislatures as to the disposal of the proceeds. This bill, which had been before Congress the session before the last, which had passed at the last session, having been before the country for a whole year when it passed the two Houses, was placed before the Executive, with a number of other measures, just before the close of the last Congress. As the subject had been before the President for consideration so long previous to the passage of the bill, and he had reflected upon it, it was not to have been expected that he would take advantage of the shortness of the session to retain the bill until this time. Yet such had been the fact, and a proceeding had taken place which was unprecedented and alarming, and which, unless the people of this country were lost to all sense of what was due to the legislative branch of the Government, to themselves, and to those principles of liberty which had been transmitted to them from the revolution, they would not tolerate. It was at least due to the Legislature that the President should have sent a few lines, courteously informing them that, when his own mind was made up, he would communicate the result. But without deigning to make known his intention, or to impart the reasons which influenced him, he despotically kept silence, and retained the bill. Mr. C. begged leave to congratulate the Senate on the return of the bill. The question which now presented itself was, whether the bill was dead, in consequence of the non-action of the President, or whether it had become an existing law. He was not now about to discuss that question; but he had felt himself called on to make a few observations on this extraordinary course, and to say that it was due to Congress, to the people, and to the Executive himself, to have informed the last Congress in reference to this subject, concerning which he must have made up his mind. He would now move to lay this bill on the table, and would afterwards give notice of a day when he should ask leave to bring in a bill in order to submit it again to the action of the Senate.

The motion to lay the bill upon the table was decided in the affirmative—Ayes 19.

Mr. BENTON moved to take up the Message for consideration.

Mr. MOORE thought that the Senator from Missouri would have another opportunity of offering what he wished to say; and he was himself desirous to move the printing of an extra number of the Message.

Mr. BENTON expressed a hope that he might be permitted to take as wide a range as the gentleman from Kentucky had taken. He wished to ask the Secretary to turn to the journal, and inform him on what day of the last session the bill was sent to the President. [The Secretary, having referred to the journal, replied, that it was sent to him on the 2d of March.] He wished the Senate to bear in mind that, as the 3d of March fell on a Sunday, the 2d was, in fact, the last day of the session. He then asked if there was not an ancient rule of Congress that prohibited the sending a bill to the President on the last day of the session? [Mr. KING answered that there was.] He then inquired if the sending of the bill on the 2d of March, last session, was not a violation of this rule? There was a precipitation and haste at the close of the session, which prevented not only the President, but the members themselves, from knowing precisely what they were doing. The rule to which he had adverted was set aside last session, and all the evils which accompany precipitation were the consequence. There were 142 acts put on the statute book last session. The 53d of these acts was signed on the 2d of March. So that there were about 90 acts signed on the last day of the session, and thus a mass of business was thrown on the President, which it was almost impossible to perform. And now the people were called on to revolt, and denunciations had gone forth that, if the people would put up with this, they would put up with any thing, because the President, in addition to all this mass of business, did not, on that day, write the paper which had now been read, and send the bill back. And this declaration was made in the presence of members who knew that it sometimes took them months to prepare a speech for the press, with the help of the note-takers and the speakers themselves, and all that were concerned. Yet the people were called on to revolt against the President for not preparing this paper in addition to all the legislative and executive business which pressed on him in the last few hours of the session. He had risen not only to defend the President, but to claim for him the approbation of all reflecting persons, for retaining the bill until he could have sufficient time to examine it, and prepare his reasons for objecting to it. Certainly, as far as he knew, the President had made up his mind at once in opposition to the bill, but no human hands could have written out the document itself. It had been found necessary to make several hundred references, all requiring extensive examination; but, leaving out all these, there was not time left even for the writing. He could not have gone through the mere manual labor. A great State paper was to be laid before the people; and the President was right to take time for reflection, and not throw back the bill instantly, as if he kicked it back in their faces, as much as to say that they had acted precipitately in their legislation. He repeated, that the President had acted in the manner most respectful to the Legislature. He had examined the subject, and had now, as explicitly as possible, said that he had weighed all the reasons which had been advanced in favor of the bill, and all the counteracting reasons which had operated upon him.

He had risen to defend the President from what he considered an unjustifiable and violent assault made upon him for doing what was his duty. As to the bill itself, seeing the manner in which the Western elections had terminated, he was ready to meet it in any form. He entirely concurred in the suggestion for the printing of an extra number of the Message.

Mr. CLAY said he did not rise to reply to any one who had felt himself called upon to rise in the Senate to vindicate the President. If there were any such member, he did not wish to disturb him in his office of vindicator of the President, or to affect the complacency with which he might regard his vindication. But he (Mr. C.) stood here to sustain his own course, to vindicate the constitution, and to vindicate the rights of Congress under it. And he must repeat, that the withholding of the land bill, at the last session, under all the circumstances of the case, was a violation of the constitution, and disrespectful to the Senate. What were the circumstances?

At two different sessions of Congress, the land subject was before it. At that which preceded the last, a bill had been introduced to distribute among the States the proceeds of the public lands. The whole subject, by the bill and by reports of committees, was laid before Congress and spread before the country. A copy of the bill, when it was first introduced, according to the constant practice of Congress, was sent to the President. He was thus, as well as the country generally, put in entire possession of the matter. It attracted great public attention. It engaged that of the President. And, accordingly, at the commencement of the last session, in his annual Message, he adverted to it, in a manner which evidently showed that the writer of the Message fully understood it, and all the views which had been developed about it.

Thus was Congress, at the commencement of the last session, officially invited to act, and to act speedily, respecting the public lands; and thus did the President manifest his knowledge of the provisions of the bill of the previous session. Well, sir, (said Mr. C.,) Congress again took up the question. The identical bill of the previous session was again introduced, and again, prior to its passage, placed before the President, along with the other printed documents, according to standing usage. And it was passed by both Houses, substantially in the shape in which at the previous session it was passed by the Senate, except that the restriction as to the power of the States to apply the sum to be distributed among the several States, after deduction of the twelve and a half per cent. first set apart for the new States, was stricken out.

In this form the bill was laid before the President on the 2d day of March last. It was no stranger, but an old acquaintance. He had seen it repeatedly before; and he must have been well informed as to its progress in Congress. He had commented on the very project contained in the bill, when he had brought forward his own, in his Message, at the opening of the session. Without deigning to communicate to Congress what disposition he had made, or meant to make of it, he permitted the body to rise in utter ignorance of his intentions.

It may be true that there was a great press of business on the President on the 2d of March, and that he may have acted upon some ninety or one hundred bills. But this is what occurs with every President on the day before the termination of the short session of Congress. With most of those bills the President must have been less acquainted than he was with the land bill. Of some of them he probably had never heard at all. Not one of them possessed the importance of the land bill. How did it happen that the President could find time to decide on so many new bills, and yet had not time to examine and dispose of one which had long been before him and the public; one embracing a subject which he thought the union, harmony, and interest of the States required should be speedily adjusted; one which he himself had pronounced his judgment upon at the commencement of this session? By withholding the bill, the President took upon himself a responsibility beyond the exercise of the veto. He deprived Congress altogether of its constitutional right to act upon the bill, and to pass it, his negative notwithstanding.

The President is, by the constitution, secured time to consider bills which shall have passed both branches of Congress. But so is Congress equally secured the right to act upon bills which they have passed, and which the President may have thought proper to reject. If he exercises his veto, and returns the bill, two-thirds may pass it. But if he withholds the bill, it cannot become a law, even although the two Houses should be unanimously in its favor.

Mr. C. denied that the constitution gave to the President ten days to consider bills, except at the long session. At that session, the period of its termination is uncertain, and dependent upon the will of Congress. To guard against a sudden adjournment, by which the President might be deprived of due time to deliberate on an important bill, the constitution provides for ten days at that session. But, at the short session, it is not an adjournment, but a dissolution of Congress, on the 3d of March; and the day of that dissolution is fixed in the constitution itself, and known to all.

Mr. C. contended, therefore, that the act of withholding the bill was arbitrary and unconstitutional; by which Congress, and the Senate especially, in which the bill originated, were deprived of their constitutional right of passing on the bill, after the President had exercised his powers. Respect to Congress required of the President, if he really had not time to form a judgment on the bill, or, having formed it, had not time to lay his reasons before the body, a communication to that effect. But, without condescending to transmit one word upon the subject to Congress, he suffered the session to terminate, and the members to go home destitute of all information, until this day, of his intentions.

Mr. BENTON said that no quorum sat, in either House, on the evening after the day on which the bill was sent to the President.

The Message was then laid on the table.

Mr. MOORE moved that 5,000 extra copies of the Message be printed for the use of the Senate, which motion was adopted.

Rhode Island Senators.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution offered by him yesterday.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for the select committee, when the Chair announced that the following gentlemen composed the committee:

Messrs. POINDEXTER, RIVES, FREELINGHUYSEN, WRIGHT, and SPRAGUE.

MONDAY, December 9.

The Senate proceeded to the election of its officers, and, having balloted first for a Secretary, Walter Lowrie received 39 ballots, being all that were given, and was accordingly declared to be unanimously re-elected Secretary of the Senate.

A balloting next took place for Sergeant-at-arms, when J. Shackford received 25 votes out of 40, and was elected.

The Senate proceeded to the election of an Assistant Doorkeeper, and, after six ballotings, Stephen Haight received 20 votes out of 39, and was accordingly elected.

TUESDAY, December 10.

Removal of the Deposits.

Mr. CLAY rose and said, that he desired to call the attention of the Senate to a subject, perhaps exceeding in importance any other question likely to come before the present Congress. He adverted to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. TANEY,) on the subject of the removal of the deposits. He then moved to take up this report for consideration.

The motion having been agreed to,

Mr. C. then said that the charter granted to the Bank of the United States provided for the deposit of the money of the United States in that bank and its branches. It vested in the Secretary of the Treasury the power to remove these deposits, whenever such removal should be required by the public interests; but it is further required that whenever he does remove the deposits, he shall submit to Congress his reasons for the act at their next session. A removal of the public deposits had been determined on. How this was to be effected, or at whose instance, was not at present the question to be considered. But a removal had taken place; and the Secretary had stated that this was done by his order, and he had laid before Congress his reasons. When Congress, at the time of the passage of the charter of the bank, made it necessary that these reasons should be submitted, they must have had some purpose in their mind. It must have been intended that Congress should look into these reasons, determine as to their validity, and approve or disapprove them, as might be thought proper. The reasons had now been submitted, and it was the duty of Congress to decide whether or not they were sufficient to justify the act. If there was a subject which, more than any other, seemed to require the prompt action of Congress, it certainly was that which had reference to the custody and care of the public treasury. The Senate, therefore, could not, at too early a period, enter on the question—what was the actual condition of the treasury? A high officer of the Government, who ought to be in the chair, now so honorably filled by the President pro tem., and whose absence he (Mr. C.) sincerely regretted, had once told the Senate to see where the lost rights of the States were. Now he (Mr. C.) wished to discover where was the public treasury, and whether the public money was in safe custody.

It was not his purpose to go into a discussion, but he had risen to state that it appeared to him to be his duty as a Senator, and he hoped that other Senators took similar views of their duty, to look into this subject, and to see what was to be done. As the report of the Secretary of the Treasury had declared the reasons which had led to the removal of the public deposits, and as the Senate had to judge whether, on investigation of these reasons, the act was a wise one or not, he considered that it would not be right to refer the subject to any committee, but that the Senate should at once act on it, not taking it up in the form of a report of a committee, but going into an examination of the reasons as they had been submitted.

He wished to make the report of the Secretary the order for some particular day, in the belief that the requisition made by the act of Congress on the Secretary of the Treasury for his reasons on the removal of the deposits, was doubtless intended to place the whole matter before Congress for consideration.

Mr. C. then moved to postpone the consideration of the report until Monday next, and to make it the special order for that day.

Mr. BEXTON admitted that Congress had full power to go into the examination of the report. But he requested the Senate to bear in mind that the Secretary had announced, among other reasons which he had assigned for the removal of the deposits, that it had been caused by the misconduct of the bank, and he had gone into a variety of specifications, charging the bank with interfering with the liberties of the people in their most vital elements—the liberty of the press, and the purity of elections. The Secretary had also charged the bank with dishonoring its own paper on several occasions, and that it became necessary to compel it to receive paper of its own branches. Here, then, were grave charges of misconduct, and he wished to know whether, in the face of such charges, this Congress was to go at once, without the previous examination of a committee, into action upon the subject?

The motion was then agreed to, and the report was made the special order for Monday next.

Mr. CLAY then offered the following resolution. He believed that, by the rule of the Senate, it would have to lie one day. His object was to discover who it was that had made the removal of the deposits:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether a paper, under date of the 18th day of September, 1833, purporting to have been read by him to the heads of the several departments, relating to the deposits of the public money in the treasury of the United States, and alleged to have been published by his authority, be genuine or not; and, if it be genuine, that he be also requested to cause a copy of the said paper to be laid before the Senate.

The resolution lies on the table.

Election of Chaplain.

The Senate proceeded to the election of a chaplain.

On the sixth ballot, Mr. Hatch received 23 votes out of 41, and was declared elected.

WEDNESDAY, December 11.

Presidential Document.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. CLAY, was then taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether a paper, under date of the 18th day of September, 1833, purporting to have been read by him to the heads of the several departments, relating to the deposits of the public money in the treasury of the United States, and alleged to have been published by his authority, be genuine or not; and if it be genuine, that he be also requested to cause a copy of the said paper to be laid before the Senate."

Mr. FORSYTH said that this was an unusual call, and he was desirous to know for what purpose it had been made, and for what uses the paper which had been called for was intended. He presumed that no one had any doubt as to its genuineness. He had none.

Mr. CLAY replied, that the reasons for the call must be obvious, and would readily present themselves to every Senator; and, believing thus, he had not thought it necessary to suggest them. It had been said that the President had issued a particular paper, which he had read to the members of his cabinet, which had been promulgated to the public as his, and which was in the possession of the country as his. But the Senate had no official declaration of the President, nor any official communication to them of this paper, nor any thing in any form, from him, which affirmed that this paper was his. If the President had merely read a paper to the members of his cabinet, without promulgating that paper to the world, it would have presented a totally different question. Gentlemen would have reasonably doubted if they possessed a right to call for the production of a paper which was confidential between the President and the members of his cabinet. But this paper had been promulgated to the world; and therefore, the Senate, if it was the production of the President, had a right to call for an official copy, that they might thus be assured, from the highest source, that it was genuine. He had himself no doubt that the paper was genuine, but the fact only rested, at present, on the assertion of a newspaper, and it was not every assertion of every newspaper which was fully entitled to credit. The only testimony, now, was the assertion of the editor of a newspaper, and it was only respectful to the President to ask him for a copy; and if a copy was communicated, there could be no right to presume that it was not genuine.

Mr. FORSYTH said, if he understood the honorable Senator from Kentucky correctly, he admitted that with the intercourse between the President and his Secretaries, whether oral or written, the Senate had nothing to do. This view of the subject Mr. F. did not conceive to be affected by the publicity which, whether with or without the consent of the President, had been given to the paper referred to in the resolution. This paper was one said to have been addressed by the President of the United States to his confidential advisers. Mr. F. said he could not see why the honorable gentleman from Kentucky should entertain any particular desire to get at this paper. What official use could he make of it, when he had got it? Why depart from usage by calling for such a paper as this, unless it was intended to make some official use of it? Mr. F. said he could imagine that one branch of the Legislature might, under certain circumstances, have a right to call for it, and, if it were refused when called for, to obtain it by the use of means within its power. But this was not that branch of the Legislature. If the paper in question was to be made the ground of a criminal charge against the President of the United States, it must come from another body, and must be a part of the evidence on which the President of the United States is to be brought to the bar of this body, under a charge of high crime or misdemeanor. The honorable Senator had suggested that the paper referred to might be of vast use in ascertaining by whom the deposits had been removed. As to that, Mr. F. said, there was no question that the deposits have been removed; whether proper or not, would, he presumed, become a subject of inquiry. He presumed, also, that, as to that act, the Senate had already sufficient information to enable the gentleman from Kentucky to form his judgment upon it. Mr. F. concluded by saying he could perceive no use that the Senate had for this paper; the call for it was of a nature entirely unusual; and he should therefore resist it, and require the yeas and nays upon the question of agreeing to it.

Mr. BENTON said that he had intended to ask for the yeas and nays, if the gentleman from Georgia had not done so, because he considered it due to the Senate that it should appear on the face of the journal who voted for, and who against the resolution. As to the information sought for from the President, it was impossible for the imagination to conceive the uses to which this information could be applied. The President had already communicated his reasons to all America. He might refuse to send a copy to the Senate, in answer to their call; and such a refusal would, in his opinion, be proper, in reference to the effect it might have in cases to arise hereafter. He asked if it was proper to call on the President to say if a document, which appeared in a newspaper, was his, was genuine or not? Was it proper that the Senate should call on the President to communicate to them a paper which he had read to the members of his cabinet? Supposing that, instead of a paper, the President had made a speech to his cabinet. What difference could be made between a written paper and a speech? He wished to know whether the Senate could have called on him to communicate a copy of his speech? If the Senate could do this, could they not go still further? and if they could call for this speech delivered to his cabinet, could they not also call for any thing which he had said to his cabinet, while sitting in his chair, and talking to them? And if they could do this, could they not go still further, and call upon him for any thing he might have said in conversation to any single member, and which had by some means, got into a newspaper? Where, in fact, could a line be drawn? What if the members were lawyers; and he would ask of them what, in law, was the difference between words written and words spoken? Was not the whole of it parole? and the Senate might just as well call for what was spoken as for what was written. He had no doubt that a great many communications were made between the President and his cabinet on that day. The President might object to send a copy to the Senate. He had already given it to the world. Every Senator might take up the Globe, and read the paper, and might consider it the act of the President, and as much to be relied on as such as if he had before him the autograph of the President.

In asking for the yeas and nays, he had no desire to deter any member of the Senate from using this paper. It might be used from the Globe in which it was printed, as well as if a copy were communicated from the President. But his object was to prevent the Senate from putting a question to the President which he might not consider himself bound to answer.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that perhaps, after the various admissions which had now been made of the genuineness of the paper, the Senator from Kentucky might be induced to consider his purpose as well answered on that point, as if he retained the original phraseology of his resolution. And, in a modified form, he (Mr. W.) did not feel any objection to its adoption. He looked at the subject in a light somewhat different from that in which it was viewed by the gentleman from Georgia. If this was a letter to the heads of departments, it could hardly be an official document, and the Senate would have a right to call for it. His doubt was, whether it was an official act, which, as such, might come before the Senate without an express call. If it was a document which might come before the Senate in an official form, then the present motion might have been considered premature. But it could not be doubted by any one, that, before the close of the session, and it was impossible to tell how soon, there would be that before the Senate which would render it necessary to show how the removal of the deposits had been effected. That time would necessarily arrive, and he was desirous that all information on the subject should be communicated to the Senate. He was therefore influenced by a twofold motive. In the first place, he was satisfied that this subject must become a topic of discussion; and, secondly, he could not view this document as strictly an official act of the President. It had not been read to the cabinet only, but to the whole people. It appeared to embody instructions. It was a paper which did not essentially differ in its character from a proclamation. There was no existing statute which required of the President

Presidential Document.

to send to the Senate a copy of a proclamation. But, during the last session, a certified copy of a proclamation had been sent to the Senate. And although this was not, in the strictest sense, an official proceeding, it was intended to be a public defence of an official act. If the resolution had been simply a call for that paper, he should feel himself bound to sustain it, as he last year supported a call for the proclamation to which he had alluded. He would therefore suggest, that the part of the resolution which inquired as to the genuineness of the paper, and which carried on its face an implication, should be stricken out, and that the genuineness of the paper should be taken as admitted, and that the proposition should be merely a call for the paper. With the consent, therefore, of the Senator from Kentucky, (and certainly not without it,) he would move to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows:

"That the President be requested to send to the Senate a copy of the paper which has been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the heads of the executive departments, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its offices."

The amendment was then modified according to the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. CALHOUN should vote for the resolution, although he was far from feeling any disrespect for the President. He considered the official communication of this paper as due to the dignity of the Senate, and to the Chief Magistrate himself. And he submitted it to the good sense of gentlemen, if it would be treating the President with proper respect to predicate any action of the Senate, in reference to so important a subject, on newspaper authority.

Mr. KING made a few remarks in opposition to the resolution. He did not see how the Senate were to act on this document; thought that they had no right to call for it; and expressed a belief that the President might, under the same impression, refuse to communicate it.

Mr. KANE gave briefly the reasons which would influence him to oppose the resolution. It was stated as one of the objects that it was to discover who had removed the deposits. If that was the object, the question had been already answered by the President and Secretary of the Treasury. But if the object was to show that the President had made a full statement, then the subject ought to be agitated in the other House, and not here, in the shape of a criminal charge.

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Moore, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tyler, White, Wilkins, Wright—18.

So the resolution was agreed to.

THURSDAY, December 12.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 12, 1833.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have attentively considered the resolution of the Senate, of the 11th instant, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate "a copy of the paper which has been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the heads of the executive departments, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its offices."

The Executive is a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government equally with the Senate; and I have yet to learn under what constitutional authority that branch of the Legislature has a right to require of me an account of any communication, either verbally or in writing, made to the heads of departments acting as a cabinet council. As well might I be required to detail to the Senate the free and private conversation I have held with those officers on any subjects relating to their duties and my own.

Feeling my responsibility to the American people, I am willing, upon all occasions, to explain to them the grounds of my conduct; and I am willing, upon all proper occasions, to give to either branch of the Legislature any information in my possession that can be useful in the execution of the appropriate duties confided to them.

Knowing the constitutional rights of the Senate, I shall be the last man, under any circumstances, to interfere with them. Knowing those of the Executive, I shall, at all times, endeavor to maintain them, agreeably to the provisions of the constitution, and the solemn oath I have taken to support and defend it.

I am constrained, therefore, by a proper sense of my own self-respect, and of the rights secured by the constitution to the executive branch of the Government, to decline a compliance with your request.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Message having been read,

Mr. CLAY rose and said, that the call, to which this Message was a response, had been made upon the President after full deliberation. The right to make it was founded upon the presumed act of the President. It was founded upon the fact of the promulgation of the State paper emanating from the President relating to the deposits of the public money of the people of the United States, with the President's assent and direction. That paper had been published to the world, with the sanction of the President. It was now in the full possession of the people of the United States. It had been published to make an impression, and it had made a deep impression on their minds. But still it had been published on authority alleged by the editor of a newspaper to be derived from the President. Whether the paper was, in fact, genuine, or, if genuine, whether it was promulgated with the President's sanction, were questions respecting which we had no evidence, but that which the assertion of the editor of the paper itself, and concurring circumstances, afforded. In this situation it was, by (Mr. C.) himself, and he supposed by those who voted with him in supporting the call, deemed due and respectful to the President, due to the Senate, and due to the whole country, to appeal to the highest source of information in relation to this subject, and to request an authentic and official copy of the paper itself.

This call was in conformity with established usage, coeval, he (Mr. C.) believed, with the Government. Whenever either branch of Congress desires a public paper in the possession of, or proceeding from, the Executive, it has called for it. Innumerable instances of such calls are to be found in the journals of the two Houses.

Mr. GRUNY said that he had always himself believed the motion calling for this paper unnecessary, and that no benefit could result from it. It was unnecessary, because evidence of a fact was only required when the fact itself was disputed. There was no dispute in this case. Friends and enemies had considered this paper as an authentic one. Why, then, was it necessary to call on the President for evidence that it was so?

He concluded with moving to lay the Message on the table; and the motion was agreed to.

MONDAY, December 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, MARTIN VAN BUREN, this day took his seat in the chair of the Senate, and delivered the following address:

SENATORS: On entering on the duties of the station to which I have been called by the people, deference to you, and justice to myself, require that I should forestall expectations which might otherwise be disappointed. Although for many years heretofore a member of the Senate, I regret that I should not have acquired that knowledge of the particular order of its proceedings which might naturally be expected. Unfortunately for me, in respect to my present condition, I ever found those at hand who had more correctly appreciated this important branch of their duties, and on whose opinions, as to points of order, I could at all times safely rely. This remissness will, doubtless, for a season, cause me no small degree of embarrassment. So far, however, as unremitting exertions on my part, and a proper respect for the advice of those who are better informed than myself, can avail, this deficiency will be remedied as speedily as possible; and I feel persuaded that the Senate, in the mean time, will extend to me a considerate indulgence.

But, however wanting I may be, for the time, in the thorough knowledge of the technical duties of the Chair, I entertain, I humbly hope, a deep and solemn conviction of its high moral obligations. I am well aware that he who occupies it is bound to cherish towards the members of the body over which he presides no other feelings than those of justice and courtesy; to regard them all as standing upon an honorable equality; to apply the rules established by themselves, for their own government, with strict impartiality; and to use whatever authority he possesses in the manner best calculated to protect the rights, to respect the feelings, and to guard the reputations of all who may be affected by its exercise.

It is no disparagement to any other branch of the Government to say, that there is none on which the constitution devolves such extensive powers as it does upon the Senate. There is scarcely an exercise of constitutional authority in which it does not immediately or immediately participate; it forms an important, and, in some respects, an indispensable part of each of the three great departments, executive, legislative, and judicial; and is, moreover, the body in which is made effectual that share of power in the federal organization so wisely allotted to the respective State sovereignties.

Invested with such august powers, so judiciously restricted, and so largely adapted to the purposes of good government, it is no wonder that the Senate is regarded by the people of the United States as one of the best features in what they at least consider to be the wisest, the freest, and happiest political system in the world. In fervent wishes that it may long continue to be so regarded, and in a conviction of the importance of order, propriety, and regularity in its proceedings, we must all concur. It shall be an object of my highest ambition, Senators, to join with you, as far as in me lies, in effecting those desirable objects, and in endeavoring to realize the expectation formed of this body at the adoption of the constitution, and ever since confidently cherished, that it would exercise the most efficient influence in upholding the federal system, and in perpetuating what is at once the foundation and the safeguard of our country's welfare—the Union of the States.

THURSDAY, December 26.

Removal of the Deposits.

The Chair having announced the special order of the day, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States,

Mr. CLAY offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That, by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion; and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

2. Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States, deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to Congress on the 3d day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient.

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate as follows:

DECEMBER, 1833.]

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

We are, said he, in the midst of a revolution, hitherto bloodless, but rapidly tending towards a total change of the pure republican character of the Government, and to the concentration of all power in the hands of one man. The powers of Congress are paralyzed, except when exerted in conformity with his will, by frequent and extraordinary exercise of the executive veto, not anticipated by the founders of the constitution, and not practised by any of the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate. And, to cramp them still more, a new expedient is springing into use, of withholding altogether bills which have received the sanction of both Houses of Congress, thereby cutting off all opportunity of passing them, even if, after their return, the members should be unanimous in their favor. The constitutional participation of the Senate in the appointing power is virtually abolished, by the constant use of the power of removal from office without any known cause, and by the appointment of the same individual to the same office, after his rejection by the Senate. How often have we, Senators, felt that the check of the Senate, instead of being, as the constitution intended, a salutary control, was an idle ceremony? How often, when acting on the case of the nominated successor, have we felt the injustice of the removal? How often have we said to each other, well, what can we do? The office cannot remain vacant without prejudice to the public interests; and, if we reject the proposed substitute, we cannot restore the displaced, and perhaps some more unworthy man may be nominated?

The Judiciary has not been exempted from the prevailing rage for innovation. Decisions of the tribunals, deliberately pronounced, have been contemptuously disregarded, and the sanctity of numerous treaties openly violated. Our Indian relations, coeval with the existence of the Government, and recognized and established by numerous laws and treaties, have been subverted; the rights of the helpless and unfortunate aborigines trampled in the dust, and they brought under subjection to unknown laws, in which they have no voice, promulgated in an unknown language. The most extensive and most valuable public domain that ever fell to the lot of one nation is threatened with a total sacrifice. The general currency of the country, the life-blood of all its business, is in the most imminent danger of universal disorder and confusion. The power of internal improvement lies crushed beneath the veto. The system of protection of American industry was snatched from impending destruction at the last session; but we are now coolly told by the Secretary of the Treasury, without a blush, "that it is understood to be conceded on all hands that a tariff for protection merely is to be finally abandoned." By the 3d of March, 1837, if the progress of innovation continue, there will be scarcely a vestige remaining of the Government and its policy, as they existed prior to the 3d of March, 1829. In a term of years, a little more than equal to that which was required to establish our liberties, the Government will have been transformed into an elective monarchy—the worst of all forms of government.

Such is a melancholy but faithful picture of the present condition of our public affairs. It is not sketched or exhibited to excite, here or elsewhere, irritated feeling: I have no such purpose. I would, on the contrary, implore the Senate and the people to discard all passion and prejudice, and to look calmly but resolutely upon the actual state of the constitution and the country. Although I bring into the Senate the same unabated spirit, and the same firm determination, which have ever guided me in the support of civil liberty, and the defence of our constitution, I contemplate the prospect before us with feelings of deep humiliation and profound mortification.

It is not among the least unfortunate symptoms of the times, that a large proportion of the good and enlightened men of the Union, of all parties, are yielding to sentiments of despondency. There is, unhappily, a feeling of distrust and insecurity pervading the community. Many of our best citizens entertain serious apprehensions that our Union and our institutions are destined to a speedy overthrow. Sir, I trust that the hopes and confidence of the country will revive. There is much occasion for manly independence and patriotic vigor, but none for despair. Thank God, we are yet free; and, if we put on the chains which are forging for us, it will be because we deserve to wear them. We should never despair of the republic. If our ancestors had been capable of surrendering themselves to such ignoble sentiments, our independence and our liberties would never have been achieved. The winter of 1776-'7, was one of the gloomiest periods of our revolution; but on this day, fifty-seven years ago, the father of his country achieved a glorious victory, which diffused joy, and gladness, and animation throughout the States. Let us cherish the hope that, since he has gone from among us, Providence, in the dispensation of his mercies, has near at hand in reserve for us, though yet unseen by us, some sure and happy deliverance from all impending dangers.

When we assembled here last year, we were full of dreadful forebodings. On the one hand, we were menaced with a civil war, which, lighting up in a single State, might spread its flames throughout one of the largest sections of the Union. On the other, a cherished system of policy, essential to the successful prosecution of the industry of our countrymen, was exposed to imminent danger of destruction. Means were happily applied by Congress to avert both calamities, the country was reconciled, and our Union once more became a band of friends and brothers. And I shall be greatly disappointed, if we do not find those who were denounced as being unfriendly to the continuance of our confederacy, among the foremost to fly to its preservation, and to resist all executive encroachments.

Mr. President, when Congress adjourned at the termination of the last session, there was one remnant of its powers—that over the purse—left untouched. The two most important powers of civil government are those of the sword and purse; the first, with some restrictions, is confided by the constitution to the executive, and the last to the legislative department. If they are separate, and exercised by different responsible departments, civil liberty is safe; but if they are united in the hands of the same individual, it is gone. That clear-sighted and revolutionary orator and patriot, Patrick Henry, justly said, in the Virginia convention, in reply to one of his opponents, "Let him candidly tell me where and when did freedom exist, when the sword and purse were given up from the people? Unless a miracle in human affairs interposed, no nation ever retained its liberty after the loss of the sword and the purse. Can you prove, by any argumentative deduction, that it is possible to be safe without one of them? If you give them up, you are gone."

Up to the period of the termination of the last session of Congress, the exclusive constitutional power of Congress over the Treasury of the United States had never been contested. Among its earliest acts was one to establish the Treasury Department, which provided for the appointment of a Treasurer, who was required to give bond and security, in a very large amount, "to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, recorded by the Register, and not otherwise." Prior to the establishment of the present Bank of the United States, no treasury or place had been provided or designated by law for the safe keeping of the public moneys, but the Treasurer was left to his own discretion and responsibility. When the existing bank was established, it was provided that the public moneys should be deposited with it, and consequently that bank became the treasury of the United States; for, whatever place is designated by law for the keeping of the public money of the United States, under the care of the Treasurer of the United States, is, for the time being, the treasury. Its safety was drawn in question by the Chief Magistrate, and an agent was appointed a little more than a year ago to investigate its ability. He reported to the Executive that it was perfectly safe. His apprehensions of its solidity were communicated by the President to Congress, and a committee was appointed to examine the subject: they, also, reported in favor of its security. And, finally, among the last acts of the House of Representatives, prior to the close of the last session, was the adoption of a resolution, manifesting its entire confidence in the ability and solidity of the bank.

After all these testimonies to the perfect safety of the public moneys in the place appointed by Congress, who could have supposed that the place would have been changed? Who could have imagined that, within sixty days of the meeting of Congress, and, as it were, in utter contempt of its authority, the change should have been ordered? Who would have dreamed that the Treasurer should have thrown away the single key to the treasury, over which Congress held ample control, and accepted, in lieu of it, some dozens of keys, over which neither Congress nor he has any adequate control? Yet, sir, all this has been done; and it is our solemn duty to inquire, 1st, by whose authority it has been ordered; and 2d, whether the order has been given in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The first question which I have intimated it to be my purpose to consider is, by whose authority, power, or direction, was the change of the deposits made? Now, is there any Senator who hears me that requires proof on this point? Is there an intelligent man in the Union who does not know who it was that decided the removal of the deposits? Is it not a matter of universal notoriety? Does any one, and who, doubt that it was the act of the President?—that it was done by his express command? The President, on this subject, has himself furnished perfectly conclusive evidence, in the paper read by him to his cabinet. It is, indeed, a most extraordinary document, without precedent in the executive annals of this or any other civilized country. If the proceeding were not unconstitutional, it was certainly such as was not contemplated by the constitution. That instrument confers on the President the right to require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officers of the executive departments, separately, on subjects appertaining to their respective offices. Instead of conforming to this provision, the President reads to those officers, collectively, his opinion and decision, in writing, upon an important matter which related only to one of them, and to him exclusively. This paper is afterwards formally promulgated to the world, with the President's authority. And why? Can it be doubted that it was done under the vain expectation that a name would quash all inquiry, and secure the general approbation of the people? Those who now exercise power in this country appear to regard all the practices and usages of their predecessors as wrong. They look upon all precedents with contempt, and, casting them scornfully aside, appear to be resolved upon a new era in administration. Yet, when hard pressed, they display a readiness to take shelter under any precedent, however ill adapted it may be to their condition. Although the President has denied to the Senate an official copy of that singular paper, as a part of the people of the United States, for whose special benefit it was published, we have a right to use it.

The question is, by virtue of whose will, power, dictation, was the removal of the deposits effected? By whose authority and determination were they transferred from the Bank of the United States, where they were required by the law to be placed, and put in banks which the law had never designated? And I tell gentlemen opposed to me, that I am not to be answered by the exhibition of a formal order bearing the signature of R. B. Taney, or any one else. I want to know, not the amanuensis or clerk who prepared or signed the official form, but the authority or the individual who dictated or commanded it; not the hangman who executes the culprit, but the tribunal which pronounced the sentence. I want to know that power in the Government, that original and controlling authority, which required and commanded the removal of the deposits. And, I repeat the question, is there a Senator, or intelligent man in the whole country, who entertains a solitary doubt?

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

Hear what the President himself says in his manifesto read to his cabinet: "The President deems it his duty to communicate in this manner to his cabinet the final conclusions of his own mind, and the reasons on which they are founded." And, at the conclusion of this paper, what does he say? "The President again repeats that he begs his cabinet to consider the proposed measure as his own, in the support of which he shall require no one of them to make a sacrifice of opinion or principle. Its responsibility has been assumed, after the most mature deliberation and reflection, as necessary to preserve the morals of the people, the freedom of the press, and the purity of the elective franchise, without which all will unite in saying that the blood and treasure expended by our forefathers, in the establishment of our happy system of government, will have been vain and fruitless. Under these convictions, he feels that a measure so important to the American people cannot be commenced too soon; and he therefore names the 1st day of October next as a period proper for the change of the deposits, or sooner, provided the necessary arrangements with the State banks can be made." Sir, is there a Senator here who will now tell me that the removal was not the measure and the act of the President? I know, indeed, that there are in this document many of those most mild, most gracious, most condescending expressions, in which power so well knows how to clothe its mandates. The President flatters, and coaxes, and soothes Secretary Duane, in the most gentle, bland, and conciliating language. "In the remarks," says the President, "he has made on this all-important question, he trusts the Secretary of the Treasury will see only the frank and respectful declaration of the opinions which the President has formed on a measure of great national interest, deeply affecting the character and usefulness of his administration; and not a spirit of dictation, which the President would be as careful to avoid as ready to resist. Happy will he be if the facts now disclosed produce uniformity of opinion and unity of action among the members of the administration." How kind! how gentle! and how very gracious all these civil and loving expressions must have sounded in the gratified ear of Mr. Duane! They remind me of an historical anecdote related of one of the most remarkable characters which our species has produced. When Oliver Cromwell was contending for the mastery in Great Britain or Ireland, (I do not remember which,) he besieged a certain Catholic town. The place made a brave and stout resistance; but, at length, being likely to be taken, the poor Catholics proposed terms of capitulation, among which was one stipulating for the toleration of their religion. The paper containing the conditions being presented to Oliver, he put on his spectacles, and, after deliberately examining them, cried out, "Oh, yea, granted, granted, certainly;" but he added, with stern determination, "if one of them shall dare to be found attending mass, he shall be instantly hanged," (under what section—whether the second or some other, I believe the historian does not relate.)

Thus the Secretary was told by the President that he had not the slightest wish to dictate—Oh! no; nothing was further from his intention; that he would carefully avoid; the President desired only to convince his judgment, but not at all to interfere with his free exercise of an authority exclusively confided to him. But what was the refractory Duane told in the sequel? If you do not conform to my wishes; if you do not surrender your own judgment, and act upon mine; if you do not effect the removal of these deposits within the short period prescribed by me, you shall quit your office. And what was the fact? This cabinet paper bears date the 18th September last. In the official paper, published at the seat of Government, through which the Executive promulgates its acts, intentions, and wishes to the people of the United States, on the 20th of the same month, two days only after the cabinet had been indoctrinated, it was stated, "We are authorized to state"—"authorized!"—this is the term which gave credit to the annunciation—"We are authorized to state, that the deposits of the public money will be changed from the Bank of the United States to the State banks, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made for that purpose, and it is believed they can be completed in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, in time to make the change by the 1st of October, and perhaps sooner, if circumstances should render an earlier action necessary on the part of the Government." We see, between the cabinet paper and this official article, not merely a coincidence of time, but of language, as if the same head had dictated, and the same pen had written both. The President names the 1st day of October, or sooner, if the necessary arrangements can be made; and the gazette announces the same 1st day of October, and perhaps sooner,

Removal of the Deposits.

if circumstances should render it necessary. Mr. Duane remained in office until the 23d of September, on which day he was dismissed. Is this not conclusive testimony that the measure was the President's; that he, not the Secretary of the Treasury, decided upon it; that it was resolved on whilst Mr. Duane was yet in office; and that it was formally announced to the world before his dismissal? As to the day of his dismissal, we have incontestable evidence in the letter addressed to him on the 23d of September by the President, in which, notwithstanding all the amicable, gracious, and affectionate language of the cabinet paper, the President says, "I feel constrained to notify you that your further services as Secretary of the Treasury are no longer required." On that same day, (the 23d,) Mr. Taney was appointed; and on the 26th, in conformity with the will of the President, he performed the clerical act of affixing his signature to the order for the removal of the deposits, and thus made himself a willing instrument to consummate what the sterner integrity of his predecessor disdained to execute. Such is the testimony, on one side, to sustain the proposition that the removal of the deposits was the President's own measure, determined on whilst the late Secretary was still in office, and against his will; and establishing, beyond contradiction, that the subsequent act of the present Secretary was in form ministerial, in substance the work of another. Can more satisfactory testimony be ever needed? Yet it is even still more complete. We have that of Mr. Duane, as if no single link in the chain should be left unsupplied. In a late publication from that gentleman, addressed to the American people, after giving a history of the circumstances which preceded and accompanied his appointment, and those which attended his expulsion from office, he says: "Thus was I thrust from office—not because I had neglected any duty; not because I had differed with the President on any other point of public policy; not because I had differed with him about the Bank of the United States; but because I refused, without further inquiry for action by Congress, to remove the deposits."

Is it possible that evidence can be more complete? Will any one, after this exhibition of concurring proof, derived directly from the President on one side, and from the late Secretary on the other, that the removal of the deposits was not only the President's own act, but was contrary to the will and judgment of the Secretary, who was himself removed because he would not remove them, for a single instant doubt on the subject? Can any one rise here, in his place, and assert that the removal was not accomplished by the President's authority or command?

And, now, sir, having distinctly seen whose measure this is, I shall proceed to inquire whether it has been adopted in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States. I repeat that it is not my purpose now to examine the reasons assigned for the act, further than as they may tend to show a right in the President to perform it. For if the President had no power over the subject; if the constitution and laws, instead of conveying to him an authority to act as he has done, required him to keep his hands off the public treasury, and confided its care and custody to other hands, no reasons can justify the usurpation. What power has the President over the public treasury? Is it in the bank charter? That gives him but two clearly defined powers: one to appoint, with the concurrence of the Senate, and to remove the Government directors; and the other, to order a scire facias when the charter shall be violated by the bank. There is no other power conferred on him by it. The clause of the charter relating to the public deposits declares, "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank, or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which case the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction." Can language, as to the officer who is charged with the duty of removing the deposits, be more explicit? The Secretary of the Treasury alone is designated. The President is not, by the remotest allusion, referred to. And, to put the matter beyond all controversy, whenever the Secretary gives an order or direction for the removal, he is to report his reasons—to whom? To the President? No! directly to Congress. Nor is the bank itself required to report its periodical condition to the President, but to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to Congress, through the organ of a committee. The whole scheme of the charter seems to have been cautiously framed with the deliberate purpose of excluding all intervention of the President, except in the two cases which have been specified. And this power, given exclusively to the Secretary, and these relations maintained between him and Congress, are in strict conformity with the act of September, 1789, creating and establishing the Treasury Department. Congress reserved to itself the control over that department. It refused to make it an executive department. Its whole structure manifests cautious jealousy and experienced wisdom. The constitution had ordained that no money should be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. It remained for Congress to provide how it should be drawn. And that duty is performed by the act constituting the Treasury Department. According to that act, the Secretary of the Treasury is to prepare and sign, the Comptroller to countersign, the Register to record, and, finally, the Treasurer to pay a warrant issued, and only issued in virtue of a prior act of appropriation. Each is referred to the law as the guide of his duty; each acts on his own separate responsibility; each is a check upon every other; and all are placed under the control of Congress. The Secretary is to report to Congress, and to each branch of Congress. The great principle of division of duty, and of control and responsibility—that principle which lies at the bottom of all free government—that principle, without which there can be no free government—is upheld throughout. So, in the bank charter, Congress did not choose to refer the reasons of the Secretary to the President; but, whenever he changed the deposits, the Secretary was commanded to report his reasons directly to Congress, that they might weigh, judge, and pronounce upon their validity.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

Thus it is evident that the President, neither by the act creating the Treasury Department, nor by the bank charter, has any power over the public treasury. Has he any by the constitution? None, none. We have already seen that the constitution positively forbids any money from being drawn from the treasury but in virtue of a previous act of appropriation. But the President himself says that "upon him has been devolved, by the constitution, and the suffrages of the American people, the duty of superintending the operation of the executive departments of the Government, and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed." If there existed any such double source of executive power, it has been seen that the Treasury Department is not an executive department; but that, in all that concerns the public treasury, the Secretary is the agent or representative of Congress, acting in obedience to their will, and maintaining a direct intercourse with them. By what authority does the President derive power from the mere result of an election? In another part of this same cabinet paper he refers to the suffrages of the people as a source of power independent of the constitution, if not overruling it. At all events, he seems to regard the issue of the election as an approbation of all constitutional opinions previously expressed by him, no matter in what ambiguous language. I differ, sir, entirely from the President. No such conclusions can be legitimately drawn from his re-election. He was re-elected from his presumed merits generally, and from the attachment and confidence of the people, and also from the unworthiness of his competitor. The people had no idea, by that exercise of their suffrage, of expressing their approbation of all the opinions which the President held. Can it be believed that Pennsylvania, so justly denominated the keystone of our federal arch, which has been so steadfast in her adherence to certain great national interests, and among others, to that of the Bank of the United States, intended, by supporting the re-election of the President, to reverse all her own judgments, and to demolish all that she had built up? The truth is, that the re-election of the President no more proves that the people had sanctioned all the opinions previously expressed by him, than, if he had had the king's evil or a carbuncle, it would demonstrate that they intended to sanction his physical infirmity.

But the President infers his duty to remove the deposits from the constitution and the suffrages of the American people. As to the latter source of authority, I think it confers none. The election of a President, in itself, gives no power, but merely designates the person who, as an officer of the Government, is to exercise power granted by the constitution and laws. In this sense, and in this sense only, does an election confer power. The President alleges a right in himself to superintend the operations of the executive departments from the constitution and the suffrages of the people. Now, neither grants any such right. The constitution gives him the power, and no other power, than to call upon the heads of each of the executive departments to give his opinion, in writing, as to any matter connected with his department. The issue of the election simply puts him in a condition to exercise that right. By the laws, not by the constitution, all the departments, with the exception of that of the treasury, are placed under the direction of the President. And, by various laws, specific duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, (such as contracting for loans, &c.,) are required to be performed under the direction of the President. This is done from greater precaution; but his power, in these respects, is derived from the laws, and not from the constitution. Even in regard to those departments other than that of the treasury, in relation to which by law, and not by the constitution, a control is assigned to the Chief Magistrate, duties may be required of them, by the law, beyond his control, and for the performance of which their heads are responsible. This is true of the State Department, that which, above all others, is most under the immediate direction of the President. And this principle, more than thirty years ago, was established in the case of Marbury against Madison. The Supreme Court, in that case, expressed itself in the following language:

"By the Constitution of the United States the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties, he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority, and in conformity with his orders.

"In such cases their acts are his acts; and, whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political. They respect the nation, not individual rights; and, being intrusted to the Executive, the decision of the Executive is conclusive. The application of this remark will be perceived by adverting to the act of Congress for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs. This officer, as his duties were prescribed by that act, is to conform precisely to the will of the President. He is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated. The acts of such an officer, as an officer, can never be examinable by the courts.

"But when the Legislature proceeds to impose on that officer other duties, when he is directed peremptorily to perform certain acts, [that is, when he is not placed under the direction of the President,] when the rights of individuals are dependent on the performance of those acts, he is so far the officer of the law, is amenable to the laws for his conduct, and cannot, at his discretion, sport away the vested rights of others.

"The conclusion from this reasoning is, that where the heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the Executive, merely to execute the will of the President, or rather to act in cases in which the Executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear than that their acts are only politically examinable. But where a specific duty is assigned by law, and individual rights depend upon the performance of that duty, it seems equally clear that the individual who considers himself injured, has a right to resort to the laws of his country for a remedy."

Although I am constrained to believe that the President has been mistaken in asserting that the duty has been devolved upon him by the constitution and by the suffrages of the American people to superintend the operation of the executive departments, and consequently to order the removal of the public deposits, if he deemed such removal was expedient, he is charged by the constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." And the question is, what does this injunction really import? It has been contended, under it, that the executive aid or co-operation ought not, in any case, to be given, but when the Chief Magistrate himself is persuaded that it is to be lent to the execution of a law of the United States; and that, in all instances where he believes that the law is otherwise than it has been settled or adjudicated, he may withhold the means of execution with which he is invested. In other words, this enormous pretension of the Executive claims that if a treaty or law exists, contrary to the constitution, in the President's opinion; or if a judicial opinion be pronounced in his opinion repugnant to the constitution, to a treaty, or to a law, he is not bound to afford the executive aid in the execution of any such treaty, law, or decision. If this be sound doctrine, it is evident that every thing resolves itself into the President's opinion. There is an end to all constitutional Government, and a sole functionary engrosses the whole power supposed hitherto to have been assigned to various responsible officers, checking and checked by each other. Can this be true? Is it possible that there is any one so insensible to the guarantees of civil liberty as to subscribe to this monstrous pretension? In respect even to affairs of ordinary administration, how enormous would it be! Various officers of Government are charged with the liquidation of most important accounts of contractors and others concerned in the disbursement, annually, of large sums of the public revenue. The rejection or allowance of a single item of these accounts may fix the fate of the contractor or disbursing agent. Hitherto this matter was supposed to be judicial in its nature, and beyond executive control; but let this new hereby be sanctioned, and the President may say to an Auditor or Comptroller, pass this, or reject that item in the account, (such is my opinion of the law;) and if you do not, I will remove you from office. Let this doctrine be once established, and there is an end to all regulated Government, to all civil liberty. It will become a machine simple enough. There will be but one will in the State; but one bed, and that will be the bed of Procrustes! All the departments, legislative, judicial, and executive, and all subordinate functionaries, must lie quietly on it; but it will be the repose of despotism and death.

Sir, such an enormous and extravagant pretension cannot be sanctioned. It must be put alongside of its exploded compeer, the power once asserted for Congress to pass any and all laws called for by "the general welfare."

The charter of the bank requires that the public deposits be made in its vaults. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to remove them; and why? Because he is placed by Congress at the head of the finances of the Government. Weekly reports of the condition of the bank are made to him; he is the sentinel of Congress, the agent of Congress, the representative of Congress, created by Congress; his duties are prescribed and defined by Congress. To them, and not to the President, he is to report. His vigilance is presumed to anticipate or promptly to perceive the existence of danger, and, when he discovers it, his duty is to provide for the safety of the public treasury, and forthwith to report to his principal. Standing in this responsible attitude to Congress, and to Congress alone, if the President may go to that officer, and tell him to do as he bids, or he shall be removed from office, what security remains to the people of this country?

But let me suppose that I am totally mistaken in this construction of the constitutional injunction, and that its true meaning is that the President has the power to superintend the execution of every particular law exactly as Congress intended it, what was it his duty to do in this case, under that interpretation of the constitution? The law authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, on his own responsibility, to remove the deposits. It commanded him, if he removed them, to report his reasons to Congress. The duty was confided to his judgment and discretion exclusively, and his judgment was to be guided by his own reasons, not those of any other; and they, and no other, were to be reported to Congress. Now, if the President was bound to take care that that law should be faithfully executed, then his duty exacted of him to see that the Secretary of the Treasury was allowed the exercise of his free, unbiased, and uncontrolled judgment in removing or not removing the deposits. That was the faithful execution of the law. Congress had not said that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy should remove them, but the Secretary of the Treasury. The President had no right, either by the constitution or the law, to go to the other Secretaries, and ask them how a service should be performed, which was confided exclusively to the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury. He might as well have asked the Secretary of the Treasury how a movement of the army should be made by the Secretary of War, as to have consulted this latter officer how a financial operation should be executed, not only not committed to him, but assigned exclusively to another. It was not to the President and all the Secretaries combined that the power was given to change the disposition of the public deposits. If the change were made, it was not their reasons for it which were to be reported to Congress. It was to the Secretary of the Treasury alone, exclusive of every other functionary of the Government, that the duty was specifically confined, and the measure was to be judged by Congress upon his, and not their reasons. Can it be said, then, in the language of the constitution, that the President "took care that the law was faithfully executed," when he took it altogether out of hands to which the law had confided it, and substituted another's will for the will of him who was expressly charged with the execution of the law?

What security have the people against the lawless conduct of any President? Where is the boundary to the tremendous power which he has assumed? Sir, every barrier around the public treasury is broken down and annihilated. From the moment that the President pronounced the words, "This measure is my own; I take upon myself the responsibility of it," every safeguard around the treasury was prostrated, and henceforward it might as well be at the Hermitage. The measure adopted by the President is without precedent. I beg pardon—there is one; but we must go down for it to the commencement of the Christian era. It will be recollected, by those who are conversant with Roman history, that, after Pompey was compelled to retire to Brundisium, Cæsar, who had been anxious to give him battle, returned to Rome, "having reduced Italy," says the venerable biographer, "in sixty days—[the exact period between the day of the removal of the deposits and that of the commencement of the present session of Congress, without the usual allowance of any days of grace]—in sixty days, without bloodshed." The biographer proceeds:

"Finding the city in a more settled condition than he expected, and many Senators there, he addressed them in a mild and gracious manner, [as the President addressed his late Secretary of the Treasury,] and desired them to send deputies to Pompey with an offer of honorable terms of peace, &c. As Metellus, the tribune, opposed his taking money out of the public treasury, and cited some laws against it—[such, sir, I suppose, as I have endeavored to cite on this occasion]—Cæsar said, 'Arms and laws do not flourish together. If you are not pleased at what I am about, you have only to withdraw. [Leave the office, Mr. Duane!] War, indeed, will not tolerate much liberty of speech. When I say this, I am renouncing my own right; for you, and all those whom I have found exciting a spirit of faction against me, are at my disposal.' Having said this, he approached the doors of the treasury, and, as the keys were not produced, he sent for workmen to break them open. Metellus again opposed him, and gained credit with some for his firmness; but Cæsar, with an elevated voice, threatened to put him to death if he gave him any further trouble. 'And you know very well, young man,' said he, 'that this is harder for me to say than to do.' Metellus, terrified by the menace, retired; and Cæsar was afterwards easily and readily supplied with every thing necessary for the war."

Mr. President, said Mr. C., the people of the United States are indebted to the President for the boldness of this movement; and, as one among the humblest of them, I profess my obligations to him. He has told the Senate, in his Message refusing an official copy of his cabinet paper, that it has been published for the information of the people. As a part of the people, the Senate, if not in their official character, have a right to its use. In that extraordinary paper he has proclaimed that the measure is his own, and that he has taken upon himself the responsibility of it. In plain English, he has proclaimed an open, palpable, and daring usurpation!

For more than fifteen years, Mr. President, I have been struggling to avoid the present state of things. I thought I perceived, in some proceedings during the conduct of the Seminole war, a spirit of defiance to the constitution and to all law. With what sincerity and truth, with what earnestness and devotion to civil liberty, I have struggled, the Searcher of all human hearts best knows. With what fortune, the bleeding constitution of my country now fatally attests.

I have nevertheless, persevered; and, under every discouragement, during the short time that I expect to remain in the public councils, I will persevere. And if a bountiful Providence would allow an unworthy sinner to approach the throne of grace, I would beseech Him, as the greatest favor He could grant to me here below, to spare me until I live to behold the people rising in their majesty, with a peaceful and constitutional exercise of their power, to expel the Goths from Rome; to rescue the public treasury from pillage; to preserve the Constitution of the United States; to uphold the Union against the danger of the concentration and consolidation of all power in the hands of the Executive; and to sustain the liberties of the people of this country against the imminent perils to which they now stand exposed.

THURSDAY, January 2, 1834.

The Public Deposits.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting the removal of the deposits, and the resolutions thereon offered by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. BENTON said he would take leave, before he took up the subject under debate, to vindicate an officer of the Senate who had been unjustly assailed, and who had not the right of speaking for himself. He alluded to the Secretary of the Senate, (Mr. Lowrie,) and to the threat publicly expressed in open debate by a Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) to move to expel him from his office if he should remove any of his clerks for their political opinions. The threat implied a knowledge or belief that the Secretary intended to make such removals; when, in point of fact, no such intention existed. The Secretary now had every clerk in his office who was in it when he came in many years ago. He was living in the utmost harmony with these clerks, and could not but feel himself deeply wounded by a threat, which raised an implication which had no manner of existence. Mr. B. said that an acquaintance of fourteen years with the Secretary enabled him to say that he was incapable of the dishonorable conduct attributed, by implication, to him; that he was a high exemplification of the character of a Christian and a gentleman, and would conscientiously discharge his duties to the Senate and his clerks, without the slightest regard to unmerited threats. Mr. B. also spoke of the animadversion which had been made at the same time, and for the same cause, upon an officer of another body, (the Clerk of the House of Representatives.) Mr. B. was a stranger to him, knew nothing of what he had done, had no opinions to give as to his conduct; but he would say, in vindication of the privileges of the House of Representatives, that the conduct of their clerk belonged to them, not to the Senate, and that it was unparliamentary for the Senate to take notice of it.

Mr. B. then proceeded to the order of the day, the resolutions submitted by a Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) on the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and asked for the reading of the resolutions.

The Secretary read them as follows:

"1. Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion; and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

"2. Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States, deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to Congress on the 3d day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient."

Mr. B. said that the first of these resolutions contained impeachable matter, and was in fact, though not in form, a direct impeachment of the President of the United States. He recited the constitutional provision, that the President might be impeached—1st, for treason; 2d, for bribery; 3d, for high crimes; 4th, for misdemeanors; and said that the first resolution charged both a high crime and a misdemeanor upon the President; a high crime, in violating the laws and constitution, to obtain a power over the public treasure, to the danger of the liberties of the people; and a misdemeanor, in dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury from office. Mr. B. said that the terms of the resolution were sufficiently explicit to define a high crime, within the meaning of the constitution, without having recourse to the arguments and declarations used by the mover in illustration of his meaning; but, if any doubt remained on that head, it would be removed by the whole tenor of the argument, and especially that part of it which compared the President's conduct to that of Cæsar, in seizing the public treasure, to aid him in putting an end to the liberties of his country; and every Senator, in voting upon it, would vote as directly upon the guilt or innocence of the President, as if he was responding to the question of guilty or not guilty, in the concluding scene of a formal impeachment.

We are then, said Mr. B., trying an impeachment! But how? The constitution gives to the House of Representatives the sole power to originate impeachments; yet we originate this impeachment ourselves. The constitution gives the accused a right to be present; but he is not here. It requires the Senate to be sworn as judges; but we are not so sworn. It requires the Chief Justice of the United States to preside when the President is tried; but the Chief Justice is not presiding. It gives the House of Representatives a right to be present, and to manage the prosecution; but neither the House nor its managers are here. It requires the forms of criminal justice to be strictly observed; yet all these forms are neglected and violated. It is a proceeding in which the First Magistrate of the republic is to be tried without being heard, and in which his accusers are to act as his judges!

Mr. B. called upon the Senate to consider well what they did before they proceeded further in the consideration of this resolution. He called upon them to consider what was due to the House of Representatives, whose privilege was invaded, and who had a right to send a message to the Senate, complaining of the proceeding, and demanding its abandonment. He conjured them to consider what was due to the President, who was thus to be tried in his absence for a most enormous crime; what was due to the Senate itself, in thus combining the incompatible characters of accusers and judges, and which would itself be judged by Europe and America. He dwelt particularly on the figure which the Senate would make in going on with the consideration of this resolution. It accused the President of violating the constitution, and itself committed twenty violations of the same constitution in making the accusation! It accused him of violating a single law, and itself violated all the laws of criminal justice in prosecuting him for it. It charged him with designs dangerous to the liberties of the citizens, and immediately trampled upon the rights of all citizens, in the person of their Chief Magistrate.

Mr. B. decanted upon the extraordinary organization of the Senate, and drew an argument from it in favor of the reserve and decorum of their proceedings. The Senate were lawgivers, and ought to respect the laws already made; they were the constitutional advisers of the President, and should observe, as nearly as possible, the civil relations which the office of adviser presumes; they might be his judges, and should be the last in the world to stir up an accusation against him, to prejudice his guilt, or to attack his character with defamatory language. Decorum, the becoming ornament of every functionary, should be the distinguishing trait of an American Senator, who combines, in his own office, the united dignities of the executive, the legislative, and the judicial character. In his judicial capacity especially, he should sacrifice to decorum and propriety; and shun, as he would the contagious touch of sin, and pestilence, the slightest approach to the character of prosecutor. He referred to British parliamentary law to show that the Lords could not join in an accusation, because they were to try it; but here the Senate was sole accuser, and had nothing from the House of Representatives to join; but made the accusation out and out, and tried it themselves. He said the accusation was a double one, for a high crime and a misdemeanor, and the latter a more flagrant proceeding than the former; for it assumed to know for what cause the President had dismissed his late Secretary, and undertook to try the President for a thing which was not triable or impeachable.

From the foundation of the Government, it had been settled that the President's right to dismiss his Secretaries resulted from his constitutional obligations to see that the laws were faithfully executed. Many Presidents had dismissed Secretaries, and this was the first time that the Senate had ever undertaken to found an impeachment upon it, or had assumed to know the reasons for which it was done.

Mr. B. said that two other impeachments seemed to be going on at the same time against two other officers, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Treasurer; so that the Senate was brimful of criminal business. The Treasurer and the Secretary of the Treasury were both civil officers, and were both liable to impeachment for misdemeanors in office; and great misdemeanors were charged upon them. They were, in fact, upon trial, without the formality of a resolution; and if hereafter impeached by the House of Representatives, the Senate, if they believed what they heard, would be ready to pronounce judgment and remove them from office, without further examination.

Mr. B. then addressed himself to the Vice President, (Mr. VAN BUREN,) upon the novelty of the scene which was going on before him, and the great change which had taken place since he served in the Senate. He commended the peculiar delicacy and decorum of the Vice President himself, who, in six years' service, in high party times, and in a decided opposition, never uttered a word, either in open or secret session, which could have wounded the feelings of a political adversary, if he had been present and heard it. He extolled the decorum of the opposition to President Adams's administration. If there was one brilliant exception, the error was redeemed by classic wit, and the heroic readiness with which a noble heart bared its bosom to the bullets of those who felt aggrieved. Still addressing himself to the Vice President, Mr. B. said that if he should receive some hits in the place where he sat, without the right to reply, he must find consolation in the case of his most illustrious predecessor, the great apostle of American liberty, (Mr. Jefferson,) who often told his friends of the manner in which he had been cut at when presiding over the Senate, and personally annoyed by the inferior—no, young and inconsiderate—members of the federal party.

Mr. B. returned to the point in debate. The President, he repeated, was on trial for a high crime, in seizing the public treasure in violation of the laws and the constitution. Was the charge true? Does the act which he has done deserve the definition which has been put upon it? He had made up his own mind that the public deposits ought to be removed from the Bank of the United States. He communicated that opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary refused to remove them; the President removed him, and appointed a Secretary who gave the order which he thought the occasion required. All this he did in virtue of his constitutional obligation to see the laws faithfully executed; and in obedience to the same sense of duty which would lead him to dismiss a Secretary of War, or of the Navy, who would refuse to give an order for troops to march, or a fleet to sail. True, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to direct the removal of the deposits; but the constitution makes it the duty of the President to see that the Secretary performs his duty; and the constitution is as much above law as the President is above the Secretary.

The President is on trial for a misdemeanor—for dismissing his Secretary without sufficient cause. To this accusation there are ready answers: first, that the President may dismiss his Secretaries without cause; secondly, that the Senate has no cognizance of the case; thirdly, that the Senate cannot assume to know for what cause the Secretary in question was dismissed.

The Secretary of the Treasury is on trial. In order to get at the President, it was found necessary to get at a gentleman who had no voice on this floor. It had been found necessary to assail the Secretary of the Treasury in a manner heretofore unexampled in the history of the Senate. His religion, his politics, his veracity, his understanding, his Missouri restriction vote, had all been arraigned. Mr. B. said he would leave his religion to the Constitution of the United States, Catholic as he was, and although "the Presbyterian might cut off his head the first time he went to mass." His understanding he would leave to himself. The head which could throw the paper which was taken for a stone on this floor; but which was, in fact, a double-headed chain shot fired from a forty-eight pounder, carrying sails, masts, rigging, all before it, was the head that could take care of itself. His veracity would be adjourned to the trial which was to take place for misquoting a letter of Secretary Crawford, and he had no doubt would end as the charge did for suppressing a letter which was printed in extenso among our documents, and withholding the name and compensation of an agent, when that name and the fact of no compensation was lying on the table. The Secretary of the Treasury was arraigned for some incidental vote on the Missouri restriction, when he was a member of the Maryland Legislature. Mr. B. did not know what that vote was; but he did know that a certain gentleman, who lately stood in the relation of sergeant to another gentleman, in a certain high election, was the leader of the forces which deformed Missouri of her place in the Union for the entire session which he first attended (not served) in the Congress of the United States. His politics could not be severely tried in the time of the alien and sedition law, when he was scarce of age, but were well tried during the late war, when he sided with his country, and received the constant denunciations of that great organ of federalism—the Federal Republican newspaper. For the rest, Mr. B. admitted that the Secretary had voted for the elder Adams to be President of the United States; but denied the right of certain persons to make that an objection to him. Mr. B. dismissed these personal charges for the present, and would adjourn their consideration until his trial came on, for which the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) stood pledged; and after the trial was over, he had no doubt but that the Secretary of the Treasury, although a Catholic and a federalist, would be found to maintain his station in the first rank of American gentlemen and American patriots.

Mr. B. took up the serious charges against the Secretary, that of being the mere instrument of the President in removing the deposits, and violating the constitution and laws of the land. How far he was this mere instrument, making up his mind in three days to do what others would not do at all, might be judged by every person who would refer to the opposition papers for the division in the cabinet about the removal of the deposits, and which constantly classed Mr. Taney, then the Attorney-General, on the side of removal. This classification was correct, and notorious, and ought to exempt an honorable man, if any thing could exempt him, from the imputation of being a mere instrument in a great transaction of which he was a prime counsellor. The fact is, he had long since, in his character of legal adviser to the President, advised the removal of these deposits; and when suddenly and unexpectedly called upon to take the office which would make it his duty to act upon his own advice, he accepted it from the single sense of honor and duty, and that he might not seem to desert the President in flinching from the performance of what he had recommended. His personal honor was clean; his personal conduct magnanimous; his official deeds would abide the test of law and truth.

Mr. B. said he would make short work of long accusations, and demolish in three minutes what had been concocting for three months, and delivering for three days in the Senate. He would call the attention of the Senate to certain clauses of law, and certain treasury instructions, which had been left out of view, but which were decisive of the accusation against the Secretary. The first was the clause in the bank charter which invested the Secretary with the power of transferring the public funds from place to place. It was the 15th section of the charter; he would read it. It enacted that whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the bank should give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States, or territories thereof; and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, &c.

Here is authority to the Secretary to transfer the public moneys from place to place, limited only by the bounds of the United States and its territories; and this clause of three lines of law puts to flight all the nonsense about the United States Bank being the treasury, and the Treasurer being the keeper of the public moneys, with which some politicians and newspaper writers have been worrying their brains for the last three months. In virtue of this clause, the Secretary of the Treasury gave certain transfer drafts to the amount of two millions and a quarter; and his legal right to give the draft was just as clear, under this clause of the bank charter, as his right to remove the deposits was under another clause of it. The transfer is made by draft; a payment out of the treasury is made upon a warrant; and the difference between a transfer draft and a treasury warrant was a thing necessary to be known by every man who aspired to the illuminating of a nation, or even to the understanding of himself. To make this clear, Mr. B. read extracts from the treasury instructions to banks of deposit in 1829, and from certain letters from the Treasurer of the United States to the cashier of the Bank of the United States in the month of November last, which would justify the issue of the transfer drafts, and quiet the alarms of all those who thought the Treasurer had forfeited the penalty of his bond, and the Secretary had violated the clause of the constitution which forbids money to be drawn from the treasury except upon warrants and under appropriation laws. They would show that the transfer drafts were not warrants; that they drew nothing from the treasury, but made a treasury in every place into which they carried money, within the limits of the United States or its territories, whether there was a branch of the United States Bank there or not.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

[Here Mr. B. read the Treasury instructions in relation to the transfer drafts to which he had referred.]

After reading these extracts, Mr. B. took a position, and defied all attacks to dislodge him from it. It was this: That a warrant for the payment of money out of the treasury must, in addition to other requisites, be countersigned by the Comptroller of the Treasury; and the bank is forbidden to pay, and pays at its peril, any warrant not so countersigned. The transfer draft is not so countersigned; the Comptroller does not so countersign it; yet the Bank of the United States paid these drafts, to the amount of two millions and a quarter, without the countersigning of the Comptroller, and, in so doing, admitted that the money was not drawn out of the treasury. This was conclusive, and put the Bank of the United States in the position of contradicting itself, and contradicting all its advocates, in the assumption that the bank is the treasury.

Mr. B. took a further view of what he called the new-fangled conception that the Bank of the United States was the treasury of the United States. It followed, from that doctrine, that where there was no branch of the United States Bank there could be no treasury, and no public moneys. Now, six or eight States of this Union had no branch; the three Territories had none; by consequence, no public money could be sent to those States and Territories. Again: the Bank of the United States was not obliged to establish a branch in a single State, only in the district of Columbia; so that if she withdraw her branches, no public money could be kept except in Philadelphia and Washington. He traced the origin of this assumption, that the bank was the treasury, to the great measure introduced by President Jackson in the first year of his administration for the protection of the treasury, which was, that the treasury warrant should be filed in the bank which paid the money. Before that time, the Treasurer issued his check on the bank for the money, and it was paid on his single check; since then, three other names must go to the bank with his; to wit: that of the Comptroller, that of the Register, and that of the Secretary of the Treasury; and this formed the true defence and security of the treasury. The Treasurer's bond for $150,000 was nothing to a man who would check for thirty millions in a year. President Jackson, in the first months of his administration, supplying the deficiencies of all his predecessors, applied the true remedy; Secretary Ingham wrote the circular; he (Mr. B.) had read extracts from it; it did high honor to the new administration. It put the treasury beyond the reach of being injured by any Treasurer. The Treasurer's check could not now draw one dollar without three other names upon it, and the filing of the warrant under the seal of the treasury. The bank is now to see the warrant, and to hold it; and because this warrant was formerly retained by the Treasurer, the bank thinks itself the treasury, because for six years it has had the treasury warrants, instead of the Treasurer's check. Mr. B. here commented upon the strangeness of fortune that President Jackson, who was the only President who had devised a true and impregnable safeguard for the treasury, should be charged for seizing it, and his conduct compared to that of Cæsar in pillaging the gold which Pompey, the Consuls, and the Senate, were silly enough to leave behind in the temple of Jupiter when they fled from Rome.

Mr. B. held that the Secretary of the Treasury was now acquitted; that the Treasurer himself was freed from the penalties of the act of 1789; that both were found to be borne out by law; and he regretted that these officers had not had an opportunity of showing to their accusers and judges the difference between a treasury warrant and a transfer draft, before sentence of condemnation had been passed upon them for mere defect of that knowledge.

Mr. B. proceeded to the second of the resolutions; and, to avoid all questions about order, he took leave to give notice that he should, at the proper time, move an amendment to that resolution, namely, to strike it all out, and to substitute another of a different import.

He considered this second resolution to be illegal, futile, and nugatory. Illegal, because it assumed an appellate jurisdiction over the act of the Secretary of the Treasury, in a case in which no right of appeal had been reserved to the two Houses of Congress in their joint legislative capacity, much less to the Senate alone. The act of the Secretary is definitive. His report to Congress is for their information, not for their revision. The condemnation of his reasons by either, or both Houses of Congress, cannot restore the deposits, or alter their destination. It will require a law, or a joint resolution, to do that.

The resolution was illegal, in assuming a jurisdiction over a subject of which the Senate had no cognizance. It was a single resolution, and could not legally be communicated to the House of Representatives. It was futile and nugatory, in leading to no action or practical result. It declared a naked proposition, but indicated no consequence resulting from it. It declared the Secretary's reasons to be insufficient and unsatisfactory; but did not say what was to be done with the Secretary, or with the deposits, if the Senate found them to be so. He would still remain Secretary, and the public moneys would still remain removed, whether the resolution was passed or rejected by the Senate. The mover seemed to foresee this objection, and to understand the unparliamentary character of his resolution, when he alluded to the effect which its adoption might have upon the public mind. He (Mr. B.) denied that the Senate was the place to adopt barren resolutions for popular effect. He doubted the propriety of the trial, and the success of the experiment. He remembered a case in which the Senate's condemnation had been the highest passport to public favor; and it might be that a vote on this resolution in favor of the bank might be equally unprofitable to the Senate which gave it, and to the bank which received it.

Mr. B. said, that, having got rid of the outworks which impeded his progress, he would arrive at the main point, and take up the subject which was more immediately before the Senate. For the sake of avoiding questions about order, he would give notice that he should submit, at the proper time, a motion in amendment of the second resolution under discussion, which amendment should be strictly appropriate, and naturally flowing from the course of the argument he should follow. And first, he would take leave to read a paper replete with facts and sentiments applicable to the present attitude of the Bank of the United States and the Government of the United States, though written thirty years ago, and a reference to which he should have frequent occasion to make. It was part of a letter from the great apostle of American liberty (Mr. Jefferson) to Albert Gallatin.

[Mr. KANZ, at the request of Mr. B., read the paper.]

This brief extract, Mr. B. said, soared above party politics, and averred the Bank of the United States to be hostile to the principles and to the form of our constitution; an assertion which would be proved to be true in the course of this debate. It recommended the people of the United States, while they were strong, to provide for the safety of their constitution, and to bring the great enemy of their liberty under subordination to the law, and to do it by depriving him of the public deposits, and thus reducing him to a level with State banks.

He would now take up one of the reasons for removing the deposits, which had become infinitely stronger since, for not restoring them. It was the expansion and contraction of currency. This was the vice of all banks, especially powerful ones, such as the Bank of England and that of the United States. To make fortunes for individuals connected with the bank—to favor gamblers in the stocks—was generally the object of these expansions and contractions; but political ends were sometimes the main object, and the acquisition of fortunes a secondary and subaltern one. Once, in a certain number of years, the cycle for these operations came on in England, and was always attended with the making and breaking of many fortunes.

The last operation of the kind in England was performed in 1824-'25, and Mr. Baring, who gave an account of it in the British House of Commons, described the effect to be such, that many millions changed hands, and men who, in a regular train of business, could have wound up with a clear estate of two hundred thousand pounds sterling, were left paupers on the hands of the parish. It was done by pouring out a flood of paper, lending money to everybody, then calling all in, and lending money to nobody but the favorites of the bank. This operation, Mr. B. said, had been three times performed in the United States by the present bank: first, in 1818-'19, from mercenary motives, to gamble in the stocks, and riot on the distresses of the country, and to make fortunes for the directors and their friends; once, in 1831-'32, to effect a political object, when nearly thirty millions of loans were made in a few months, and suddenly called for at the appearance of the bank veto message; but the happy termination of the presidential election stopped the progress of the contraction, and gave the community time to breathe. The removal of the deposits was the next great occasion; and, for the contraction and pressure at that time the bank began to prepare as soon as it was ascertained that the removal would be made. This was early in the last summer. Many circumstances, growing out of the state of the country, and the legislation of Congress, favored the operation. The shortened credits on the revenue bonds was about to take effect; the cash payments on a part of the imports came into play at the same time. A great accumulation of revenue on hand, which made large balances against other banks, in whose notes much of it was paid. All this made of themselves an unusually large demand for money in the commercial cities toward the close of the year. The bank took advantage of these circumstances to make her contraction the more violent upon the community. They prepared for it in secret for several months beforehand. The first great measure was to accumulate bills of exchange in the Atlantic cities, payable at a brief date, and all falling due about the same time. For this purpose a resolution was passed applicable to the "five western branches," as they were called, of the most insulting, degrading, and injurious nature. They were forbidden to purchase bills of exchange, except payable in one of the Atlantic cities, and with not more than ninety days to run. This extraordinary fact and extraordinary resolution was communicated to Congress in the report of the Government directors, which had been printed, and was now a part of our documents. It would be found at page 21 of the original report. Mr. B. called upon any member who stood in a relation to know the secrets of the bank to account for this extraordinary resolution, which prevented the western banks from dealing in exchange with one another, or giving any citizen a bill in one branch for his money at the place where another was, or taking from an exporter of western produce, or a drover, a bill payable in New Orleans or Charleston. He wished to hear a reason; to him the object stood revealed—it was to make a great accumulation of these bills in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, towards the close of the year, and thus to increase the demand among the merchants for money in those places, at the very moment that the bank intended to deny them all aid, and was to press them for former debts. The next great act of preparation on the part of the bank was incredible and diabolical—it was to dishonor its distant branch bank notes at that time, and thus render as unavailable as possible the masses of those notes which might be on hand.

Mr. B. regretted that he had to allude to this act without the proofs in hand. They had been called for, and furnished, and were now in the hands of the printer, and would be used by him on a future occasion; and he trusted that a proceeding would be had which would put the bank before a tribunal where the history of this incredible transaction would be brought to light. He alluded to a scire facias for the violation of the charter. He said that the notes of the branches had been dishonored at New York, at Baltimore, and at Mobile, about the same time; and that time, in the crisis of this contraction, and with such similarity of circumstances, as to announce that all was done with the connivance, if not with the orders, of the Bank of the United States. He denied that there was any possible assignable reason for dishonoring the distant branch notes at this time. The bank was full of specie, five millions more than it had in 1832, at which time it considered about six millions to be enough, and the president of the bank treated as a mere surplus about five millions, which had been parted with in a few months, the greater part being sold to France and England. Yet they were refused for near a week in New York, till the cashier of the branch could first write, and then fly, in person, to the mother bank, to get leave to receive them, perhaps about fifty thousand dollars; refused the same way in Baltimore, until a like communication could be had with the mother bank; and refused absolutely, and without explanation, at the bank in Mobile, which was too distant to communicate with the mother bank. Mr. B. said that he stated these facts from a mere sight of the letters which proved them; the proof would be before the Senate soon, and he should endeavor to fix public attention upon a transaction which he might qualify as diabolical and infernal. The result of the whole was, that, when all these circumstances growing out of the state of the country had made an unusual demand for money, when the bank had increased that demand by an extraordinary accumulation of bills of exchange, the contraction was commenced at the rate of several millions a month, including the bills at ninety days, and at the moment their own distant bank notes would have become unavailable in the hands of the holders, if it had not been for the energy of the Secretary of the Treasury, who coerced the payment of the branch notes, by those celebrated transfer drafts, for about two millions and a quarter, the view of which, and the fear of more to follow, compelled the Bank of the United States to relax her policy, permit her branch notes to be received as usual, and thus saved the community from the shock of an unconvertible currency.

Mr. B. had, he said, already demonstrated that the present pressure in the money market was not only unnecessary, but wanton. He would now proceed to prove that the curtailment, so reprehensible in itself, was conducted in a manner which was illegal, and violated the charter of the bank; and, in the next place, he would prove that the curtailment was unequal and partial in its character and operation. He hoped that he fully felt the responsibility which he undertook in making charges against any individuals, or bodies corporate out of this House; and it was from the thorough conviction that what he asserted could be proved, that he was induced to bring forward these charges; and, moreover, it was his intention to give the United States Bank a fair and full opportunity to vindicate itself from the charges, if they were unfounded.

First, the mode of curtailment was illegal. He repeated the words of the charter, stating that the business of the bank could not be transacted by less than seven directors, one of whom should be the president. These being the words, he held that the curtailment of twelve millions in five months was a portion of that business which could be legally transacted only by a board of directors. Now, sir, here is a paper that has come before us as a public document, and may be taken as evidence of the truth of what it contains till it is contradicted. [Mr. B. then read from the memorial of the Government directors a paragraph, and then said:]

made by the board of directors, nor even by a committee appointed by the board, but by the president. Yes, sir, this enormous pressure, which was to bear upon the whole community, was the work of one single individual. It appears that the removal of the deposits being supposed to be probable, the bank began to take steps to meet it, as early as May or June, by curtailing its business.

The Government directors give us an account, in a narrative of several pages, of the steps taken to get at the reduction to be made. He read, first, an order of the board, in May, directing a committee to report a plan of curtailment; and he remarked, so far, so good. That resolution he held to be a wise one, but that was by the board, and was legal. He read the resolution of the 18th of August, and the whole history of the curtailment, from the report of the Government directors. *

[Here Mr. B. read extracts from the report to show that the moneyed powers of the bank, confided by the charter to a Board of Directors, never to be less than one-half of the whole number, had been delegated to an exchange committee, of which the president of the bank was ex-officio one, and that he did the business of the committee himself, making great curtailments on the business community to create distress, and enormous loans to friends and favorites—$100,000 to one individual, and $1,100,000 continued to another for two years: and remarked upon them to show the wanton, wicked, and corrupt design of the curtailment and pressure which the bank was making.]

Although the board had the same day refused the paper of good men, merchants in the city, on the 12th day of August, when the curtailment was in full operation, the exchange committee, without the authority of the board, discounted one hundred thousand dollars to an individual, and refused the business paper of mercantile men, though well endorsed. He held that it was an improper partiality, at the very moment when the screws were turning on the merchants of Philadelphia, to make such a loan to an individual. Who was that individual? He figures at the head of a memorial praying for the restoration of the deposits. He was one of those who were busy in getting up public meetings and fac-simile memorials in favor of the restoration of the deposits, which were to be repeated, in showers, from every part of the country, like the memorials which, two years ago, we had in favor of the renewal of the charter. Could any thing be a more remarkable evidence of favoritism and partiality, than this screwing of one part of the community with one hand, and, with the other, pouring out favors upon those who were to aid the bank in getting up excitements, and sending memorials to Congress?

Mr. B. read again:

"Another instance was lately exhibited of the injustice arising from this unlimited and irresponsible power of the committee on exchange. The policy adopted by the board has caused curtailments in the loans to the community to a great extent. These ought at least to be general in their operation. Yet on a loan for a very large sum, secured on stock, being offered for renewal on the 8th of November, all reduction was refused, on the ground that it had been originally made by the committee on exchange, some years before, for an indefinite period, and that the faith of the bank was, therefore, pledged for its continuance. These resolutions, passed three years since, at a time when there was great abundance of money, 'authorized the committee on exchange to loan large sums on approved collateral securities.' Assuming, by virtue of these, a power which we believe the board never intended to confer, they have thus entered, it seems, into contracts which will extend to the termination of the charter, if not beyond it. These contracts, too, so far as we can learn, were not reduced to writing; in fact, the notes themselves were drawn at the usual short periods. It is now at least apparent that these proceedings were at variance with the true policy of the institution, and that they operated unequally on the community, whose interests ought to be impartially consulted."

The name of this individual was not given; but there were circumstances which would enable him (Mr. B.) to identify him. The committee appointed two years ago, to investigate the affairs of the bank, reported that a loan of eleven hundred thousand dollars was made at one time to a broker, who was a relative of the president of the bank; a loan, too, for an indefinite term of years, and at five per cent interest. This, sir, was the loan on which no reduction was to be made; a loan standing at five per cent., when the merchants were driven to the brokers for money at exorbitant premiums to maintain their credit. There was an entire class of debtors to the bank, who were not subjected at all to the curtailment; but they were politicians and friends, and men who were busy in getting up meetings, for the purpose of producing that instantaneous action which was to restore the deposits to the bank, without any examination into the truth of the charges made against it.

I trust, Mr. President, (continued Mr. B.) that I have now made out the case of illegality, partiality, favoritism, and violation of the charter, upon the testimony of a document which would stand before us, and before the American people, as true, until it should be disproved. He would not go further into the instances of favoritism: they were abundant, but time forbade the detail.

He wished now to say a word of the meetings everywhere getting up to influence Congress on the subject of the deposits—to coerce their "instantaneous restoration." He had ob-received that merchants were often engaged in these meetings. Allow me to say, sir, that my historical reading, and my professional studies, have led me to entertain an exalted opinion, and high respect for merchants as a body. He need not go back to the middle ages, when merchants were the founders of States, and raised the free cities of Italy to a level with kingdoms and empires. He would refer to the merchants of England and America, who had a potential voice with statesmen in all matters of finance and commerce. The opinions of such men, whenever expressed, would command from him respect and deference; but to maintain their right to that respect and deference, they must express the opinions of merchants and not of political partisans. Their meetings must be those of merchants, in which they speak and act for themselves, and not the meetings of lawyers and politicians, in which the merchants made no figure. In such meetings the voice coming from merchants was lost; it is their own fault, for merging their own high character in that of faction. The heat and passion of a political meeting was not their theatre, when they wished to enlighten the councils of the nation in matters of finance and commerce; and they must not think it amiss if they shared the fate of their company, and saw their opinions no better treated than those of lawyers and partisan politicians. Mr. B. then descanted, with some keenness, upon the fac-simile meetings which were getting up all over the United States, and adopting resolutions bearing the impress of the same mint to coerce Congress into "immediate action." He treated the motives of such meetings with considerable levity; made some cuts at lawyers and politicians, who could decide all the points connected with the immense question of removing and restoring the public deposits, without evidence, without facts, without hearing but a small piece of one side of the question, and then put forth their resolves to govern the opinion of the country. He said he should not pay much regard to such sudden verdicts, although they might be communicated by a procession of gowmen who should make a circuit round the city, like the soldiers of Joshua round the walls of Jericho, and deliver their resolves in a blast of rams' horns loud enough to blow down the walls of the Capitol.

The pressure in the money market, Mr. B. said, was a prevailing topic in all these resolutions and memorials sent to Congress; but the framers of those resolutions had no access to the great facts which showed the conduct of the bank in creating that pressure. They knew nothing of the order of restriction upon the western branches; the concerted accumulation of bills of exchange in the Atlantic cities; the extension of new loans to old favorites; the refusal to curtail friends, relations, and politicians; the immense amount of specie—five millions more than the president of the bank deemed a sufficiency two years ago; and above all, they knew nothing of the secret order, or connivance, from the bank to its principal branches to refuse to receive the notes of their distant sister branches; and that the transfer drafts, against which so much denunciation was directed, were the sole cause of compelling the bank to honor its own branch paper, and were put into the hands of the deposit banks for the sole purpose of being used, upon condition that the institution should refuse its branch paper, or wantonly oppress the community by unnecessary curtailments. Men acting in ignorance of all these things, said Mr. B., must not be astonished if those who do know them should attach but little weight to their elaborate resolutions.

A great issue, said Mr. B., is made up, and between great parties, and greatly affecting the property and liberty of the American people. It is an issue of fact. It is whether the Bank of the United States has unnecessarily curtailed its debts, and oppressed the community, and used its immense power over the money market to promote its own objects at the present time. The issue itself is a great one; the parties to it are eminent; they are the Government directors of the bank, who affirm it; the Secretary of the Treasury, who assigns it in his report on the removal of the deposits; and the President of the United States, who solemnly communicates the fact in his annual Message; these are the parties on one side: on the other stand the majority of the directors of the bank, denying the whole. The Senate has assumed to try this great issue; and how will they try it? By entering the arena, for and against the bank? By pleading like lawyers, and testifying as witnesses, and deciding as judges? Will they become compurgators for the bank? Will they enter the lists as champions, and that in a case in which the laws of chivalry do not admit of a champion? for the bank is neither a woman nor a priest. Will they convert the Senate into a bear garden, give and take contradictions, have a dog fight for the entertainment of the galleries, and acquit the bank by dint of numbers, without examination, and without trial?

Mr. B. held it to be impossible that the Senate of the United States could go on in this way, but that they were bound to proceed in the most solemn manner known to the history of parliamentary proceedings, namely, an examination of the president of the bank, and all other material witnesses, at the bar of the Senate. This, he said, was the course followed in England in similar conjunctures. It was done in the famous case of the South Sea directors; it was the proper course in all great national emergencies. It was the only way to obtain a PUBLIC TRIAL, such as the genius of our constitution delights in. Committees sat in secret; the public did not see how the committees acted. An examination at the bar of the Senate would be an open and public procedure. The people could judge as to the fairness and fulness of the trial; for he held it to be a part of the essence of all trials, in free countries, that the court should be open, that the people might judge the judges, while they judged the accused. Nothing less gave confidence to the results of trials, or better supported the tribunals in righteous judgments. This case, above all others, demanded such a public trial. The gravity and enormity of the accusation, the dignity of the parties making it, the high trust of the parties denying it, the elevation of the tribunal before which it was made, and the deep interest to their property and liberty, which involved the whole body of the American people in the most anxious suspense for a just and impartial decision. To the directors of the bank themselves, it should be the most desirable mode of proceeding. They should even demand it as a right. It will give them a voice on this floor. It will enable them to confront their accusers. It will give them such a trial as American citizens, free, and proud of their freedom, should aspire to have—open, public, fair; the Senate for judges, the American people for spectators and audience, and ultimate judges over all concerned. At the proper time, therefore, he (Mr. B.) should move to strike out the whole of the second resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) which undertook to pronounce judgment without trial, and to insert in place of it a resolution to summon Nicholas Biddle, president of the Bank of the United States, and such other persons as the Senate should direct, to appear at the bar of the Senate at some short and convenient day, to be examined upon oath as to the causes which led to the late large curtailment of the debts of the bank, and the manner of conducting that curtailment.

Mr. B. took up the next great reason assigned by the Secretary for removing the deposits; it was the interference of the bank in the politics and elections of the country. To this most serious charge, the bank, availing itself of a mode of practice known to some courts, but condemned in some others, puts in two pleas of contradictory tenor; that is to say, she pleads double; in one plea denying the truth of the accusation out and out, and in the other admitting it to be true, and justifying it. In a word, she pleaded not guilty, and justification. She should have the benefit of both pleas, and in her own words; for he (Mr. B.) would read them from the little book which the bank itself had prepared and furnished gratis to all the members of Congress, at the commencement of the present session. He had received one, would make his thanks for the favor in due form, and now proceed to use it.

[Here Mr. B. read copious extracts from the report of the Government directors, showing in detail, and to whom, enormous sums were paid for printing electioneering matter for the bank, and attacks and criticisms upon the members of Congress who opposed the recharter of the bank—among the rest the sum of $200 paid to a hack writer for a review of one of his (Benton's) speeches against the recharter of the bank, (in which the speech, of course, made a sad figure;) and the further sum of $1,830 27, to a bank editor for printing "upwards of 50,000 copies of the said review," and packing and distributing the same.]

Mr. B. resumed: The bare reading of this statement shows that the funds of the bank, under the direction of the president of the bank, have been used, and largely used, in supplying the public with electioneering matter. He would make no comments upon that evidence. It needed none. It was a case in which the truth, in this modest, unpretending form of evidence, would do its business upon the understanding without the aid of argument or illustration. He would call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that there was a material portion of the funds used under the resolutions which were wholly unaccounted for, and a knowledge of which the Government directors in vain endeavored to obtain. It seemed to be a secret-service fund, such as the ministers of crowned heads had at their disposal in the European monarchies, and which was to be used for purposes which would not bear the light. A portion of the money so used by the president of the bank—the one-fifth part of it, for the United States owned the one-fifth of the stock—belonged to the people of the United States. It would then result in this: that while the two Houses of Congress could not by law even spend a dollar of the people's money, without specifying the object, and accounting for the expenditure, the same people might have their money taken out of the Bank of the United States by the president of the institution, and applied to objects unknown and unknowable to the people; unknown and unknowable, in fact, to the guardians of their interests, whom they had stationed in the bank to watch their moneys for them.

Must such a bank have the further keeping of the public moneys? Is it not enough that it has so long had them for such incredible purposes? Is it not enough that it now has seven millions of the public money in its stock, which it wields as it pleases? Is it not enough that the whole amount of its notes are receivable in payment of the public dues, and derive a credit and circulation from that circumstance which enables them to traverse the continent, and pass from hand to hand, without calling at the doors of the bank for any part of that ten millions of specie which lies inactive in the vaults of the bank, while business men are screwed to the uttermost for the last dollar, and running from broker to broker to purchase money at any price, or any brief period that it can be obtained? Is not all this enough for such a bank, thus governed, without exacting the use of the future deposits for the two years it has to live?

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

Mr. B. said he had now finished the view which he proposed to take of the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the public deposits. He trusted that the facts and reasons which he had brought to bear upon the question, in addition to the intrinsic weight and palpable force of the Secretary's reasoning, were sufficient to show that the reasons assigned by him were sufficient to justify the act that he had done; at all events, that they ought not to be condemned as insufficient, without a rigorous investigation into their truth. This investigation was what he demanded; he did not want a verdict, either for or against the bank, without a trial. He believed that all those opposed to the bank were in favor of investigation. He considered the House of Representatives, as being the grand inquest of the nation, the appropriate branch of the Legislature for originating accusations, and particularly charged with the moneyed concerns of the people, to be the proper place for investigating the truth of the charges against the institution. He would prefer that the whole matter should be left in that House, which was now fully occupied with the subject; but the control of this subject was in the hands of the friends of the bank, and, if they would prosecute it here, he must demand investigation into the truth of the Secretary's reasons before they were condemned.

Mr. B. concluded with moving to strike out the second resolution, and insert "That Nicholas Biddle, president of the Bank of the United States, and — be summoned to appear at the bar of the Senate on the — day of —, then and there to be examined on oath, touching the causes of the late large curtailment of debts due to the Bank of the United States, and the manner of conducting the said curtailment; also, to be then and there examined touching the application of the moneys of the bank to electioneering and political objects."

The Deposit Question.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the resolutions of Mr. CLAY, on the subject of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, as the special order of the day:

Mr. CALHOUN said that the statement of this case might be given in a very few words. The 16th section of the act incorporating the bank provides that, wherever there is a bank or branch of the United States Bank, the public moneys should be deposited therein, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury; and that, in that case, he should report to Congress, if in session, immediately; and, if not, at the commencement of the next session. The Secretary, acting under the provisions of this section, has ordered the deposits to be withheld from the bank, and has reported his reasons, in conformity with the provisions of the section. The Senate is now called upon to consider his reasons, in order to determine whether the Secretary is justified or not. I have examined them with care and deliberation, without the slightest bias, as far as I am conscious, personal or political. I have but a slight acquaintance with the Secretary, and that little is not unfavorable to him. I stand wholly disconnected with the two great political parties now contending for ascendancy. My political connections are with that small and denounced party which has voluntarily wholly retired from the party strifes of the day, with a view of saving, if possible, the liberty and the constitution of the country, in this great crisis of our affairs.

Having maturely considered, with these impartial feelings, the reasons of the Secretary, I am constrained to say that he has entirely failed to make out his justification. At the very commencement, he has placed his right to remove the deposits on an assumption resting on a misconception of the case. In the progress of his argument he has entirely abandoned the first, and assumed a new and greatly enlarged ground, utterly inconsistent with the first, and equally untenable; and yet, as broad as his assumptions are, there is an important part of the transaction which he does not attempt to vindicate, and to which he has not even alluded. I shall now (said Mr. C.) proceed, without further remark, to make good these assertions.

The Secretary, at the commencement of his argument, assumes the position that, in the absence of all legal provision, he, as the head of the financial department, had the right, in virtue of his office, to designate the agent and place for the safe keeping of the public deposits. He then contends that the 16th section does not restrict his power, which stands, he says, on the same ground that it did before the passing of the act incorporating the bank. It is unnecessary to inquire into the correctness of the position assumed by the Secretary; but, if it were, it would not be difficult to show that when an agent, with general powers, assumes, in the execution of his agency a power not delegated, the assumption rests on the necessity of the case; and that no power, in such case, can be lawfully exercised which was not necessary to effect the object intended. Nor would it be difficult to show that, in this case, the power assumed by the Secretary would belong, not to him, but to the Treasurer, who, under the act organizing the Treasury Department, is expressly charged with the safe keeping of the public funds, for which he is responsible under bonds in heavy penalties.

But, strongly and directly as these considerations bear on the question of the power of the Secretary, I do not think it necessary to pursue them, for the plain reason that the Secretary has entirely mistaken the case. It is not a case, as he supposes, where there is no legal provision in relation to the safe keeping of the public funds, but one of precisely the opposite character. The 16th section expressly provides that the deposits shall be made in the bank and its branches; and, of course, it is perfectly clear that all powers which the Secretary has derived from the general and inherent powers of his office, in the absence of such provision, are wholly inapplicable to this case. Nor is it less clear that, if the section had terminated with the provision directing the deposits to be made in the bank, the Secretary would have had no more control over the subject than myself, or any other Senator; and it follows, of course, that he must derive his power, not from any general reasons connected with the nature of his office, but from some express provision contained in the section, or some other part of the act. It has not been attempted to be shown that there is any such provision in any other section or part of the act. The only control, then, which the Secretary can rightfully claim over the deposits, is contained in the provision which directs that the deposits shall be made in the bank, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury; which brings the whole question, in reference to the deposits, to the extent of the power which Congress intended to confer upon the Secretary, in these few words—"unless otherwise ordered."

In ascertaining the intention of Congress, I lay it down as a rule, which, I suppose, will not be controverted, that all political powers under our free institutions are trust powers, and not rights, liberties, or immunities, belonging personally to the officer. I also lay it down as a rule, not less incontrovertible, that trust powers are necessarily limited (unless there be some express provision to the contrary) to the subject, matter, and object of the trust. This brings us to the question—what is the subject and object of the trust in this case? The whole section relates to deposits—to the safe and faithful keeping of the public funds. With this view they are directed to be made in the bank. With the same view, and in order to increase the security, power was conferred on the Secretary to withhold the deposits; and, with the same view, he is directed to report his reasons for the removal to Congress. All have one common object—the security of the public funds. To this point the whole section converges. The language of Congress, fairly understood, is, we have selected the bank, because we confide in it as a safe and faithful agent, to keep the public money; but, to prevent the abuse of so important a trust, we invest the Secretary with power to remove the deposits, with a view to their increased security. And, lest the Secretary, on his part, should abuse so important a trust, and in order still further to increase that security, we direct, in case of removal, that he shall report his reasons. It is obvious, under this view of the subject, that the Secretary has no right to act in relation to the deposits, but with a view to their increased security; that he has no right to order them to be withheld from the bank so long as the funds are in safety, and the bank has faithfully performed the duties imposed in relation to them; and not even then, unless the deposits can be placed in safer and more faithful hands. That such was the opinion of the Executive, in the first instance, we have demonstrative proof in the Message of the President to Congress at the close of the last session, which placed the subject of the removal of the deposits exclusively on the question of their safety; and that such was also the opinion of the House of Representatives then, we have equally conclusive proof, from the vote of that body, that the public funds in the bank were safe; which was understood at that time on all sides, by friends and foes, as deciding the question of the removal of the deposits.

The extent of the power intended to be conferred being established, the question now arises—Has the Secretary transcended its limit? It can scarcely be necessary to argue this point. It is not even pretended that the public deposits were in danger, or that the bank had not faithfully performed all the duties imposed on it in relation to them; nor that the Secretary placed the money in safer or in more faithful hands. So far otherwise, there is not a man who hears me who will not admit that the public moneys are now less safe than they were in the Bank of the United States. And I will venture to assert, that not a capitalist can be found who would not ask a considerably higher percentage to insure them in their present, than in the place of deposit designated by law. If these views are correct, and I hold them to be unquestionable, the question is decided. The Secretary has no right to withhold the deposits from the bank. There has been, and can be, but one argument advanced in favor of his right, which has even the appearance of being tenable; that the power to withhold is given in general terms, and without qualification, "unless the Secretary otherwise direct." Those who resort to this argument must assume the position that the letter ought to prevail over the clear and manifest intention of the act. They must regard the power of the Secretary, not as a trust power, limited by the subject and the object of the trust, but as a chartered right, to be used according to his discretion and pleasure. There is a radical defect in our mode of construing political powers, of which this and many other instances afford striking examples; but I will give the Secretary his choice. Either the intention or the letter must prevail. He may select either, but cannot be permitted to take one or the other as may suit his purpose. If he chooses the former, he has transcended his powers, as I have clearly demonstrated. If he selects the latter, he is equally condemned, as he has clearly exercised power not comprehended in the letter of his authority. He has not confined himself simply to withholding the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, but he has ordered them to be deposited in other banks, though there is not a word in the section to justify it. I do not intend to argue the question whether he had a right to order the funds withheld from the United States Bank to be placed in the State banks which he has selected; but, I ask, how has he acquired that right? It rests wholly on construction, on the supposed intention of the Legislature, which, when it gives a power, intends to give all the means necessary to render it available. But, clear as this principle of construction is, it is not more clear than that which would limit the right of the Secretary to the question of the safe and faithful keeping of the public funds; and I cannot admit that the Secretary shall be permitted to resort to the letter, or to construction, as may best be calculated to enlarge his power, when the right construction is denied to those who would limit his power by the clear and obvious intention of Congress.

I might here (said Mr. C.) rest the question of the power of the Secretary over the deposits, without adding another word. I have placed it on grounds from which no ingenuity, however great, or subtlety, however refined, can remove it; but such is the magnitude of the case, and such my desire to give the reasons of the Secretary the fullest consideration, that I shall follow him through the remainder of his reasons.

That the Secretary was conscious that the first position which he assumed, and which I have considered, was untenable, we have ample proof in the precipitancy with which he retreated from it. He had scarcely laid it down, when, without illustration or argument, he passed with a rapid transition, and I must say, a transition as obscure as rapid, to another position, wholly inconsistent with the first; and, in assuming which, he expressly repudiates the idea that the safe and faithful keeping of the public funds had any necessary connection with his removal of the deposits; his power to do which he places on the broad and unlimited ground that he had a right to make such disposition of them as the public interest or the convenience of the people might require. I have said that the transition of the Secretary was as obscure as it was rapid; but, obscure as it is, he has said enough to enable us to perceive the process by which he has reached so extraordinary a position; and we may safely affirm, that his arguments are not less extraordinary than the conclusion at which he arrives. His first proposition, which, however, he has not ventured to lay down expressly, is, that Congress has an unlimited control over the deposits, and that it may dispose of them in whatever manner it may please, in order to promote the general welfare and convenience of the people. He next asserts that Congress has parted with this power, under the sixteenth section, which directs the deposits to be made in the Bank of the United States, and then concludes with affirming that it has invested the Secretary of the Treasury with it, for reasons which he professes to be unable to understand.

It cannot be necessary, before so enlightened a body, that I should undertake to refute an argument so utterly untrue in premises and conclusion; to show that Congress never possessed the power which the Secretary claims for it; that it is a power, from its very nature, incapable of such enlargement, being limited solely to the safe keeping of the public funds; that, if it existed, it would be susceptible of the most dangerous abuses; that Congress might make the wildest and most dangerous association the depository of the public funds; might place them in the hands of the fanatics and the madmen of the North, who are waging war against the domestic institutions of the South, under the plea of promoting the general welfare. But admitting that Congress possessed the power which the Secretary attributes to it, by what process of reasoning can he show that it has parted with this unlimited power, simply by directing the public moneys to be deposited in the Bank of the United States? or, if it has parted with this power, by what extraordinary process has it been transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury, by those few and simple words, "unless he shall otherwise order?" In support of this extraordinary argument, the Secretary has offered not a single illustration, or a single remark bearing the semblance of reason, but one, which I shall now proceed to notice.

He asserts, and asserts truly, that the bank charter is a contract between the Government, or rather the people of the United States, and the bank; and then assumes that it constitutes him a common agent or trustee to superintend the execution of the stipulations contained in that portion of the contract comprehended in the sixteenth section. Let us now, taking these stipulations to be true, ascertain what those stipulations are, the superintendence of the execution of which, as he affirms, are jointly confided by the parties to the Secretary.

The Government stipulated, on its part, that the public money should be deposited in the Bank of the United States—a great and valuable privilege, on which the successful operation of the institution mainly depends. The bank, on its part, stipulated that the funds should be safely kept; that the duties imposed in relation to them should be faithfully discharged; and that for this, with other privileges, it would pay to the Government the sum of $1,500,000. These are the stipulations, the execution of which, according to the Secretary's assumption, he has been appointed, as joint agent or trustee, to superintend, and from which he would assume the extraordinary power which he claims over the deposits, to dispose of them in such manner as he may think the public interest or the convenience of the people may require.

Is it not obvious that the whole extent of power conferred upon him, admitting his assumption to be true, is to withhold the deposits in case that the bank should violate its stipulations in relation to them on one side, and, on the other, prevent the Government from withholding the deposits, so long as the bank faithfully performed its part of the contract? This is the full extent of his power, according to his own showing; not a particle more can be added. But there is another aspect in which the position in which the Secretary has placed himself may be viewed. It offers for consideration not only a question of the extent of his power, but a question as to the nature and extent of duty which has been imposed upon him. If the position be such as he has described, there has been confided to him a trust of the most sacred character, accompanied by duties of the most solemn obligation. He stands, by the mutual confidence of the parties, vested with the high judicial power to determine on the infraction or observance of a contract, in which Government and a large and respectable portion of the citizens are deeply interested; and, in the execution of this high power, he is bound, by honor and conscience, so to act as to protect each of the parties in the full enjoyment of their respective portion of benefit in the contract, so long as they faithfully observe it. How has the Secretary performed these solemn duties, which, according to his representation, have been imposed upon him? Has he protected the bank against the aggression of the Government, or the Government against the unfaithful conduct of the bank in relation to the deposits? Or has he, forgetting his sacred obligations, disregarded the interests of both—on one side divesting the bank of the deposits, and, on the other, defeating the Government in the intended security of the public funds, seizing on them as the property of the Executive, to be disposed of at pleasure to favorite and partisan banks?

But I shall relieve the Secretary from this awkward and disreputable position, in which his own arguments have placed him. He is not the mutual trustee, as he has represented, of the Government and the bank; but simply the agent of the former, vested under the contract with power to withhold the deposits, with a view, as has been stated, to their additional security—to their safe keeping; and if he had but for a moment reflected on the fact that he was directed to report his reasons to Congress only, and not also to the bank, for withholding the deposits, he could scarcely have failed to perceive that he was simply the agent of one of the parties, and not, as he supposes, a joint agent of both.

The Secretary having established, as he supposes, his right to dispose of the deposits as in his opinion the general interest and convenience of the people might require, proceeds to claim and exercise power with a boldness commensurate with the extravagance of the right which he has assumed. He commences with a claim to determine, in his official character, that the Bank of the United States is unconstitutional—a monopoly—baneful to the welfare of the community. Having determined this point, he comes to the conclusion that the charter of the bank ought not to be renewed, and then assumes that it will not be renewed. Having reached this point he then determines that it is his duty to remove the deposits. No one can object that Mr. Taney, as a citizen, in his individual character, should entertain an opinion as to the unconstitutionality of the bank; but that he, acting in his official character, and performing official acts under the charter of the bank, should undertake to determine that the institution was unconstitutional, and that those who granted the charter and bestowed upon him his power to act under it had violated the constitution, is an assumption of power of a nature which I will not undertake to characterize, as I wish not to be personal.

But he is not content with the power simply to determine on the unconstitutionality of the bank. He goes far beyond; he claims to be the organ of the voice of the people. In this high character, he pronounces that the question of the renewal of the bank charter was put in issue at the last presidential election, and that the people had determined that it should not be renewed. I do not (said Mr. C.) intend to enter into argument whether, in point of fact, the renewal of the charter was put in issue at the last election. That point was ably and fully discussed by the honorable Senators from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) and New Jersey, (Mr. SOUTHARD,) who conclusively proved that no such question was involved in the issue; and if it were, the issue comprehended so many others, that it was impossible to conjecture on which the election turned. I look to higher objections. I would inquire by what authority the Secretary of the Treasury constitutes himself the organ of the people of the United States? He has the reputation of being an able lawyer, and can he be ignorant that, so long as the Constitution of the United States exists, the only organs of the people of these States, so far as the action of the General Government is concerned, are the several departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, which, acting within the respective limits assigned by the constitution, have a right to pronounce authoritatively the voice of the people? A claim on the part of the Executive to interpret, as the Secretary has done, the voice of the people, through any other channel, is to shake the foundation of our system. Has the Secretary forgotten that the last step to absolute power is this very assumption which he has claimed for that department? I am thus brought (said Mr. C.) to allude to the extraordinary manifesto read by the President to the cabinet, and which is so intimately connected with the point immediately under consideration. That document, though apparently addressed to the cabinet, was clearly and manifestly intended as an appeal to the people of the United States, and opens a new and direct organ of communication between the President and them, unknown to the constitution and to the laws. There are but two channels known to either through which the President can communicate with the people—by messages to the two Houses of Congress, as expressly provided for in the constitution; or by proclamation, setting forth the interpretation which he places upon a law it has become his official duty to execute. Going beyond, is one amongst the alarming signs of the times which portend the overthrow of the constitution, and the approach of despotic power.

The Secretary, having determined that the bank was unconstitutional, that the people had pronounced against the recharter, concludes that Congress had nothing to do with the subject. With a provident foresight, he perceives the difficulty and embarrassment into which the currency of the country would be thrown, on the termination of the bank charter; to prevent which, he proceeds deliberately, with a parental care, to supply a new currency, "equal to, or better," than that which Congress had supplied. With this view, he determines on immediate removal of the deposits; he puts them in certain State institutions, intending to organize them, after the fashion of the Empire State, into a great safety-fund system, but which, unfortunately, undoubtedly, for the projectors, if not for the country, the limited power of the State banks did not permit him to effect. But a substitute was found by associating them in certain articles of agreement, and appointing an inspector general of all this league of banks! and all this without law or appropriation! Is it not amazing that it never occurred to the Secretary that the subject of currency belonged exclusively to Congress, and that to assume to regulate it was a plain usurpation of the powers of that department of the Government?

Having thus assumed the power officially to determine on the constitutionality of the bank; having erected himself into an organ of the people's voice, and settled the question of the regulation of the currency, he next proceeds to assume the judicial powers over the bank. He declares that the bank has transcended its powers, and had therefore forfeited its charter, for which he inflicts on the institution the severe and exemplary punishment of withholding the deposits; and all this in the face of an express provision, investing the court with power touching the infraction of the charter, directing in what manner the trial should be commenced and conducted, and securing expressly to the bank the sacred right of trial by jury, in finding the facts. All this passed for nothing in the eyes of the Secretary, who was too deeply engrossed in providing for the common welfare to regard either Congress, the court, or the constitution.

The Secretary next proceeds to supervise the greatest operations of the bank, pronouncing with authority, that at one time it has discounted too freely and at another too sparingly, without reflecting that all the control which the Government can rightfully exercise over the operations of the institution is through the five directors who represent the Government in this respect. Directors! Mr. C. exclaimed; did I say? [alluding to the present,] No! spies is their proper designation!

I cannot (said Mr. C.) proceed with the remarks which I intended on the remainder of the Secretary's reasons; I have not patience to dwell on assumptions of power, so bold, so lawless, and so unconstitutional; they deserve not the name of argument, and I cannot waste time in treating them as such. There are, however, two, which I cannot pass over, not because they are more extraordinary or audacious than the others, but for another quality, which I choose not to designate.

The Secretary alleges that the bank has interfered with the politics of the country. If this be true, it certainly is a most heinous offence. The bank is a great public trust, possessing, for the purpose of discharging the trust, great power and influence, which it could not pervert from the object intended to that of influencing the politics of the country, without being guilty of a great political crime. In making these remarks, I do not intend to give any countenance to the truth of the charge alleged by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to deny to the officers of the bank the right which belongs to them, in common with every citizen, freely to form political principles, and act on them in their private capacity, without permitting them to influence their official conduct. But it is strange it did not occur to the Secretary, while he was accusing and punishing the bank on the charge of interfering in the politics of the country, that the Government also was a great trust, vested with powers still more extensive, and influence immeasurably greater than that of the bank, given it to enable it to discharge the object for which it was created; and that it has no more right to pervert its power and influence into the means of controlling the politics of the country than the bank itself. Can it be unknown to him that the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, (an officer in his own department,) the man who has made so prominent a figure in this transaction, was daily and hourly meddling in politics, and that he is one of the principal political managers of the administration? Can he be ignorant that the whole power of the Government has been perverted into a great political machine, with a view of corrupting and controlling the country? Can he be ignorant that the avowed and open policy of the Government is to reward political friends, and punish political enemies; and that, acting on this principle, it has driven from office hundreds of honest and competent officers for opinion's sake only, and filled their places with devoted partisans? Can he be ignorant that the real offence of the bank is not that it has intermeddled in politics, but because it would not intermeddle on the side of power! There is nothing more dignified than reproof from the lips of innocence, or punishment from the hands of justice; but change the picture—let the guilty reprove, and the criminal punish, and what more odious, more hateful can be presented to the imagination!

I have no doubt that the President removed the former Secretary, and placed the present in his place, expressly with a view to the removal of the deposits. I am equally clear, under all the circumstances of the case, that the President's conduct is wholly indefensible; and, among other objections, I fear he had in view, in the removal, an object eminently dangerous and unconstitutional—to give an advantage to his veto, never intended by the constitution; a power intended as a shield, to protect the executive against the encroachment of the legislative department; to maintain the present state of things against dangerous or hasty innovation, but which I fear is, in this case, intended as a sword to defend the usurpation of the Executive. I say I fear; for although the circumstance of this leads to a just apprehension that such is the intention, I will not permit myself to assert that such is the fact; that so lawless and unconstitutional an object is contemplated by the President, till his act shall compel me to believe to the contrary. But, while I thus severely condemn the conduct of the President in removing the former Secretary and appointing the present, I must say, that in my opinion it is a case of the abuse, and not of the usurpation of power. I cannot doubt that the President has, under the constitution, the right of removal from office: nor can I doubt that the power of removal, wherever it exists, does, from necessity, involve the power of general supervision; nor can I doubt that it might be constitutionally exercised in reference to the deposits. Reverse the present case; suppose the late Secretary, instead of being against, had been in favor of the removal; and that the President, instead of being for, had been against it, deeming the removal not only inexpedient, but under the circumstances, illegal; would any man doubt that, under such circumstances, he had a right to remove his Secretary, if it were the only means of preventing the removal of the deposits? Nay, would it not be his indispensable duty to have removed him? and, had he not, would not he have been universally and justly held responsible?

I have now (said Mr. C.) offered all the remarks I intended in reference to the deposit question; and, on reviewing the whole ground, I must say that the Secretary, in removing the deposits, has clearly transcended his power; that he has violated the contract between the bank and the United States; that, in so doing, he has deeply injured that large and respectable portion of our citizens who have been invited, on the faith of the Government, to invest their property in the institution; while, at the same time, he has deeply injured the public, in its character of stockholder; and, finally, that he has inflicted a deep wound on the public faith. To this last I attribute the present embarrassment in the currency, which has so injuriously affected all the great interests of the country. The currency of the country is the credit of the country; credit in every shape, public and private; credit, not only in the shape of paper, put that of faith and confidence between man and man; through the agency of which, in all its forms, the great and mighty exchanges of this commercial country, at home and abroad, are effected. To inflict a wound anywhere, particularly on the public faith, is to embarrass all the channels of currency and exchange; and it is to this, and not to the withdrawing the few millions of dollars from circulation, that I attribute the present moneyed embarrassment. Did I believe to the contrary—if I thought that any great and permanent distress would of itself result from winding up in a regular and legal manner the present or any other bank of the United States, I would deem it an evidence of the dangerous power of the institution, and, to that extent, an argument against its existence; but as it is, I regard the present embarrassment not as an argument against the bank, but as an argument against the lawless and wanton exercise of power on the part of the Executive—an embarrassment which is likely to continue long, if the deposits be not restored. The banks which have received them, at the expense of the public faith, and in violation of the law, will never be permitted to enjoy their spoils in quiet. No one, who regards the subject in the light in which I do, can ever give his sanction to any law intended to protect or carry through the present illegal arrangement. On the contrary, all such must feel bound to wage perpetual war against a usurpation of power so flagrant as that which controls the present deposits of the public money. If I stand alone, (said Mr. C.,) I, at least, will continue to maintain the contest, so long as I remain in public life.

TUESDAY, January 14.

The Deposit Question.

The Chair then announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits.

Mr. SHEPLEY, of Maine, desired to call to the recollection of the Senate the subject-matter under consideration. He understood it to be the removal of the deposits of the moneys of the United States from the Bank of the United States and its branches to other places, and the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for their removal, together with the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky upon that subject.

I had anticipated in this body (said Mr. S.) a calm, deliberate, and respectful consideration, both of the act of removal, and of the reasons offered by the Secretary for the removal. It being an act authorized by a law of Congress to be done, and it having been done as authorized by the law, I had supposed the reasons assigned for doing it might have received a fair consideration. But, sir, what have we heard? A fearful array of alarm and danger, as if the removal of a few millions of unexpended moneys in your treasury would destroy a commercial and banking capital of hundreds of millions, annihilate the credit, and involve all the wealth and industry of the country in one common ruin.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

But, as if this were not enough, we are alarmed with resolutions alleging assumptions of arbitrary power; with proclamations that our institutions were prostrated, the "constitution gone," and a revolution consummated. And, in addition to all this, we are to be intimidated by names, and epithets, and terms of reproach for the sacrifice of individual character, and honor, and fame. We are taunted with violations of the constitution and of law, and of official trust; and with epithets, charging dishonesty, falsehood, concealment, and the assumption of ungranted and arbitrary power, as if tyranny and monarchy were the designed objects of him whom the people have so recently elected to be the preserver and guardian of their liberties.

Sir, the question returns, were the deposits legally and constitutionally removed?

The proof of the power to remove is found in the charter and law, which provide that the moneys shall be deposited in the bank, "unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise direct." We have also the statement of the Secretary that he has otherwise directed, in pursuance of that law, and for reasons which he deemed satisfactory—the President's reasons, read to the cabinet the 18th September, giving to the people the reasons which induced him some months before to urge upon the department that step, and those reasons given with plainness, and openness, and candor, sufficient to entitle them to respectful and fair consideration. The result is, that the removal was made by the officer appointed by the law; that he did so in accordance with an act of Congress providing for it, and agreeably to the charter of the bank authorizing it; that the reasons are given as the law provides they should be; and, finally, that all this was done with the approbation of the President, and for the best interests of the country, as they judged; and the reasons of their judgment are open to the people and to Congress to judge of their sufficiency.

But, sir, the Senator who last spoke on this question complained of the President for giving his reasons to the people, on the ground that such a procedure opened a new channel of communication unknown to and unrecognized by the constitution. Why, sir, I did not know that our constitution had closed all communication between the President and the people who elect him. I thought it was but a following out the principles of our constitution to instruct and enlighten the people as to what was done under it.

But, sir, do not let it be supposed that I concede that there was any thing illegal in the removal of the former Secretary. I shall have occasion to consider that question in the course of my remarks. The plain and principal objection contained in the resolutions before the Senate is, "that the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

This is founded, sir, upon the supposition that there must have been a violation of the law—I mean enacted law. The charge is attempted to be maintained by calling to mind the organization of the Treasury Department. It is said that the treasury is organized upon a different principle from the rest of the departments. In what consists the difference? In name? A difference of name is to alter the power given by the constitution to the Executive! But even this position, based upon a difference of name, is untenable. In the next act passed by Congress, the treasury was called an executive department; and, among other officers of this executive department, was specified the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senator from New Jersey not only questioned the right of the Secretary to remove the deposits, but his power to place them elsewhere. He says that all the Secretary's power is derived from the act of 1789, and that his power has not been "enlarged or contracted since."

Sir, there has been a different grant of power—a grant which has invested the Secretary with a discretionary power. Strong as this assertion may appear, sir, it is a true one. It has pleased the Legislature to invest the Secretary with a discretionary power. I do not mean to enter into the consideration of the propriety of it. I take the laws as they are; and if there be blame anywhere, let it attach where it belongs, and not to the Secretary, that such discretionary power exists. I have alleged, sir, an alteration in the law relative to the power of the Secretary; now for the issue. I find, in an act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments, these words:

"An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments." Approved May 8, 1792.

Extract from the 6th section: "SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall superintend the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage as he shall judge best."

This act refers to him, and recognizes him as the head of the department. It gives him, also, a discretionary and superintending power. It tells him that he is to superintend the collection of the revenue, "as he shall judge best." Sir, what is comprehended in the term "superintending" the collection of the revenue? We all know that it is to collect debts—to take possession of moneys; and surely we must keep those moneys when we have taken pos-sion of them, unless we are particularly directed where to place them. If, then, a person is to collect debts, he is also to keep them, unless directed to the contrary. Again: do not the acts recognizing the Secretary as the head of the department give him also the power to direct others in the performance of their duties? The head of the department stands in the same relation to those around him as the head does to the members of the natural body. And, sir, in this state of the legal power—a discretionary power to collect, and of course to preserve when collected—what becomes of the grounds of the alarm which has been raised that the Secretary has assumed legislative power? Sir, they are all assertions, mere assertions—contradicted by the fact.

The Secretary has been censured because he thought it was singular that such a power should be intrusted to him, and that Congress had not legislated and informed him in what manner and where he was to have the money kept. I do not think it necessary now to inquire why provision was not made in this respect by law. Provision was not made until the United States Bank was selected; prior to that period no place was designated by law; and when the moneys are not deposited in that bank, but are directed by the Secretary not to be deposited there, there is again no place of deposit designated by law. But, sir, it has been alleged that the Treasurer is the only person who is entitled to take charge of the public moneys. He is the proper person, but he is to keep them subject to the control of the head of the department. The latter may order him in what place to keep them. The whole argument against the Secretary has proceeded on the assumption that he has taken the deposits out of the hands of the Treasurer, and kept them himself. He has never, sir, done this. The Secretary has never touched it, never contemplated the actual keeping of the money, but only told the Treasurer where he should keep it; and now there is much alarm of his abuse of power. But there is a distinction: instead of keeping it himself, under his own supervision, he tells the Treasurer the place, and tells him to keep it there. It is not out of the power or control of the Treasurer. It is said the Treasurer is responsible; and he is so, as he always has been, precisely; there is no change, save that the Treasurer is to keep it in a different vault from what he did. But he has no money if the Secretary may take it away, says the Senator from New Jersey. Who, sir, has taken it away, or proposed to take it away? The Secretary does not take it away; he only orders the Treasurer where to keep it in his own possession, that it may be most convenient and useful to the Government. It is not in the Treasurer's power, except as keeper; the Secretary cannot take it out of his keeping; the President cannot. It all resolves itself into this simple proposition, that there is no money taken out of the treasury.

It is by confounding propositions, and so plain as these, by making no distinction between taking money out of the treasury, and directing where it shall be placed in the treasury, that great misconduct is alleged, and ill language used, and imputations of base motives are cast upon the President and the Secretary, as if the money had been scooped out of the treasury, and carried off, instead of being in the Treasurer's keeping. It is only moved from one side of Chestnut street or State street to the other, being still in the treasury.

Sir, the Senator from South Carolina has argued that the Secretary claims the power to order the place of deposit, in the absence of legislation: but there is legislation; and, therefore, to take the money out of the United States Bank was an error, because he asserted there was no legislation, when there was. It is true there was legislation, that while it was in the bank it was to be kept there. But when the power of removal is used as the law provides, there is then an absence of legislation; and if the Senator meant to go further than this, he is in error. He also represents the Treasurer to have the power, and not the Secretary; but the Treasurer has no power to move or remove, but under the direction of the Secretary, as the head. He has power to keep it, but the place where is to be designated under the direction of the Secretary.

It is alleged by the Senator that the Secretary supposes Congress had the power to dispose of the moneys of the United States as the public interest and convenience might require; and that Congress, not having exercised that power, the Secretary had the power to dispose of it; and that he was in error in both his propositions: for if Congress had such power, the money might be applied to any fanatical scheme. Why, sir, Congress has the power of disposal; but it is controlled in its exercise by the proper objects of legislation; it may go so far, and no further. If all that was meant is, that Congress had no power to spend the money for improper purposes, or upon projects not within the legitimate sphere of legislation, I agree with him; that power is neither in Congress nor the Secretary. And the Secretary has not claimed for Congress or himself any such power. All he has claimed was a right, in the absence of legislation by Congress, to say where the money should be kept by the Treasurer. And here is the fallacy of the whole argument.

The removal of a former Secretary of the Treasury is another supposed assumption of arbitrary power; and his character has been lauded for the purpose of aggravating the alleged arbitrary and oppressive character of the act. Sir, I am of opinion that no laurels are to be gathered by us from the consideration of the fact that he ever was Secretary; and if there be any thing of praise or of glory to be gained by their taking his name and honor into their keeping, I wish them joy of the acquisition.

The right to remove the Secretary is denied by the Senator from Kentucky. The power of removal is given in that clause of the constitution giving the President the power to appoint all officers whose appointment is not otherwise provided for in the constitution. This power is not limited to the filling of vacancies, and, of course, carries the power of substitution. This construction was given to the constitution in the act creating the Treasury Department. The power now denied and denounced as tyrannical is expressly given in that law. It is as follows:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office of Secretary, the assistant shall, during the vacancy, have the charge and custody of the records, books, and papers appertaining to the said office."

The practice has been uniform; and this is a new doctrine, for present effect, not for future use. And this is the power, thus given in the constitution, sanctioned by Congress, and practised upon, that is denounced as oppressive, and as causing a revolution.

The power of the President to superintend and control the subordinate officers is not only denied, but also denounced as unconstitutional, tyrannical, and oppressive. It is said, if that power is in the President, then he is the whole of the Government: the Government then is a simple machine enough; it is the bed of Procrustes, to cut short and lengthen its victims at pleasure. I am for no enlarged construction of the constitution; for no accumulation of power in the Government of the Union; for no augmentation of power in the President; for none in Congress. I resist all augmentation of power by construction. I am for the constitution as it is; I have sworn to support it as it is; not expanded by internal improvement, American system, and a moneyed monopoly, till it stinks with repletion, and sinks in its own loathed rottenness; nor, on the other hand, compressed until it shall be a humble suppliant to the States for the air to breathe, and being denied, shall gasp and die.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17.

Inquiry into the Public Distress.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, offered by Mr. CLAY:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of affording temporary relief to the community from the present pecuniary embarrassment, by prolonging the payment of revenue bonds as they fall due, the obligors paying interest and giving satisfactory security.

The question being on the motion of Mr. FORSTER, to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That the Committee on Finance inquire into the extent and causes of the alleged distresses of the community, and into the propriety of legislative interference to relieve them."

[Mr. POINDEXTER spoke earnestly of the general distress of the country, and especially at New Orleans, and the ruinous depression of commerce and agriculture, attributing the whole to the removal of the deposits.]

Mr. BENTON said, that, with respect to the state of things existing in the city of New Orleans, as represented by the Senator from the State of Mississippi, he merely wished to give a brief explanation, derived from information contained in a letter dated December 19th, that he had received from a gentleman in that city. But first he would ask of the Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. WAGGAMAN,) if he knew the handwriting in the letter, and whether the writer was not a gentleman of character and standing.

The letter having been shown to Mr. W., Mr. POINDEXTER inquired whether the gentleman was not connected with one of the pet banks.

Mr. BENTON then referred the letter to Mr. POINDEXTER, who, on inspecting it, said that the writer was President of the Merchants' Bank of New Orleans, one of the banks selected to receive the public deposits.

Mr. BENTON resumed. The letter he said was from a respectable merchant, well acquainted with the commercial transactions of his city. He gives a very satisfactory account of the cause which had produced distress in New Orleans. In the first place, the Branch Bank there received a peremptory order from the mother Bank at Philadelphia, directing its discounts to be reduced one million of dollars. In the next place, the Branch refuses to buy the best endorsed paper at sixty days, or to take any bill whatsoever on the West. Then the Branch buys, without limitation, bills on the North; being in conformity to what he had stated when he last addressed the Senate on the subject. And, lastly, in speaking of the causes of pressure in the money market, the gentleman says: "You are well aware that about the 1st of January and the 1st of March, in consequence of the bills for the purchase of produce being made payable at those times, a great scarcity of money was occasioned among the merchants." Now, sir, said Mr. B., we have the whole of the causes which have produced the distress existing in New Orleans; and to meet this distress there is a peremptory order to the Branch Bank to reduce its discounts—to refuse good paper and to buy largely bills on Philadelphia for the purpose of producing as great a distress among her merchants as possible.

Removal of the Deposits.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of Mr. CLAY's resolutions on the removal of the deposits; when

Mr. RIVES, of Virginia, said: The subject we are considering, is admitted, on all hands, to be one of the highest importance, deriving an especial interest from the distress and embarrassment which are said at the present moment to pervade the community. In regard to the extent of that distress, it may, and probably has been exaggerated, and it is destined, I trust, above all, to be of transitory duration. But that it has existed, and still exists to a very considerable extent, there can be no doubt; and we are now called upon to investigate the causes of the evil, and to apply a suitable and effectual remedy. But, in the performance of this office, let us be careful not to mistake a mere symptom for the disease itself, and by an empirical practice addressed to the momentary palliation or removal of the one, to add to and confirm the violence and danger of the other.

For myself, sir, I believe that the disease is far more deeply seated than the honorable mover of the resolutions now under consideration supposes. It has its origin in the vices of our own legislation, and will require the cautery and the knife for its extirpation. I am not less sensible, I trust, sir, than other gentlemen, to the sufferings of any portion of my fellow-citizens, but I must say that the present crisis, whatever be its severity, comes alleviated by one high consolation. It is calculated to awaken, and I trust it will awaken, all of us to the true nature and dangerous character of that formidable moneyed power which we have built up by our own laws, and which now sits enthroned upon our statute book in the pride of chartered prerogative. Sir, we have heretofore been singularly deaf to the monitory lessons delivered to us by our fathers and predecessors. In vain did the republican statesmen of '91 warn us of the fatal consequences of this "first transgression" of the sacred limits of the constitution—in vain did Mr. Jefferson, in that prophetic passage which was read to us the other day by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BEXTON,) tell us that of all possible institutions "this was the one of most deadly hostility against the principles and form of our constitution," and that if permitted to exist, it would one day reduce the constituted authorities of the nation themselves under vassalage to its will. In vain, sir, did the eloquent voice of the Senator from Kentucky himself, (Mr. CLAY,) on another occasion, warn us that this corporation, though then wielding less than one-third of its present capital and resources, was fraught with the most serious "danger to our liberties"—liberties which the honorable Senator seems now to think can be preserved only by upholding this same corporation against the just animadversions of the public functionaries appointed to supervise it. Sir, all these warnings have been unheeded by us, till the distresses which it has now wantonly inflicted upon the country, with the obvious design of influencing and controlling our proceedings here, must have brought home to all of us, I trust, a deep conviction of the danger and capacities of mischief inherent in this great monopoly.

It will hardly now be contended, I presume, by any gentleman who has taken the trouble to examine the subject, that the present distress is the necessary consequence of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. It has been expressly admitted, in a quarter entitled to the highest consideration, not only from the distinguished eminence of the gentleman himself, but from the special relation in which he stands to the bank, [Mr. R. here alluded to the speech of Mr. Binney in the House of Representatives,] that the removal of the deposits per se is not a sufficient or justifiable cause for the present distress—that this removal is a thing which might happen, and had happened before in the history of the bank, without producing any distress or inconvenience to the community. Sir, a removal of the public deposits from the bank happens, in effect, whenever an application of the public moneys to the public debt, or to the current expenses of the Government, exhausts the amount which is to the credit of the United States in Bank. If we are to credit the book which the bank itself has laid on our desks, (the report of its committee on the exposition of the President to his Cabinet,) a removal of the deposits, in this way, has occurred at a very recent period, without leading to any pressure on the community. The bank informs us, in that document, that in the month of March last, when the protested bill on the French Government returned upon it, there was, after deducting the advances it had made on that bill, "less than two thousand dollars of the whole funds of the Government in the bank!" And yet it appears from its monthly returns that, notwithstanding this exhaustion of the public deposits, it was at that time actually enlarging, instead of curtailing its discounts.

Sir, if the removal of the deposits has produced the late severe and grinding pressure, upon the community, there is a singular disproportion indeed, between the cause and the effect. It appears from statements now before me, that, on the 1st day of August last, when the bank commenced its curtailments, the amount of public deposits in its vaults was $7,599,841; on the 1st of December, that amount was still $5,162,259, making a diminution of $2,437,582 only. By the returns of the bank, it is shown that on the 1st of August its discounts amounted to $64,160,849. On the 1st of December they were $54,453,104, making a reduction of discounts, in four months, of near ten millions, to meet a diminution of deposits of less than two and a half millions; and this by an institution which, according to its own showing, had not only not reduced, but actually enlarged its discounts, at a time when the public deposits in its vaults had, by rapid and large diminutions, been brought down to "less than two thousand dollars!"

It is clear, then, that the removal of the deposits alone has not produced the existing distress. But it was the removal of the deposits connected (as we are told, from the same authentic quarter already referred to) with the doctrine that the operations of the Government and the business of the community, can henceforward be carried on without the Bank of the United States—it was the intention manifested “of separating the people from the bank, and the bank from the people,” as it is expressed, which produced the convulsion. We are then to presume, that it was to put down this doctrine—to demonstrate the dependence of the Government and nation on this great institution—to show that the people cannot be “separated” from it without ruin and confusion—that all this distress has been visited upon the country.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

With like views, doubtless, an exhibit was presented of the annual operations of the bank in the various forms of exchange, domestic and foreign, discounts, circulation of notes, &c.; showing the extent, the alarming extent, to which this institution has mixed itself up with, and acquired a control over, the ordinary business and interests of the country. Sir, if there be gentlemen here who do not see in this exhibit a most fearful revelation of the power and influence of the bank, they have, I confess, much firmer nerves than I can pretend to. It appears from this portentous paper, that the operations of the Bank of the United States, in domestic exchanges alone, under one form or another, during the year 1832, amounted to - - - $241,717,910
In foreign exchange, - 18,456,787

Total amount of exchange, $255,174,647

Two hundred and fifty-five millions one hundred and seventy-four thousand and six hundred and forty-seven dollars!

To which must be added the loans and discounts of the bank, which averaged in that year, - - - $66,871,849

And the circulation of notes of the bank, averaging for the same year, $30,309,343

Now, sir, I would ask every candid and reflecting man if an institution enjoying such a monopoly as this, of the general commerce and circulation of the country, incorporating itself, as it has been its policy to do, with the ordinary transactions of the community to so fearful an amount, exercising, consequently, a control over the fortunes and interests, the fears and hopes, of so many persons—if such an institution does not wield a power of the most tremendous and alarming character—a power altogether unchecked by the State banks, for the Senate will recollect the significant statement made by the president of the bank to a committee of this House in 1830, that “there are very few banks (State) which might not be destroyed by an exertion of the power of the bank (U. S.)” Sir, sooner or later, evil, dire evil, must have come, of so tremendous a power, unchecked and irresponsible, concentrated in the hands of a great moneyed corporation. It is well that “by an exertion of that power,” so significantly vaunted, and now so wantonly put in practice, we have been aroused to a sense of our danger, before it is too late to provide for our security.

The true seat of the disease with which the body politic is affected, is here: it is in the existence of this powerful, remorseless, and overshadowing monopoly. What, then, is the remedy? Is it by succumbing to its dictation, to add to its power by restoring the deposits, (the grand panacea proposed to us,) to increase its resources for future annoyance, to enlarge its means of influence, and multiply the chances of perpetuating its existence? Sir, if we have not firmness to resist the panic which the bank has made a pretext of the removal of the deposits for creating, how much less shall we be able to bear the more serious pressure for which it will find a real and operative cause in the expiration of its charter, when, to provide for its returning circulation, and the payment of its stockholders and its depositors, it must call in, instead of ten millions, the whole sixty or seventy millions of debt due to it? Sir, can any one have been so unreflecting as to suppose that we should ever be able to throw off the frightful incubus of this bloated monopoly, without a bitter and painful struggle? Has the experience of 1811, when the charter of the first bank of the United States expired, been entirely forgotten? Then, as now, the same scene of bringing forward the State banks in Philadelphia, as advocates on behalf of the United States Bank, was gotten up, with this honorable distinction in favor of the present times, that then all of those banks came forward at the bidding of the United States Bank, now, some five or six of them have had the firmness to refuse. Then there were not only memorials from boards of trade, and public meetings, as now, but there were formal deputations sent to this place, to lay their complaints before Congress, and a committee of this body was appointed to hear and investigate them. Then, too, there was a pause in the operations of trade; and the products of agriculture sustained a depression, of which the fact then stated in Congress, that flour had fallen in a few days from ten to seven dollars, may serve as a set-off to all that we have heard on this floor, for some days past, concerning the ominous decline in the price of cotton. But, sir, our predecessors had the firmness to stand up against all this terrorism, and to regard the cause of the constitution and the public liberty as dearer to the American people than the transitory state of the money market.

I hope, sir, we shall follow their example. If we yield to the panic with which we are now assailed, and restore the deposits, which the bank has, by its misconduct, justly forfeited, the triumph of this dangerous and unconstitutional institution is complete, and its re-charter virtually decided. Do we not all here feel that these questions are one and the same? Does not the whole course of the arguments we have heard on the modus operandi of the removal of the deposits in producing the existing distress, and in what manner their restoration would tend to relieve it, show that neither the removal nor the restoration are regarded, except as signs expressing the termination or renewal of the bank charter; and that, in truth, it is the bank itself, and not the deposits, which is in issue? Restore the deposits, and what will happen? Another sudden and great expansion of discounts by the bank, bringing more and more of the community within its power, and at the end of two years when its charter expires, if any resistance should then be offered to its renewal, we shall find ourselves in the merciless gripe of another bank contraction, far more agonizing than one we now endure—a crisis to which our courage and principles must certainly prove inadequate, if we have not the firmness to meet the present trial. On the other hand, if the deposits, being withdrawn, are permitted to remain so, the bank will see in that resolution its own fate finally determined—with such an admonition, it will go on gradually to prepare for the winding up of its affairs, (for, happily, it will not have it in its power to inflict further injury on the community, without doing still greater injury to its own interests,) the State Banks at the same time, will be enabled progressively to extend their accommodations, and we shall finally get rid of this tyrannical and unconstitutional monopoly, at the expense of no other suffering than that to which we have already been subjected.

It is in view of this great consummation, Mr. President, the final extinction of this dangerous and unconstitutional moneyed corporation, overshadowing alike the Government and the people, that I, for one, am willing to let the measures which have been taken have their course.

Sir, of all the reforms, social, political, or economical, required by the great interests of the country, that which is most urgently demanded, and which promises in its accomplishment the largest results of utility, security, and public benefit, is, beyond comparison, the restoration of the Government to what it was intended by the framers of the constitution to be, a hard-money Government. We are too much in the habit, Mr. President, of regarding the evils of the paper system as necessary and incurable, and of being content with the delusive palliation of those evils supposed to be derived from the controlling supremacy of a National Bank. Nothing, in my opinion, is more demonstrable than that the great evil of that system, its ruinous fluctuations arising from alternate expansions and contractions of bank issues, making a lottery, in effect, of private fortunes, and converting all perspective contracts and transactions into a species of gambling—nothing can be more certain than that these ruinous fluctuations (and we have a striking proof of it in the present distresses of the country) are increased, instead of being diminished, by the existence of an institution of such absolute ascendancy, that when it expands the State Banks expand with it; when it contracts, those banks are forced in self-defence to contract also. Whatever influence such an institution may be supposed to exert, in preserving the soundness of the currency, that object would be much more effectually promoted by a return, as far as practicable, to a metallic circulation. The first step towards that return is to let the Bank of the United States go down. Its notes being withdrawn, the convenience of travelling alone would immediately create a demand for gold coins, as a substitute, and enforce the necessity of correcting that under-valuation of them at the mint, which is said to have contributed to their disappearance. In concurrence with this, let measures be taken, as it is believed effectual measures may be taken, to discourage and suppress the circulation of bank notes under a certain denomination, (ten or twenty dollars,) of which the effect would be, to produce another accession to the metallic circulating medium. The ordinary channels of circulation being thus supplied with gold and silver, the Government would be prepared, without hardship to the public creditor, to require payment of its dues in specie, and thus realize a reform, than which none could be more deeply interesting, in every aspect, to the safety and prosperity of the country.

Sir, here is an object worthy to engage the most anxious labors of the patriot and statesman, and I feel persuaded that, with a tithe of the effort and talent daily expended in the ephemeral contests of party, he should see it happily accomplished. I conjure gentlemen, then, with ability so eminently fitted for this great work, to leave the Bank of the United States to its fate—a fate already pronounced by the voice of the nation, and called for by the highest considerations connected with the safety of our free institutions—and bring forward their powerful aid in an effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination—that of a simple, solid, hard-money Government.

But I shall doubtless be asked, Mr. President, if, in this instance, the public faith has been broken, and the rights of the bank violated, will I not repair the breach, and redress the wrong? Sir, if such were the case, I would, but in my humble judgment, and I hope to be able to show it, the public faith has sustained no violation—the bank no wrong; and this brings us to the consideration of the rights of the bank, as secured by its charter. Gentlemen have argued as if the bank, by the bonus which it paid, of a million and a half of dollars, had purchased a right to the deposits of the public money. But nothing is more obvious, from the face of the bank charter itself, and especially from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Dallas,) which transmitted and explained it, than that the bonus was the consideration, not for the public deposits, but for the charter grant—for the act of incorporation, conferring on the subscribers to that bank the faculties and privileges of a body politic and corporate, empowered, as such, to carry on the trade of banking with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, to hold property to the amount of fifty-five millions, to make by-laws for the Government of the corporation, to establish offices of discounts and deposit in any of the States or Territories of the Union, and for the express stipulation, pledging the faith of the United States that no other bank should be established by Congress during the continuance of the said corporation.

These evidently were the "exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by the act" of incorporation, "in consideration of which" the bonus was to be paid,—and were they not of value enough, Mr. President, of a character sufficiently important to merit and justify the price to be paid for them? Why, sir, among them is a great sovereign power granted to this corporation, that of establishing subordinate banks within the jurisdiction of the States, independent of the consent, and exempt from the legislation of the States in which they may be established—a power which Mr. Madison declared, in the debates on the creation of the first bank in 1791, "ought not to be delegated to any set of men under the sun." The deposit of the public moneys in the Bank of the United States can with no propriety be considered "an exclusive privilege or benefit conferred on the Bank of the United States by the act of incorporation;" inasmuch as that act expressly reserves to the Government, by its financial officer, the power to deposit the public moneys in other banks, if it should think proper to do so.

Let, sir, the document I have already referred to, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting to Congress the plan of the bank, be examined, and nothing can appear clearer than that the true and fundamental contract between the Government and the bank is that which I have stated—the grant of the important corporate faculties and privileges already mentioned, on the one side, and the payment of the bonus on the other. The provisions in regard to the deposit of the public moneys by the Government, and the transfer and distribution of them by the bank, were treated as being of an "incidental kind," and regarded in the light of "mutual equivalents," (the one a compensation for the other,) growing out of "the fiscal connection between the bank and the public treasury." So long as the public moneys should be deposited in the Bank of the United States, the bank would be bound to transfer and distribute them as the exigencies of the Government should require. When they ceased to be deposited there, the bank would be relieved from that obligation. The deposits being reserved under the discretionary control of the Government, which could continue or withhold them at its pleasure, could not rationally form a part of the consideration, for which a fixed and unchangeable equivalent was to be paid in the form of a bonus.

From this general review of the conduct of the bank in its various relations to the public, I hope I have shown, Mr. President, that it, at least, has no just cause to complain of the animadversion with which it has been visited in the removal of the public deposits. I trust also, sir, that I have shown that in the act of the Secretary of the Treasury, ordering that removal, there was no want of legal authority. Here, then, believing as I do, that our highest duties to the constitution and to the public liberties forbid our doing any thing, not required by law and justice, which would tend to strengthen this dangerous and unconstitutional institution, (and such, I think, would be the inevitable tendency of a restoration of the deposits,) I might have been content to terminate my view of the subject. But grave questions of constitutional law have been made in regard to the rights and powers of the Chief Executive office on this occasion, which ought not to be shunned. Questions of this sort, whenever they arise, should be firmly met, and fully and fairly canvassed, as nothing can be of deeper interest to the people and to the States of this confederacy, than the ascertainment of the true principles of that constitution which they have "ordained and established."

I will now, Mr. President, examine the several positions taken by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) in relation to this question of constitutional power. The honorable Senator affirms that, by what has been done with regard to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, the Executive has usurped the power over the Treasury and the public purse, which the constitution has exclusively vested in the Legislative Department. In enforcing this position, sir, he has presented to us, with his characteristic eloquence, the alarming consequences of a union of the power of the sword and of the purse in the same hands. As no topic is better calculated to arouse the jealousies of a free people than this, it becomes us to analyze and examine it, and to see how far it has any just application to the subject under consideration. Sir, it is a great maxim of constitutional liberty, in that country from which we have derived so many of our institutions, that the powers of the sword and the purse should be kept separate and distinct; and as the maxim comes to us from thence, we cannot better ascertain its scope and meaning, than by seeing how it is understood and practised there. In England, the power of the sword is in the hands of the King. He can declare war, make peace, raise armies, equip fleets. But the supplies for the prosecution of the war, for the support of the army and navy, can be obtained only by a vote of Parliament; and thus the power of the purse is lodged in the hands of the representatives of the people. This is considered the great security of English liberty—that the King who holds the power of the sword, has no power over the public purse. But what is this power of the purse, which is thus jealousy and wisely withheld from the Executive Magistrate! Why, sir, evidently the power of drawing money from the pockets of the people, and of designating the objects to which it shall be applied.

The power of the purse, then, of which we have heard so much in the course of this discussion, and so much, I must be permitted to say, that is vague and indeterminate, is, in the true constitutional sense, the power of taxation and appropriation—the power of raising money by taxes, of determining in what manner and to what amount they shall be raised, and to what objects they shall be applied. This great power, here, as in England, is exclusively vested, as it ought to be, in the immediate representatives of the people. The constitution expressly declares that “Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts,” &c., and that “no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.” These are the provisions of the constitution which confer and define the power of the purse. But while the general powers to raise and appropriate money for the public service were vested in Congress, it certainly never could have been intended that Congress itself was to collect, to receive, to keep, to disburse, the public money. These are subordinate ministerial functions, which must, of necessity, be performed by Executive agents, under the general provision of the law. In England, sir, where, as we have seen, the power of the purse is fully and effectually vested in Parliament, it is, nevertheless, the Exchequer and the Treasury, Executive departments, which manage the collection and expenditure of the public revenue, under authority of law. So with us, sir, the ministerial functions of collecting, receiving, keeping, disbursing the public money, have been invariably devolved on the Executive officers of the Government.

It is true, sir, that Congress, in the exercise of its legislative powers, may and ought to, (as far as is consistent with the public interests, which might in certain cases require a discretionary power to be lodged with the Executive,) prescribe a place of deposit for the public moneys, when collected; but if no such prescription be made by the legislative authority, it devolves necessarily on the Executive department charged with the collection and safe-keeping of the public moneys, to determine where they shall be deposited and kept. Such was the case, in the most unlimited sense, previous to the passage of an act in 1800, which required that, at certain places, the bonds taken for the payment of duties should be deposited in the Bank of the United States, or its branches, for collection. Before that time, the Treasury Department caused the public moneys to be deposited wheresoever it thought proper—in some instances in the hands of public officers; in others, in the State Banks, and in others again, in the Bank of the United States and its branches. This it did at its perfect discretion, without its ever being imagined that, in so doing, it encroached on that power of the purse, which the constitution had lodged in other hands.

When the present Bank of the United States was established, its charter contained a provision that the deposits of the public money should be made in it or its branches, unless the Secretary should, at any time, otherwise order and direct. If the Secretary of the Treasury, in the exercise of the discretion thus reserved to him by law, should order the public moneys to be deposited elsewhere, he certainly usurps no legislative power over the public purse. He merely executes a subsidiary trust in regard to the place of keeping the public moneys, which has been expressly confided to him by the legislative department itself.

But, sir, it has been argued that by the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, with the provision above mentioned, the bank was, in effect, constituted the Treasury of the United States, and that, in removing the public deposits from the bank, money had been drawn from the Treasury, in violation of the constitutional declaration on that subject. If the act incorporating the bank could, by possibility, have had the effect attributed to it, of converting the bank, by some strange metamorphosis, into the national Treasury, still it became the Treasury sub modo only—that is, only so long as the Secretary might not order the public moneys to be deposited elsewhere. When the Secretary should order the public moneys to be deposited elsewhere, then, in virtue of the very provision referred to, the bank ceased to be the Treasury. But there is a total want of logical precision in this notion of the Treasury. The error is in annexing an idea of fixed locality to it; whereas, in the true constitutional and financial sense, it is not a place, but a state or condition. It is the condition of moneys belonging to the Government, and being in the custody or legal possession of the officer charged with their safe-keeping. Wherever moneys are placed to the credit, and subjected to the control, of the public Treasurer, there they are, both in legal and in common intendment, in the public Treasury.

In a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made on the 9th of January, 1811, I find the term used in such a way as to show conclusively the sense in which it is habitually employed in the finances of the Government. A resolution had been adopted by the House of Representatives, on the 19th December, 1810, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, among other things, to report “what will be the probable amount of the deposits in favor of the United States in any of the said banks,” (United States and State,) “or their branches, and which of them, on the 1st of March, 1811.” The Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to this call, reported: “It is probable the amount of specie in the Treasury will, on the 1st day of March next, exceed $2,500,000, and that the proportion deposited in the banks, other than that of the United States and its branches, will not materially vary from what it is at present." Here we see, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Treasury speaks of the whole of this sum, though distributed in various banks, both of the United States and the States, as being in the Treasury, because, whether in one or the other, it was equally in the legal custody and under the control of the Treasurer.

A similar illustration is furnished by the very law establishing the Treasury Department. The 4th section of that act declares that "all receipts for moneys received by him" (the Treasurer) "shall be endorsed upon warrants signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, without which warrant so signed no acknowledgment for money received into the public Treasury shall be valid." Here, it will be perceived that the receipt given by the Treasurer (endorsed on the warrant signed by the Secretary of the Treasury) is treated as synonymous with receipt into the public Treasury. When the Treasurer thus executes his receipt, the money, wherever it may be, stands to his credit and is subject to his control, and is consequently in the public Treasury. It continues in the public Treasury so long as it stands in his name, though, in the mean time, it may be repeatedly shifted from place to place; and it goes out of the Treasury only when it passes from him to some creditor of the Government, to whom it is paid under a warrant of disbursement. Another illustration of the same kind is furnished by that clause of the act which makes it the duty of the Treasurer, on the third day of every session of Congress, to "lay before them a true and perfect account of the state of the Treasury;" by which, certainly, it is not meant that he should lay before Congress an account of the state of any bank or other place where the public moneys may be deposited, but "the amount of the public moneys, wheresoever deposited."

In regard to the other portion of the honorable Senator's (Mr. CLAY) observations, touching the abuses which the President might commit, in saying first to one, and then to another Secretary, that if you will not do so and so, I will turn you out of office, I can only say that the argument comes just forty-five years too late. In the very first Congress which met under the constitution, it was decided, upon the fullest consideration, that the President, according to the true principles of that instrument, possessed the power of removal from office, and that power was expressly recognized in the acts constituting the Executive Departments. The very argument which the honorable Senator now uses, and every other which he has so earnestly pressed on this branch of the subject derived from possible abuses, was then repeatedly and strongly urged against the power of removal in the President. But they were all overruled, on the ground that the constitution, in "vesting the Executive power in the President," had made him responsible for the conduct of the Executive officers employed under him, whom, therefore, he ought to have the power to control, and that this responsibility of the President, thus established, was, in fact, to use the language of Mr. Madison, the highest security "for liberty and the public good."

But, sir, this matter deserves a fuller examination, and brings under review some opinions expressed by the honorable Senator a few days ago, which, as they involve the fundamental theory of the constitution in regard to the Executive branch of the Government, I will proceed to consider more in detail. The honorable Senator took especial exception to the principle asserted by the President in the paper read by him to his cabinet—"that the constitution has devolved upon him the duty of superintending the operation of the Executive Departments." He contended that the constitution had given him no such power—that by law those departments may, and in certain cases have been, placed under the superintendence and direction of the President—that so far, and no farther, he has, by law, the superintendence of their operations; but that the constitution has devolved on the President no right of superintendence over the Executive Departments.

Now, sir, on this assertion, I must respectfully join issue with the honorable Senator; and I call to witness the fathers of the constitution, and those who have had the largest and most enlightened experience in the administration of its highest trusts. The fundamental theory of the constitution, in regard to the Executive power, is, 1st, its unity, 2dly, its responsibility; to secure which last, in an undivided and the most efficient manner, was the great argument in favor of the first. In Governments of the monarchical kind, the Executive head is exempt from all responsibility. But in our republican constitution, the chief Executive Magistrate is under a triple responsibility, through the medium of election, of impeachment, and of prosecution in the common course of law. He is not only responsible for his personal acts, but the "Executive power being vested in him," he is responsible for the whole Executive Department; and this responsibility of the President was considered the great security for the proper and safe administration of that Department. Mr. Madison, in the debates which took place in '89 on the President's power of removal, said, "It is evidently the intention of the constitution that the First Magistrate should be responsible for the Executive Department." Again, in the course of the same debate, he said, "The principle of unity and responsibility in the Executive Department, is intended for the security of liberty and the public good."

The President being thus responsible by the constitution for the conduct of the Executive officers, he has, from the constitution, also, as a necessary consequence, the right to inspect, superintend, and control their proceedings; and this right of superintendence is expressly and repeatedly recognized, on constitutional grounds, in the great debate in the first Congress, to which I have already referred. I will give a few only, of many similar extracts, in which it will be seen that this right of superintendence, as a constitutional right, is distinctly and unequivocally asserted. Mr. Madison said: "Is there no danger that an officer, when he is appointed by the concurrence of the Senate, and has friends in that body, may choose to risk his establishment on the favor of that branch rather than rest it upon the discharge of his duties to the satisfaction of the Executive branch, which is constitutionally authorized to inspect and control his conduct?"

Mr. Lawrence: "In the constitution, the heads of Departments are considered as the mere assistants of the President in the performance of his executive duties. He has the superintendence, the control, and the inspection of their conduct," &c., &c.

Mr. Ames: "The executive powers are delegated" (of course, by the constitution) "to the President, with a view to have a responsible officer to superintend, control, inspect, and check the officers necessarily employed in administering the law."

We see, then, Mr. President, that throughout these debates, which, as a contemporaneous exposition, as well as from the distinguished ability of the men who participated in them, must be regarded as an authority of the highest order, that the right of the President to superintend the Executive Departments, was treated as a right flowing from the fountain of the constitution itself, and existing anterior to, and independent of legislative provision. Sir, that this is the true character of the right, nothing could more strikingly show than the form in which the question of the Presidential power of removal was finally settled by the Congress, whose debates are here referred to. In the original shape of the bills for the organization of the Executive Departments, it was provided that such and such Secretaries should be appointed, "to be removable by the President." It was suggested, however, that a clause of this sort might be considered as implying that the power of removal was granted by the law. To preclude such an influence, it was proposed to substitute a mere incidental recognition of the power, serving to show that the power was considered a pre-existing one, derived from the constitution and not from the law; and this was done in the section providing for cases of vacancy in the head of the Department, by a simple declaration, that "whenever the principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," the chief clerk shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of the records, &c., &c., of the department. The original clause was stricken out, and this incidental recognition of the power substituted, as will be seen by reference to the acts constituting the Executive Departments; and this was done expressly on the ground, which the language sufficiently imports, that the power of removal from office by the President, was a pre-existing power, flowing from the constitution, and not derived from the law. The power of superintendence, involved in that of removal, stands, as we have seen, on the same ground.

Sir, I beg leave now to call the attention of the Senate to an authority which, as that of one of the earliest and most uncompromising foes of tyranny, and the great champion of popular rights, as he is the acknowledged founder of the democratic party in this country, cannot fail, I trust, to command the respect of those who, like the honorable Senator from Kentucky, profess to be fighting the battles of liberty on this floor. I allude, of course, to Mr. Jefferson. While no one more steadily opposed the undue accumulation of power in the hands of the chief Executive Magistrate, it will be seen that no one more unequivocally maintained the constitutional right of the President to superintend and control the action of the Executive Departments. I will read, sir, an extract from a letter addressed by him to M. de Tracy, the author of an able and enlightened commentary on the great work of Montesquieu. He is expressing his difference of opinion from M. de Tracy on the question of a plural or single Executive, declares a decided preference for the latter, and after appealing to the history of the French Directory to show the evils and disadvantages of the former, he proceeds to notice the organization of our single Executive thus:

"The failure of the French Directory, and from the same cause, seems to have authorized a belief that the form of a plurality, however promising in theory, is impracticable, with men constituted with the ordinary passions: while the tranquil and steady tenor of our single Executive, during a course of twenty-two years of the most tempestuous times the history of the world has ever presented, gives a rational hope that this important problem is at length solved. Aided by the counsels of a cabinet of heads of Departments, originally four, but now five, with whom the President consults, either singly or altogether, he has the benefit of their wisdom and information, brings their views to one centre, and produces an unity of action and direction in all the branches of the Government. The excellence of this construction of the Executive power has already manifested itself here under very opposite circumstances. During the administration of our first President, his Cabinet of four members was equally divided, by as marked an opposition of principle as monarchism and republicanism could bring into conflict. Had that Cabinet been a Directory, like positive and negative quantities in algebra, the opposing wills would have balanced each other, and produced a state of absolute inaction. But the President heard with calmness the opinions and reasons of each, decided the course to be pursued, and kept the Government steadily in it, unaffected by the agitation. The public knew well the dissensions in the Cabinet, but never had an uneasy thought on their account; because they knew also they had a regulating power, which would keep the machine in a steady movement."

This passage, sir, requires no comment. It is evident that Mr. Jefferson considered the power of the President to control and "decide the course to be pursued by each" of the Departments, as the fundamental principle of our Executive organization—that it only can secure the necessary "unity of action and direction in all the branches" of the Executive administration—and that, in short, it is the "regulating power which keeps the whole machine in steady movement." In a subsequent part of the same letter, he speaks of "this power of decision in the President, as that which alike excludes internal dissensions, and repels external intrigues."

[Mr. CLAY here inquired of Mr. RIVES, if this letter was written before or after Mr. Jefferson was President.]

Mr. RIVES answered that it was written in January, 1811, in the philosophical retirement of Monticello, when he had withdrawn from all the disturbing scenes of public life, and, as a patriot and sage, employed his leisure in meditating the lessons of his long experience, and recording them for the instruction of posterity. But, lest the honorable Senator may suppose (as his question seems to imply) that the possession of power had given an undue bias to the mind of Mr. Jefferson, (than whom there never lived a man more thoroughly imbued with an innate love of liberty,) he shall speak for himself. In the letter from which I have already quoted, he uses the following language:

"I am not conscious that my participations in Executive authority have produced any bias in favor of a single Executive; because the parts I have acted have been in the subordinate, as well as superior stations, and because, if I know myself, what I have felt and what I have wished, I know I have never been so well pleased as when I could shift power from my own on the shoulders of others; nor have I ever been able to conceive how any rational being could propose happiness to himself from the exercise of power over others."

In the letter from which I have read, we have seen Mr. Jefferson's theory of the constitution with regard to the Executive, and the practice of Washington. Let us now see, sir, the principles upon which he conducted his own administration of this high office. In a few months after his accession to the Presidency, in November 1801, he addressed a circular to the Heads of Departments, the members of his Cabinet, for the purpose of laying down the rules which were to govern the official relations between him and those Departments. He begins with repeating what was the practice, in his respect, of General Washington's administration, of which he had himself been a member—that the several Heads of Departments regularly transmitted to the President the communications addressed to them in relation to the concerns of their respective offices, with the answers proposed by them to be made, and received from him, in return, the signification of his approbation, or else the suggestion of such alterations as he might think necessary—and then proceeds: "By this means, he was always in accurate possession of all facts and proceedings in every part of the Union, and to whatsoever Department they related; he formed a central point for the different branches, preserved an unity" (this despotism unity again, sir!) "of object and action among them; exercised that participation in the gestion of affairs which his office made incumbent on him; and met himself the due responsibility," (General Washington, and Mr. Jefferson too, it seems, were so reckless and daring as to meet the responsibility of their offices,) "for whatever was done. During Mr. Adams's administration, his long and habitual absences from the Seat of Government rendered this kind of communication impracticable, removed him from any share in the transaction of affairs, and parcelled out the Government, in fact, among four independent heads, drawing sometimes in opposite directions." He then expressed his intention to adhere to the system, in this respect, of Washington, and adds—"my sole motives are those before expressed, as governing the first administration in chalking out the rules of their proceedings; adding to them only a sense of the obligation imposed on me by the public will, to meet personally the duties to which they have appointed me."

Here, sir, we have the interpretation of Washington and Jefferson, in the most authentic of all forms, (their own practice,) of the duties and powers of the Presidential office, creating in the Chief Magistrate himself a responsibility "for whatever is done" in any of the Executive Departments, and giving him, by consequence, a power to superintend, control, and shape the action of those Departments. To these high constitutional models, realizing the well-ordered unity and responsibility of a single Executive, the present Executive Chief Magistrate has sought to conform his administration, rather than by indolence, neglect, or shrinking from responsibility, to parcel out the Government among five or six independent Heads of Departments, thus converting it into a discordant and practically irresponsible directory.

I will now, Mr. President, advert to an argument of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, which, I confess, struck me with considerable surprise. In order to sustain his position that the constitution had not given the President a power of superintendence and control over the Executive Departments, he contended that, in certain cases, the heads of those Departments were responsible to, and compellable to act by the courts of justice; and, in support of this principle, he relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Marbury and Madison, an extract of which he read to the Senate. I was the more surprised, sir, at the doctrine and the authority coming from the honorable Senator from Kentucky, because he professes an adhesion to the creed of the republican party of that day; and yet it may be confidently affirmed that there never was a decision of that tribunal which gave more dissatisfaction to the republican party, than that did, and especially to the great chief and leader of the party, who has recorded, in various parts of his writings, the most earnest and energetic condemnation of it. With all the deference I entertain for that exalted tribunal, I must say that the doctrines of Marbury and Madison appear to me utterly unsustainable, and such, I believe, would be the judgment of all parties at the present day. The Senate, sir, doubtless recollect the circumstances of the case. Mr. Adams, on the eve of quitting the Presidency, had appointed, with the concurrence of the Senate, numerous officers, and, among others, certain justices of the peace for this district. Their commissions had been signed by him, and the seal of State, perhaps, affixed to them; but they had not been delivered to the parties, when Mr. Jefferson came into office. Mr. Jefferson finding them still in the Department of State when he succeeded to the Presidency, and considering the appointments either as improper in themselves, or improperly made, and that commissions, like deeds, were incomplete and revocable till delivery, determined to withhold them. The parties applied to the Supreme Court for a mandamus, directed to Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, to compel the delivery of the commissions. The Court decided that though they had no jurisdiction to grant a mandamus in the case, (it not being embraced among those cases of original jurisdiction committed to them,) yet that the parties had acquired, by the signing and sealing of the commissions, without delivery, an absolute and legal right to the offices in question, which might be enforced against an independent department of the Government by a judicial tribunal.

I must leave it to Mr. Jefferson, in his own strong language, and with a reasoning which appears to me irresistible, to show the fundamental and dangerous errors of this decision, now relied on by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. In a letter addressed to Mr. Hay, attorney of the United States for the District of Virginia, during the progress of Burr's trial, at Richmond, he writes thus:

"I observe that the case of Marbury vs. Madison has been cited, and I think it material to stop at the threshold the citing that case as authority, and to have it denied to be law. 1. Because the judges, in the outset, disclaimed all cognizance of the case; although they then went on to say what would have been their opinion had they had cognizance of it. This, then, was confessedly an extra-judicial opinion, and, as such, of no authority.

2. Because, had it been judicially pronounced, it would have been against law; for, to a commission, a deed, a bond, delivery is essential to give validity. Until, therefore, the commission is delivered out of the hands of the Executive and his agents, it is not his deed. He may withhold or cancel it at pleasure, as he might his private deed in the same situation. The constitution intended that the three great branches of the Government should be co-ordinate, and independent of each other. As to acts, therefore, which are to be done by either, it has given no control to another branch."

"The Executive and Senate act on the construction that until delivery from the Executive Department, a commission is in their possession and within their rightful power; and in cases of commissions not revocable at will, where, after the Senate's approbation, and the President's signing and sealing, new information of the unfitness of the person has come to hand before the delivery of the commission, new nominations have been made and approved, and new commissions have issued.

"On this construction I have hitherto acted; and this I shall ever act, and maintain it with the powers of the Government against any control which may be attempted by the judges in subversion of the independence of the Executive and Senate within their peculiar department."

This answer of Mr. Jefferson, sir, to the Supreme Court, appears to me to be conclusive and irrefragable. It shows that the doctrine of Marbury vs. Madison was wrong, not merely with regard to the merits of the particular case, but dangerously wrong in another aspect, in asserting a claim of the judiciary (which is now reiterated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky) to control an independent branch of the Government in matters confided by the constitution to its separate and responsible action. As this last aspect of the decision involves a question of the gravest import—one affecting that fundamental principle, not merely of our constitution, but of free Government in general, which prescribes the separation and mutual independence of the three great departments, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial—a question too, in regard to which the imputed opinions of the present Chief Magistrate have been freely commented upon in the course of this discussion,

* In the famous case of Jonathan Robbins, debated in Congress in the year 1800, the eminent lawyer and afterwards Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and then a member of the House of Representatives, John Marshall, thus expressed himself in relation to the judicial power of the United States:

"By the constitution, the judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States." "A case in law or equity was a term well understood, and of limited signification. It was a controversy between parties which had taken a shape for judicial decision." "By extending the judicial power to all cases in law and equity, the constitution had never been understood to confer on that department any political power whatever. To come within this description, a question must assume a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process, and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit."—For the whole speech see this Abridgment, Vol. II., p. 457.

[SENATE.]

I beg permission of the Senate, while I have the writings of Mr. Jefferson in my hand, to read what was uttered by this great Republican Oracle on this important subject. In a letter addressed by him, in 1819, to Judge Roane, himself one of the most profound constitutional jurists of our country, he expressed himself thus:—"My construction of the constitution is very different from that you quote. It is, that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the constitution in the cases submitted to its action; and especially where it is to act ultimately and without appeal. I will explain myself by examples which, having occurred while I was in office, are better known to me, and the principles which governed them. A Legislature had passed the sedition law. The federal courts had subjected certain individuals to its penalties, of fine and imprisonment. On coming into office, I released the individuals by the power of pardon, committed to Executive discretion, which could never be more properly exercised than where citizens were suffering without the authority of law, or, which was equivalent, under a law unauthorized by the constitution, and therefore null. In the case of Marbury and Madison, the federal judges declared that commissions signed and sealed by the President, were valid, although not delivered. I deem delivery essential to complete a deed which, as long as it remains in the hands of the party, is as yet no deed; it is in posse only, but not in esse, and I withheld delivery of the commissions." (Yes, sir, I, the President, not the Secretary, withheld the commissions.) "They cannot issue a mandamus to the President or Legislature, or to any of their officers—(the constitution controlling the common law in this particularly.) When the British treaty of 1807 arrived, without any provision against impressment of our seamen, I determined not to ratify it. The Senate thought I should ask their advice. I thought that would be a mockery of them, when I was predetermined against following it, should they advise its ratification. The constitution had made their advice necessary to confirm a treaty, but not to reject it. This has been blamed by some; but I have never doubted its soundness. In the cases of two persons, antenati, under exactly similar circumstances, the federal court had determined that one of them (Duane) was not a citizen; the House of Representatives, nevertheless, determined that the other (Smith, of South Carolina) was a citizen, and admitted him to a seat in their body. Duane was a republican, and Smith a federalist, and these decisions were during the federal ascendancy. These are examples of my position, that each of the three departments has equally the right to decide for itself what is its duty under the constitution, without any regard to what the others may have decided for themselves under a similar question."

Without entering at this time, sir, into any discussion of those important principles, I will only say, that if the present Chief Magistrate has sinned against the constitution by any doctrines which he has advanced, or is supposed to entertain on this subject, he has sinned in company with the great apostle of American liberty and of the rights of man.

To sum up, then, in a few words, the results of what has been said, I think it has been shown that, according to the true theory of the constitution, the President of the United States, in whom the "executive power is vested," is made responsible for the conduct and proceedings of all the Executive Departments—that, as a necessary consequence of that responsibility, he has a constitutional right to inspect, superintend, and control the operations of those Departments—and that at the very organization of the Government, immediately succeeding the adoption of the constitution, the correctness of these principles was acknowledged in the most formal manner, and after the fullest discussion, by an explicit recognition of the power of the President to remove from office any of the functionaries of the Executive Departments—a power which has never since been questioned.

The power of removal, existing alike in regard to the Secretary of the Treasury and the other heads of departments, may be rightfully exercised for reasons so various that it is impossible to reduce them to any general classification. The President, who possesses the power, is to judge, in the first instance at least, of the reasons for its exercise. In the debate of '89, so frequently appealed to on this subject, Mr. Madison said: "If a head of a Department shall not conform to the judgment of the President, in doing the Executive duties of his office, he may be displaced." The honorable Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. SOUTHARD,) who spoke a few days ago, cited the opinion expressed by Mr. Madison in the same debate, that the President might be impeached for a wanton removal of a public officer. Sir, I do not doubt it; but I beg leave to remind the honorable Senator of a correlative opinion delivered by Mr. Madison on the same occasion—that the President might be properly impeached also for neglecting to remove a public officer, when the public interest demanded it. And this, sir, suggests the true mode of testing the question which has been raised of the President's constitutional power to remove the late Secretary of the Treasury, for his refusal (in the language of Mr. Madison, just cited) "to conform to the judgment of the President" on the subject of the public deposits. Let us reverse the case, which actually occurred, and suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of the President, had desired a transfer of the public deposits—that he did so without any sufficient reason, and was about to commit them to banks of questionable solvency or of notorious insolvency. If the President, entertaining a different opinion of the expediency and propriety, had stood by, and renouncing the salutary control which the constitution had placed in his hands by the power of removal, had permitted his Secretary quietly to consummate his purpose, on the ground that the President had no right to interfere with a discretionary power intrusted by Congress to a head of a Department, what then would have been said? We should have heard, sir, denunciations not less loud and vehement than those which have been uttered on the present occasion, thundering against him, but upon a different principle. We should then have been told, sir, that the President had been recreant to his high trust; that he had been armed with the power of removal expressly to protect the public interests from the faithlessness or incapacity of public officers, and that, in failing to exercise it, he had weakly and wickedly betrayed his duty to the constitution and to the country.

Having thus reviewed, Mr. President, the doctrines, to me, I must say novel doctrines, of constitutional law which have been advanced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) I will detain the Senate but with a few words more. The honorable Senator told us, with a deep and mournful pathos, that we are in the midst of a revolution. I agree with him, sir; we are in the midst of a revolution—a happy and auspicious revolution, like the “civil revolution of 1800,” which, according to Mr. Jefferson, was “as real a revolution in the principles, as that of ’76 was in the form, of our Government.” A like salutary revolution “in the principles of the Government,” we have seen accomplished during the last five years of its administration. In that time, sir, we have seen the Government brought back to its “republican tack,” from the deviations of latitudinous power into which it had fatally fallen. We have seen an unconstitutional and corrupting system of internal improvements, under the patronage of the federal authority, arrested, and those great local interests remitted to their natural and safe guardians, the Governments of the States. We have seen the bank, the “first-born” of federal usurpations, foiled in its efforts to perpetuate its existence, and to confirm its triumph over the sanctity of the constitution. We have seen, finally, the American System of the honorable Senator himself; a system which we of the South have felt to be one, not of protection, but oppression; we have seen that, too, partially overthrown and abandoned. Here, indeed, is a happy and glorious revolution for those who have cherished the cardinal principles of limited constitutional construction, of freedom of industry, of equality of public burdens. And for these great results, we are indebted to the firmness, the vigor, the patriotism, of the individual who now presides over the administration of the Government, sustained by the virtuous confidence of a free people.

A profound thinker, sir, with whom I have had the good fortune to serve in the public councils, but who is now in private life, and to whom it affords me sincere gratification to have this opportunity of paying the tribute of a cordial and respectful remembrance, (Mr. S. C. ALLEN, of Massachusetts,) has beautifully and philosophically said, that “associated wealth is the dynasty of modern States.” Sir, it is so. This modern dynasty is now seeking to establish its sway over us in the worst of all forms—that of a great legal corporation, ramified and extended through the Union, directed by irresponsible authority, controlling the fortunes and the hopes of individuals and communities, influencing the public press, dictating to the organs of the public will.

I may be permitted, Mr. President, to recall to the recollection of the Senate the solemn language of a great patriot and statesman of another country on an occasion not unlike the present. It was on the memorable impeachment of Warren Hastings, sir, that Edmund Burke, with the profound sagacity which belonged to his genius, held the following impressive language to the highest judicial and legislative body of his country:

“To-day, the Commons of Great Britain prosecute the delinquents of India. To-morrow, the delinquents of India may be the Commons of Great Britain. We all know and feel the force of money, and we now call upon you for justice in this cause of money. We call upon you for the preservation of our manners—of our virtues. We call upon you for our national character. We call upon you for our liberties.”

Sir, an American Senator, applying to his own times and country the solemn appeal of the British patriot, might well say: To-day the Congress of the United States sits in judgment on the monopolists of the bank. To-morrow the monopolists of the bank may be the Congress of the United States. All history hath taught us the dangerous power of moneyed corporations, and we now see and feel that power exerted in the most dangerous of all forms, in assailing the purity of our republican manners, undermining the stability of our institutions, and awing the deliberations of our public councils. Sir, the American people—yes, sir, the people—when their true voice shall be heard, call upon us for justice in this great cause of money, violating and trampling upon the guarantees of freedom. They call upon us for the preservation of the public morals, exposed to a new and daring corruption. They call upon us for the vindication of our national character from the scandal of practices before unknown in our history. They call upon us for the rescue of their liberties from the grasp of a selfish and unrelenting moneyed despotism. They call upon us, sir, for the performance of these high duties, and worthily. I trust, will the call be answered by the firmness, the constancy, and the patriotism of their representatives.

Public Distress.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, JANUARY 20.

Public Distress—Removal of the Deposits.

Mr. WEBSTER presented to the Senate a series of resolutions, adopted at a numerous meeting of the citizens of Boston, without distinction of party, held at Faneuil Hall, to consider the state of the currency and finances of the country.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. WEBSTER said he wished to bear unequivocal and decided testimony to the respectability, intelligence, and disinterestedness, of the long list of gentlemen at whose instance this meeting was assembled. The meeting, said Mr. W., was connected with no party purpose whatever. It had an object more sober, more cogent, more interesting to the whole community, than mere party questions. The Senate will perceive, in the tone of these resolutions, no intention to exaggerate or inflame; no disposition to get up excitement or to spread alarm. I hope the restrained and serious manner, the moderation of temper, and the exemplary candor, of these resolutions, in connection with the plain truths which they contain, will give them just weight with the Senate. I assure you, sir, the members composing this meeting were neither capitalists, nor speculators, nor alarmists. They are merchants, traders, mechanics, artisans, and others engaged in the active business of life. They are of the muscular portion of society; and they desire to lay before Congress an evil, which they feel to press sorely on their occupations, their earnings, their labor, and their property; and to express their conscientious conviction of the causes of that evil. If intelligence, if pure intention, if deep and widespread connection with business, in its various branches, if thorough practical knowledge and experience—if inseparable union between their own prosperity and the prosperity of the whole country, authorize men to speak, and give them a right to be heard, the sentiments of this meeting ought to make an impression. For one, sir, I entirely concur in all their opinions. I adopt their first fourteen resolutions, without alteration or qualification, as setting forth truly the present state of things, stating truly its causes, and pointing to the true remedy.

Mr. President, said Mr. W., now that I am speaking, I will use the opportunity to say a few words, which I intended to say, in the course of the morning, on the coming up of the resolution which now lies on the table; but which are as applicable to this occasion as to that.

An opportunity may, perhaps, be hereafter afforded me, of discussing the reasons given by the Secretary, for the very important measure, adopted by him, in removing the deposits. But, as I know not how near that time may be, I desire, in the meanwhile, to make my opinions known, without reserve, on the present state of the country. Without intending to discuss any thing at present, I feel it my duty, nevertheless, to let my sentiments and my convictions be understood. In the first place, then, sir, I agree with those who think that there is a severe pressure in the money market, and very serious embarrassment felt in all branches of the national industry. I think this is not local, but general; general, at least, over every part of the country, where the cause has yet begun to operate, and sure to become, not only general, but universal, as the operation of the cause shall spread. If evidence were wanted, in addition to all that is told us by those who know, the high rate of interest, now at 12 per cent. or higher, where it was hardly 6, last September—the depression of all stocks, some ten, some twenty, some thirty per cent.—and the low prices of commodities, are proofs abundantly sufficient, to show the existence of the pressure. But, sir, labor—that most extensive of all interests—American manual labor—feels, or will feel, the shock more sensibly, far more sensibly, than capital or property of any kind. Public works have stopped, or must stop; great private undertakings, employing many hands, have ceased, and others must cease. A great lowering of the rates of wages, as well as a depreciation of property, is the inevitable consequence of causes now in full operation. Serious embarrassments in all branches of business do certainly exist.

I am of opinion, therefore, that there is, undoubtedly, a very severe pressure on the community, which Congress ought to relieve if it can; and that this pressure is not an instance of the ordinary reaction, or the ebbing and flowing of commercial affairs; but is an extraordinary case, produced by an extraordinary cause.

In the next place, sir, I agree entirely with the 11th Boston resolution, as to the causes of this embarrassment. We were in a state of high prosperity, commercial and agricultural. Every branch of business pushed far, and the credit, as well as the capital of the country, employed to near its utmost limits. In this state of things, some degree of overtrading doubtless took place, which, however, if nothing else had occurred, would have been seasonably corrected by the ordinary and necessary operation of things. But, on this palmy state of things, the late measure of the Secretary fell, and has acted on it with powerful and lamentable effect. And I think, sir, that such a cause is entirely adequate to produce the effect; that it is wholly natural; and that it ought to have been foreseen that it would produce exactly such consequences. Those must have looked at the surface of things only, as it seems to me, who thought otherwise, and who expected that such an operation could be gone through with, without producing a very serious shock.

[Mr. W. considered the restoration of the deposits, and the recharter of the present Bank of the United States, as the adequate remedy for the present distress.]

Mr. EWING said: The removal of the Secretary of the Treasury from office I admit to be within the legal power of the President; but the object which was effected by that removal, the control thus taken and exercised over the public treasure, I hold to be an infraction of the constitution; and I shall now, by such arguments and authority as are in my mind conclusive, attempt to make good the position.

Those who maintain the power of the President over the Treasury, rest it upon an argument like this: The executive power is vested in the President—the custody of the public treasure is a portion of executive power; therefore, the custody of the public treasure is vested in the President; or, in this particular instance, they hold that, as the right to remove the deposits was vested by the bank charter in the Secretary of the Treasury, and as the Secretary of the Treasury is an executive officer, this special duty, which is assigned to him by law, falls under the general cognizance of the Executive head of the nation. These are the forms in which, if I understand them right, the arguments on the other side are presented.

The fatal error in their whole process of reasoning arises from this—that they give to certain general expressions in the constitution a power and extent which, as limited by the other special powers in that instrument, they do not possess. The two provisions, that “the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States,” and “he shall see that the laws are faithfully executed,” are the basis of all the illimitable powers with which gentlemen seek to clothe the Chief Magistrate.

It should be observed, that the separation of powers in the Constitution of the United States is by no means perfect, especially between the legislative and executive departments. The first section of the first article of the constitution declares, that “all legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States;” and yet, when we descend to the special distribution of the powers which follow, we find that all the legislative power therein granted is not vested in the Congress, but that a most important portion of it is vested in the President, namely, a veto power—a power which touches legislation nearly, vitally—a power which has grown up to great importance in the present day, and which threatens to absorb or paralyze all the powers of legislation.

By the first section of the second article of the constitution, “the executive power is vested in a President of the United States.” The word “all” used in the section granting the legislative power to Congress, is omitted in this. I do not lay much stress upon the omission, but I am certainly warranted in saying that the grant of executive power is not in terms more comprehensive than is the grant of legislative power, to the universality of which I have shown one strong exception. Indeed, sir, without referring to the special designation of the several powers which is found in the articles of the constitution containing the general grants of the legislative power, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to determine what was intended to be included in each, especially in the latter; for judicial power is more distinct in its character, and more capable of a precise designation.

What is executive power? I never saw a definition from which a distinct conception of its essence or qualities could be gathered. Indeed, it is not susceptible of any, varying as it does in its properties and extent, in every form and modification of government. M. Necker, an author respectable, but not of high authority, assimilates it to that mysterious principle which, in the human frame, unites action to the will; the legislative power being the will. This would be intelligible enough, and practical also, if all power, as had been the case in France, centred in a single individual: there would be no clashing of those great separate powers, the one contravening or absorbing the other; it would be reduced to the same simple principle as that of human will and human action; the will dictating, and the active principle moving in exact accordance with it. But when the will and the active principle exist in different bodies, and the active principle, as in the case of our executive, has a will also of his own, if it extend to and penetrate every portion of the body politic, that will, which is accompanied with efficient action, must, as a necessary consequence, overturn or absorb all the powers of the legislative will, which is destitute of action. This notion of executive power will not do in a Government which, being free, intends to preserve its freedom; and it will be seen, by and by, that it is not the kind of executive power created by the framers of our constitution. It will not do to draw precedent from monarchical Governments to settle the extent of that power, unless we agree with them to admit the divine right of kings, and let our Executive become, as theirs, supreme and irresponsible. We must, then, examine the constitution itself minutely, and see if we can discover the meaning affixed to this important term, “executive power,” and what subjects properly fall within the scope of its influence.

The second section of the second article of the constitution contains a general enumeration of the powers and duties of the President; it makes him commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and of the militia, when called into actual service; it gives him the power of appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and directs him to receive ambassadors and other public ministers; but it gives him no power over the Treasury, or the collection or disbursement of the revenue. But mark, sir, the duties specially assigned to Congress by the eighth section of the first article: “to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence." Congress not only lays, but collects duties and imposts. Why collect? The Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) pronounces the collection of the revenue an act appropriate to the Executive; and it might well be so, if the constitution had not vested the duty in another department of the Government; and there is no accidental misuse of language here, for it is carried through in all the provisions of the constitution whenever the fiscal concerns of the nation are the subject of provision; and not only the laying and collecting of taxes, but the disbursement of those taxes. Congress, not the President, has power to "pay the national debt;" but, in the same sentence vesting these powers, Congress is authorized to "provide for the common defence," not to defend, for that is one of the powers granted to the Executive. Again: in the ninth section of the same article, which relates to the power of Congress, is a provision that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law," and that "a regular statement of receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time;" clearly evidencing that the whole control of the public funds, the levying, collecting, keeping, and disbursing, is intrusted fully to Congress, and not at all to the President. I might refer to numerous provisions of this instrument, showing the accurate manner in which the powers and duties of each of the great departments of Government were limited and defined in the particular enumeration of the powers of each. For example, Congress is "to provide and maintain a navy," not to command or control it; for that power is vested in the President; but, as the purse is in the hands of Congress, they alone can provide and maintain. "To provide for calling forth the militia," not to call them forth; for that is the duty of the President. "To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," not to organize, or arm them; for those are portions of the Executive duty. I have, sir, pursued this analysis far enough to show, (if, indeed, a doubt could ever seriously exist of the fact,) that, in all things relating to the public treasure, its levy, collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement, Executive interference has been carefully excluded by the framers of the constitution; and that the power of Congress extends to it throughout, in all its minutest details; but, on all subjects in which power is intended to be reposed in the Executive, Congress is merely required to provide the means by which that power may be exercised. This review of the provisions of the constitution was deemed necessary to give a full and distinct comprehension of the several acts creating the three (subsequently four) subordinate departments, whose duties and responsibilities are the more immediate subject of inquiry. The first Congress, which met in 1789, enacted the laws creating these departments; the subjects relating to them were referred to the same committee, and they, after much consideration and lengthened debate, passed the several laws in their present forms. Two of them, that of War and of Foreign Affairs, are, in their titles, called "Executive Departments," the other is simply styled "the Treasury Department." But it is said, sir, that the title of an act proves nothing; that it cannot be used in giving it a construction. This, I admit, is true in the main; but taking into view the circumstances under which these acts were passed, and the high importance attached to them by the Congress and the people of that day, it could hardly be by accident that the title of these laws, reported by the same committee, and under consideration by the same Congress, at the same time, should differ in so important a feature. But we may, on the strictest legal principles, refer to the body of the act, and insist that that shall fix its construction, and be taken as the index of the sense of the legislature which enacted it.

The first section of the act establishing what is now called the Department of State, provides, "that there shall be an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs," and the chief officer of that department is required to "perform and execute such duties as shall, from time to time, be enjoined on, or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeably to the constitution, relative to correspondences, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers," &c.; and, by reference to the act it will be seen that no single duty is annexed to his office, or a single trust reposed in him, which is not part and parcel of the duty of the President, as enjoined by the constitution in the special enumeration of his powers. This, then, is properly called an Executive Department, both in the title and the body of the act; and the officer at the head of this department is properly made obedient to the President within the sphere of his constitutional duties.

Next in order is the Department of War. The first section of the act creating it denominates it also Executive: "That there shall be an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of War," and the principal officer therein is likewise charged with duties which the constitution had assigned to the Executive; and he is required to conduct the business of his department in such manner as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, order and direct.

The act creating the Treasury Department does not, either in the title or body of the act, style it Executive. The first section provides "that there shall be a Department of the Treasury," and directs the appointment of a Secretary, who shall be head of the department. His duties, also, coincide in all respects with those which arise out of the powers granted to Congress by the constitution; none of them touch the prescribed functions of the Chief Magistrate. He "shall digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; prepare and report estimates of public revenue and expenditures; superintend the collection of the revenue," &c.—all duties especially devolved upon the Congress by the constitution, as I have already shown; and that his character may be more distinctly marked as the officer of Congress, and not of the President, he alone, of all the heads of Departments, is specially required to "make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person or in writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters which may be referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office." The marked distinction in the character and duties of these departments, designated by the law—the fact that, while the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War are made directly responsible to the President, and required to perform their several duties in obedience to his instructions and commands, the Secretary of the Treasury is made subservient to no commands except those of the Houses of Congress, and is charged with no duties except such as the constitution enjoins upon them, would seem, according to all acknowledged principles of interpretation, to carry with it a strong negative of the claim of power which the President has assumed to exercise over the prescribed duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. That Secretary is not an executive officer, and the President has no more right to order and direct how he shall perform any of his appropriate duties, or take their performance out of his hands, than either House of Congress has to interfere with the discharge of the appropriate duties of the Secretary of State or of War.

But the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) says that the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury are executive in their character, and he instanced the duty of digesting and preparing plans for the improvement of the revenue. Now, sir, with all due deference to the superior political knowledge and acumen of the honorable Senator, I am constrained to differ from him wholly and absolutely. There is nothing more executive in its nature, in devising, and preparing, a plan for the improvement of the revenue, than there is in devising, and preparing, and enacting a law for the same purpose. Both require the intellect, the mind, and judgment, rather than the mere active principle, to bring them to pass. The duty enjoined on this Secretary is not that executive act which follows legislation, and carries into effect the law, but it is legislation in its incipient stage, or rather a gathering together, and arranging the elements out of which legislation is to arise. Now, it is obvious that this must be done by those who bear the burden of legislation, and they may do it themselves, or employ an appropriate agent or agents to perform it; they might direct a Committee of Congress to perform it during vacation; they might appoint a commission by law for the same purpose; or they might do it as they have done, appoint an officer, who should be emphatically theirs, and accountable to them to perform it. The same may be said of the other duties enjoined by law on this officer. In truth, sir, this very vague and indefinite sense which gentlemen attach to the term executive power and executive duty—a term which may be extended so as to overshadow all the other powers and functions of Government—is proof, if any were wanting, of the wisdom of the framers of our constitution in defining the term by a particular distribution of specially enumerated powers. But the honorable Senator contends that it is an executive duty to report to Congress, because the President himself is required to report, or rather to recommend to Congress, such matters as he shall think expedient. True, the constitution imposes upon him a special duty by special designation; but this does not prove that it is therefore his, in consequence of the general grant of executive power. The usual process of legal reasoning would prove directly the reverse: if it had been covered by the general grant, it would not have been afterwards specially designated. Sir, the reason for the different frame and construction of the law, creating the three subordinate departments of Government, must be already sufficiently obvious. The subject-matter over which the two first have charge is executive in its nature, and is vested by the constitution in the President; the last having to do only with the finances of the country—a subject-matter, which to its fullest extent, and in all its modifications, is intrusted to Congress—is placed under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. Congress could not, without a surrender of their most sacred trust, have rendered him an executive officer, and have required or permitted him to discharge his duties in such manner as he should be directed by the President. His duties, therefore, are to be performed under the direction of the Legislature, and the subject over which he performs them is a legislative trust.

By the bank charter of 1816, section 16, we find another portion of the power of Congress vested in the same officer; a power alike relating to the finances, and for which he is, as in other cases, made responsible to Congress. The sixteenth section of the bank charter provides, "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order and direction." Here, again, is a power vested in the Secretary of the Treasury over the finances—a power evidently subject to revision; and as it is a power relating to a subject-matter which is placed under the control and protection of Congress, we would be led a priori to conclude that Congress would be the supervisory power over his acts; and so, indeed, it is. Our whole system of legislation is perfect and consistent; from the constitution down to the latest law passed upon the subject, all suppose the power of the finances inseparably vested in Congress, and severed by an impassable barrier from executive control: but that legislation has been set at defiance; the constitutional provisions have been disregarded; the barriers raised by its framers for the protection of popular liberty have been broken down; and the public treasure is poured into the coffers of the Executive. The Secretary of the Treasury, himself, in the reasons which he renders to Congress for the removal of the public deposits, admits that the place of safe keeping for the national funds is a matter properly of legislative determination; and he seems to wonder that Congress ever placed it under the care of the Executive. Sir, the public funds were never placed under the control of the Executive, constitutionally or legally. The control which he has exercised over them is without law, or, rather, in defiance of law; and all the authority which the Secretary is disposed to yield to the President over his official acts is so far an abandonment, on his part, of the trust reposed in him by law.

By the act establishing the Treasury Department, to which I have already referred, the Secretary of the Treasury is required "to superintend the collection of the revenue;" by which is to be understood all such acts as are necessary to be performed before placing the money in the public treasury. When placed there the collection of it has ceased, and the superintendence over that collection, given to the Secretary, ceases to confer on him any power over it; all that he may possess further must be derived from some other provision or principle of law. But, under this provision, most of those acts of other Secretaries, which have been adduced here as precedents, have been performed, and rightfully performed. As, for example: Alexander Hamilton, when Secretary of the Treasury, directed the collector of the port of Charleston to pay over the public money as he collected it, and to deposit the public bonds with an individual, (Mr. Habersham.) But it will be perceived, at once, that this was a part of the act of collecting, and bringing the public money into the treasury, and under the control of the treasurer; and this course must have been taken; the money must have been paid to an agent of the department, for application or transmission; or it must have remained in the hands of the collector until it should be drawn for, or be transmitted by him, and paid over to the treasury. And here, sir, arises the much disputed question, what is the treasury of the United States? The most simple idea of it would be, that it were a strong box; or a strong vault, in which the money of the nation is garnered up, and kept under the custody of the treasurer. But this is not true in practice or in fact. We have no such strong box or vault. It therefore is what Congress has seen fit to make it; and here I beg leave to say, that the definition of it given by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) coincides very nearly with my own conception of the thing. It is the state and condition of the public funds as fixed by law, and it involves custody, either with or without locality. Well, the funds of the United States were, pursuant to law, collected and deposited in the Bank of the United States. Now I ask the honorable Senator from Virginia, if, according to his own definition, the state and condition of their funds in this bank, inasmuch as it was that condition provided by law—I ask him, sir, if this does not come full up to his conception of the treasury; and if the withdrawal of those funds from that prescribed condition, without law, be not a withdrawal from the treasury?

We have then, sir, settled upon a determinate notion as to what the treasury is; and I think myself safe in the conclusion that the Bank of the United States, so far forth as it contained public funds, placed in it by command of law, and of which the law has not authorized the removal, is that treasury. I will now inquire by what authority the money of the United States was removed from that custody, and placed in other hands.

I have shown that the act of removal does not pertain to the collection of the revenue; and care should be taken, if we wish to arrive at a true result, that the duties of collection, and the removal from the legal custody, of funds already collected, should not be confounded.

The ninth section of the first article of the constitution ordains, "that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." The law defining the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury reiterates the same provision. Unless, therefore, some clause in the law incorporating the bank gives him the power claimed over the public funds, he has it not. The fifteenth section of the bank charter is that under which I understand the power is claimed. It provides "that, during the continuance of this act, and whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States or the territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditor." This is the clause supposed to vest in the Secretary of the Treasury this power.

Mr. President, the power of removal from office as a constitutional, contradistinguished from a legal power, has been asserted in this debate to exist in the Executive; and it has been pressed with an energy and emphasis which is not easily accounted for by any bearing which its determination either way can have upon the present question. It is, however, a familiar practice with the supporters of high prerogative, to go as far back as possible in tracing its origin. Hence, the theory of the divine right of kings, which it is said to be blasphemy to call in question. To question this imputed power of the President is, according to gentlemen here, a violation of the constitution. It is only on account of the general bearing of this doctrine, its tendency to centre and combine all the powers of the Government in one man, that I here touch the subject, as time will not permit me to dwell upon it. And let me be understood; I admit that the power of removal in the given case is vested in the President by law; but I deny that it is a power granted by or growing out of the constitution.

From what I said at the opening of my remarks on the nature of Executive power, and from the authority then cited, it will, I think, be manifest, that in no country, except those purely despotic in their form of government, or those closely verging on despotism in their genius and character, does the single abstract idea of Executive power carry with it, as of its essence, or even of its nature, the power also to appoint or to remove from office. The opinions of men are, in this respect, moulded and fashioned to the nature of their Government—where all power is supposed to be originally vested in the sovereign Executive; who holds that power by right of conquest or divine right—where the king is the fountain of justice and the fountain of honor, and the chief source of law, the opinion that this power is an essential power of the prerogative may well prevail; and that a king is possessed of it until, by charter, he shall have in whole or in part resigned it. But in a Government which rests upon the principle that all power originates with and centres in the people, the Executive power, and every other power which they may vest in their governors, is just what they please to make it. Such is our Government in its form and theory, and the powers of our Executive are to be sought for in the constitution, by a just and legitimate construction of that instrument.

The opinion of M. Necker, which I have already referred to, that "the executive power represents in the political system that mysterious principle which, in the moral man, unites action to the will," does not seem to carry with it the idea of the power of creation or destruction over the instruments with which that will is to be performed. The same writer, in another place, speaking of the wild views of the framers of the French constitution of 1790, says, "They treated this power (the Executive) as if it had been a supernatural pre-existent faculty," and he complains that they created an Executive, without conferring on it a participation in the appointment to office, and some other patronage necessary to sustain its dignity and independence. Hence, I conclude that, in the opinion of this writer, at least, the term Executive power did not, of itself ex vi termini, involve the power of appointment and removal from office. I will also take leave to refer to a writer (Ackerly) on the British constitution, whose work appeared about the middle of the 18th century. The author supposes a convention of the people assembled to fix, by mutual consent, the constitution of the monarchy; and in this assembly, Britannicus, a leading member, proposed "that the intended king, as head, should have the whole executive power of the laws, and to take care of the administration of justice, and that he should neither deny, delay, nor sell justice to any man. He further propounded, that the intended king should have the sole appointment and nomination of all his judges, ministers of State, his admirals and generals, and all other officers in the State, both civil and military."

Mr. President, I have dwelt longer on this subject than I intended, and I regret that it has arisen as an incidental question in debate; it is itself worthy of a separate and a full discussion; but I could not consent that, by this indirection, the constitutional rights of this body should be cast as an offering at the footstool of power, without entering my most solemn protest against the surrender.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 21.

Origin of Book Purchases for Members.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations, in part, for the service of the year 1834, with the message from the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate for striking out the clause restricting the application of the contingent fund of each House on the subject of printing.

Mr. W. explained, that this bill had been already before the Committee on Finance, who had reported two amendments to the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. One of these amendments related to an error in the estimate of the expenses of the Secretary's office, which had been agreed to by the House, and there was nothing more to be said about it. The other amendment of the Senate was to strike out the clause in the bill which limited the application of the contingent fund in the printing department, to the printing of such documents only as related to the ordinary proceedings of Congress, and were executed by the public printer under his contract; and to this amendment the House of Representatives had disagreed. He should now close the few remarks he had to make with a motion that the Senate adhere to their amendment.

The contingent expenditures of the House of Representatives are stated in the bill at $150,000, including fuel, stationery, printing, &c. The contingent expenses of the Senate were estimated at $32,000. Whether these sums were too large, or too small, he did not pretend to say. He had no doubt that they were large enough, and he should be content with any order which the Senate might take concerning them. But he wished to call the attention of the Senate to the clause which had been stricken out by the Senate, and which he asked the Secretary now to read. [The clause having been read, Mr. WENDELL resumed.] If the Senate agreed to retain this clause, so let it be. His disposition was, to adhere to the amendment by which it had been stricken out. A similar provision to this had been in the bill for some years, and such was its inconvenience, and the impracticability of carrying it into effect, that the officers of the two Houses had been compelled to disobey the restriction. It excepted works which were printed by order of the House of Representatives, but not those which were printed by order of the Senate. He objected to the principle involved in the clause, and desired to know why the Senate were not to be trusted with the regulation and application of their own contingent fund? If they were allowed to purchase what fuel they chose, they ought to be also allowed to order the printing of such works as they desired. The clause excepted such works as were executed by the public printer. He knew no such officer as the public printer. Each House made a contract with a printer, but there is no such officer as public printer. The House ordered books with as much liberality as did the Senate, but the House might pay for the books which they ordered, under this construction, while the Senate could do no such thing. A member near him (Mr. WILKINS) had recently moved for an additional number of a work which had been ordered by a previous Congress, for the supply of new members. But if this clause were to be retained, the Senate could not pay for these books. So the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. POINDRELL) had, at the instance of two of the Committee of the Senate—the Committee on Public Lands, and the Committee on Private Land Claims—introduced a resolution, under which a compilation of the land laws was ordered. But the Senate, with this clause standing in the bill, could not pay for them. Even the little map of Narragansett Bay, of which the printing had been asked, could not be paid for, and the gentleman from Georgia might have spared himself the labor of opposing the order.

He moved that the Senate do adhere to their amendment.

Mr. FOSYTH called for the reading of the clause which had been stricken out by the Senate. After the clause had been read, he stated that this subject had been before Congress formerly, and he thought that the House was in the right. Their object was to check the abuses which had been practised on the contingent fund. That fund was created for the payment of the necessary expenses of Congress, while the Houses were in session. Abuses had subsequently crept in, one of which was to bestow the patronage of Congress on a variety of works, political and otherwise. A man who had on hand a large stock of copies of a book which he could not throw in the market, could come here, and through the influence of a friend in one of the Houses, ask for a subscription, the advantage of which was exclusively to himself. And thus Congress were made the purchasers of a great many bad books, which were thus thrust upon the public. Another abuse was the application of this fund to enable publishers to get up new works, which could not be published without the aid of Congress. He recollected at the first session in which he was in Congress, a large appropriation for the publication of Seybert's Statistics. This patronage encouraged Mr. Pitkin afterwards to get up his Statistics. Another subscription was made by the House of Representatives to Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, by which an annual appropriation of $2,500 was made to sustain that work. This course of expenditure continued for some years; until, finally, in consequence of doubts which had arisen as to the merits of the work on which this patronage was conferred, this clause was attached to the appropriation bill. He was of opinion that the clause was a very proper one, and he hoped the Senate would agree to retain it. He should vote against the motion to adhere.

Mr. KANE admitted that it might be all true that the Senate had acted unwisely in ordering works. But he did not view that as the question now before the Senate. The Senate has ordered a number of new books, and the question was, whether the works which had been so ordered, and which were in use by the Senate, were to be paid for, or not. He thought that the faith of the Senate was pledged for the payment of the works they had ordered, and he could not see any other mode by which this could be effected, than by striking out this restriction. There appeared to him to be no other mode than to hold on to the clause, by agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senate had made up their minds that certain books were useful, and had ordered these works. On the faith of this procedure, the contractors had gone on with the publication of the works, and the Senate were bound to fulfil their obligation to pay for them. He should therefore vote in favor of the motion to adhere.

Mr. KANE said, that he had for some time seen a disposition to squander the contingent fund of Congress, and it was this disposition which had led to the introduction of this clause into the bill. He objected to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, because it risked the loss of the bill. It was not usual to make such a motion at so early a stage of the proceedings, and he regarded it as disrespectful to the House of Representatives. The earliest motion ought to have been to insist: then, in case of disagreement on the part of the House, it was the usual course to call a conference. If the Senate were now to agree to a motion to adhere, would not the bill be lost in the event of disagreement on the part of the House? [Mr. WEBSTER—"Certainly."] He would then oppose this motion, as he did not see any thing in the clause introduced by the House which ought to excite opposition.

Mr. WEBSTER rose merely to answer that point in the argument of the Senator from Alabama which attributed to him (Mr. W.) an intention to offer disrespect to the House. He had looked into this matter before he submitted his motion, and, on examining the precedents, had found that a similar motion had been made, in this stage, by many distinguished persons, and inter alia, by the gentleman from Alabama himself, on a question of great public interest. In reference to the relative rights of the two Houses over their own contingent fund, he considered this clause as not being in true taste. If the Senate believe they have the control of their own contingent fund, they should say so. The very nature of the contingent fund looked to other objects than such as were specified. Otherwise, there could be no contingency about it.

Mr. BENTON said the early subscriptions to books were for such as related to legislation, and aided the member in discharge of his duties—such as the debates of Congress. For such he had always voted, and against all others.

The question was then taken, and decided in favor of adherence—yeas 34, nays 18.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 24.

Distress Petition.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the proceedings of a public meeting held in the town of New Bedford, in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. W. said that New Bedford had been one of the most prosperous and fast-growing towns in Massachusetts. Its citizens were engaged in a most useful, hardy, and adventurous commerce, in which they had met with much success; and, three months ago, their condition was flourishing and happy; but a sudden and most extensive reverse has happened to it. Thirty or forty failures are said to have happened, and great pressure and distress prevail. I feel it my duty, said Mr. W., to present these things to the consideration of the Senate. If there can be either any faith in men's statements, or if facts be any proof, the pressure, so far from diminishing, is increasing. While we are talking about the danger of the moneyed aristocracy of the bank, a state of things is suffered to exist which is a perfect carnival to the real money aristocracy, if there be any such thing in the country. Capitalists holding up their money for such enormous rates of interest, and being able to command such rates, shows what sacrifices are made by industrious men, of small capital, to protect themselves from absolute ruin. In many places numerous workmen have been thrown out of employ, not only in the manufacturing establishments, but in the mines of some of the Middle States. Indeed, if the information of this morning is correct, one of these States had suffered a great disappointment, in failing to receive the instalments on its loans according to contract, and was obliged to take other measures for supplying the means of carrying on its public works.

MONDAY, JANUARY 27.

Distress Petition.

Mr. FEELINGHUYSEN presented a petition from a number of citizens of Newark, New Jersey, praying that the deposits of the public moneys may be restored to the Bank of the United States.

[On presenting the memorial, Mr. F. accompanied it with a speech, in which he said it was signed by 1,341 of the citizens of Newark, comprising four-fifths of the business population, now reduced to the deepest pecuniary distress by the removal of the deposits, and praying their restoration.]

General Appropriation Bill—Contingent Expenses of the two Houses—Purchase of Books for Members.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee of Managers appointed on the part of the Senate, to confer with the Managers of the House of Representatives on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the second amendment to the appropriation bill, made a report as follows:

"The managers appointed by the Senate to meet the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in conference, on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the second amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled 'An act making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834,' report—

"That they have met the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, and have held a free conference with them upon the difference existing between the two Houses, and have the pleasure to inform the Senate that the managers of the two Houses have come to an agreement upon the matter in difference. They have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses the following amendment to the bill, viz.:

"Strike out all the bill from the 16th line of the printed bill, inclusive, and insert—

"And be it further enacted, That, hereafter, neither the Senate nor House of Representatives shall subscribe for or purchase any book, unless an appropriation shall be made specially for that purpose, and the sum of five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, annually, for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, in addition to the sum of five thousand dollars heretofore usually appropriated for that purpose.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

"And be it further enacted, That all books already purchased, or ordered by either House, shall be paid for out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Removal of the Deposits.

The Chair announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the removal of the deposits; when

Mr. FORSYTH said: Both the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky are objectionable, in form and substance. They are censorial, not corrective; vindictive, not legislative. They strike at a supposed offender—they offer no redress for the asserted injury. They are justly exposed to all the reprehension of the Senator from Missouri. The first resolution can be defended on but one ground—the right of the Senate, by the expression of its opinions, to appeal to the people, to control the exercise of power by the elective franchise—a call upon the people to awaken from a false security, and rescue their endangered prosperity from the hands of a corrupt, improvident, or unwise administration. Occasions for such expressions of opinion are of rare occurrence. They cannot be made with any show of justification when the legislative power of Congress is ample to correct the existing, to avert the coming evil. Is it pretended that the power of Congress is not ample to redress this imputed wrong? If the act done is corrupt in the Chief Magistrate or Secretary, impeach and punish—if they have acted unwisely, but not corruptly, legislate and control them.

The deposits have been removed from the United States Bank. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us that, in the exercise of the power given to him by the charter, he has decided that time and circumstances required him to perform the act. The President approves the act. He has done more: he urged the former Secretary of the Treasury to perform it. In my judgment the disposition of the deposits is neither the primary nor preliminary, but a dependent question. Changing the place of collecting eight or nine millions of dollars can be of no great consequence in its effects on the business or currency of the country. The most enlightened of the friends of the bank admit, that, of itself, the order of the Secretary has not produced, or ought not to have produced serious embarrassments in the systems of credit or exchange. The derangement, the pressure in the moneyed transactions of the commercial cities, proceed from the act of the bank, which wants to ascertain what is to be its fate. Is the charter to expire in 1836, or to be renewed? If the charter is not be renewed, a change in the place of deposits was a thing of course, and certainly there can be no ground for clamorous complaints at the performance of an act now, which must be performed at no distant day.

The time chosen for changing the place of the Government deposits has been a subject of reprehension; it was done, Senators say, but two months before Congress met. Had I been an adviser of the President, I should have recommended delay. I should have said to him, I believe that the people have decided against a bank; that the majority of the representatives of the people, elected under the new census, bringing with them the popular sentiment, will record that judgment; but I advise you not to take it for granted that you understand the opinions of the House of Representatives. It is possible that the people may have continued you in place, and yet desire the continuance of the institution; wait until a vote of the House of Representatives renders their opinion not a matter of argument, but of undisputed and indisputable fact. The President has chosen to act upon the strong presumption afforded by the result of his own, and of the other popular elections. His justification depends upon the establishment of the fact presumed. But what right have we to complain? The course of the Senate was not misunderstood. Had it been, would it have been criminal in the President, or in the Secretary of the Treasury, to believe, and to act on the belief, that changes of opinion regarding the bank had been wrought here by changes in the State Governments? Can it be matter of supposition what are the wishes of the State sovereignties? Do they not correspond with the wishes of their respective sovereign, with the wishes of the sovereign of the United States.

But, sir, the President is arraigned for the exercise of a usurped authority over the public treasure. In the language of the Senator from Kentucky, he has laid an unhallowed hand upon the public purse. Is this fact or groundless assumption? By changing the places of collecting and depositing the revenue, has he increased his power over the money of the people? Can he now touch it without polluting his hands? Can the Secretary of the Treasury use one dollar of the public money in the State banks, more than he could before, when it was in the Bank of the United States and its branches? The same guaranties for the safety of our treasure now exist that formerly existed. The power of the President is neither increased nor diminished. If corrupt, the public money was equally within his reach in the Bank of the United States as in the State banks. But gentlemen assert that he has assumed the same power over the purse that he has over the sword. True, sir, he has exercised the same power over the purse and the sword. He has rightfully the same power over the sword and purse. He cannot use, and never has used, either, without legislative authority, given according to the provisions of the constitution. Can he unsheath the sword to strike abroad or at home? Can he lift his hand against foreign violence or domestic treason without our leave? So is it with the purse; he cannot, he dare not, touch one mill without legislative permission. A suggestion has been made, Mr. President, which I heard with regret, that the public money has been placed in favorite partisan banks, where it is likely to be used for all purposes of speculation and speculation. This means, I presume, that the deposits being changed to the State banks, a new and unworthy class of persons will receive loans who could not have obtained them from the Bank of the United States. This sweeping denunciation of the respectable and impeccable directors of all the State institutions trusted by the Secretary of the Treasury, is without the shadow of foundation. For skill and integrity they stand as fair as the directors of the Bank of the United States or any of its branches. The phrase of "favorite partisan banks" shows how idle the suggestion is. Of the banks now the depositories of the public money, the great mass are managed by persons decidedly opposed to the administration; who, on the question of re-chartering the Bank of the United States, differ with the Executive; whose influence and whose votes were against the present Chief Magistrate at the last election.

It is further alleged that the terms of the act establishing the Treasury Department prove that the Secretary was not to be under the control of the Executive. It is made his duty "to prepare and report plans for the improvement and management of the public revenue, and for the support of public credit," and "to report to either House of Congress upon any subject referred to him," &c. The Secretary being bound to report to Congress, and not to the Executive, it is gravely urged that the responsibility of the Secretary must be to Congress and not to the Executive. These clauses in the act of 1789 were not admitted without dispute and animadversion. The construction now put upon them would be truly surprising to the disputants of that day. Then it was urged by the objectors to the introduction of them, that it gave power to the Secretary over Congress; not power to Congress over the Secretary. [See Marshall's Life of Washington—pages 200 to 205.] They were defended and retained on the simple ground that they were intended merely to procure, directly and conveniently, information in detail from the best and most practical source. No one maintained or imagined that any change in the responsibility of the Secretary was to result from them. Gentlemen seem to be entirely unconscious of the effect of their hypothesis. If they are right, the responsibility of a Secretary of the Treasury for a wise administration of his Department, is nominal—it has no sanction. According to true theory, all the Executive officers of Government are responsible for the purity and wisdom of their conduct in the execution of the duties devolved upon them: to the Executive and to Congress for their purity—to the Executive alone for their wisdom. The hypothesis of Senators does not touch the responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury through an impeachment; but in this he is in no respect different from the other Heads of Departments —it destroys all responsibility for the wisdom of his acts. He reports to Congress, and proves his folly of improvidence. What remedy has Congress to apply? It can apply none. The two branches of the legislature may indeed decide that the removal of the officer would be proper. But this act must be performed by the Executive. We have here then a nominal responsibility to Congress, resting for its efficacy on the only constitutional sanction, the Executive power of removal.

The President of the United States and the late Secretary of the Treasury seem, sir, to have well understood their respective powers and obligations. When the question of the removal of the deposits was first agitated, Mr. Duane, with the frankness and firmness entitled to public respect, opposed the measure—it was one he could not sanction, but if resolved upon by the President, he would give way for another, who, coinciding with the President, could act without scruple or hesitation. After thorough investigation of the various arguments submitted to him, the President made his decision; and then, unfortunately, Mr. Duane declined fulfilling his voluntary engagement. The cause assigned was still more unfortunate. He conceived that he was insulted. This did not absolve him from his engagement; indeed it should have furnished a new motive for withdrawing. If treated courteously, his resignation should have been tendered out of respect to the President; if rudely, he should have thrown back upon the President his commission from respect to himself. Honorable Senators censure without measure the paper read to the Cabinet by the President. The exercise of ordinary charity would place the subject in a very different light from that thrown upon it here. Is it not apparent from the document itself, recollecting the preceding and attendant circumstances, that the sole object of the President was to shield Mr. Duane from the responsibility of the act which he seemed to dread. The President desired to take the whole, to reconcile his Secretary to the course resolved on. Entertaining a conscientious conviction that the course was fraught with injurious consequences to the public, the Secretary would have been faithless had he accepted the offered shelter. He was only wrong in shifting the ground upon which he stood. No honest Secretary will ever put his hand to a work which, in his judgment, will bring ruin or distress upon his country. No public officer is bound to suffer even uncourteous treatment from the Chief Magistrate; the only honorable step, in either case, is resignation of office, and submission of his conduct to the judgment of that great tribunal, public opinion, to which all must yield a cheerful or forced obedience. If little charity has been shown to the President, by what term shall I describe the treatment of the present Secretary of the Treasury, distinguished through a long life as a politician and as a man by his urbanity, and courtesy, and virtue. To call it harsh would not convey an adequate idea of its extreme injustice. An officer, who, previous to appointment to the Treasury Department, had urged upon the President, by fact and argument, the propriety of a removal of the deposits, is accused of being made the supple tool of the Executive for the performance of that act; is represented as standing by, the cold spectator of the struggles of his colleague in the contest, between his conscience and his attachment to the Chief Magistrate; as witnessing the contemptuous expulsion of that colleague from office, and then coolly entering the vacant place without sympathy or the smallest emotion for the man who preferred the loss of honors and emoluments to a betrayal of the interests of the people. The present Secretary left a place of honor for another not more honorable, a place of great responsibility for one of greater responsibility, a place uniting honor and profit, which the condition of a large family impelled him to regard, for an honorable place, the profits of which are insufficient to defray his necessarily increased expenditures. These circumstances alone should protect him from the slightest censure, but he stood committed to the President by his previously given advice, and when called upon to perform a task he had urged upon his colleague, he could not without dishonor, have disobeyed the call. He stood pledged to the Chief Magistrate and to the country, and he has not shrunk from his duty. He abides with unshaken confidence in the justice of his country, for all the consequences of the act he recommended to another and performed himself. And how is he represented here by the Senators from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY), and South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN), as claiming all power to himself, and denying all power to Congress, as claiming to himself and the Executive an authoritative control over the whole treasure of the nation, and denying the right of Congress to interfere. This is a terrible position to an officer whose duties are prescribed by Congress, who is now dependent upon one branch of Congress for his continuance in an office which he is accused of having earned regardless of the feelings and honors of a colleague, by base subserviency to the mandates of a ruthless master.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

Let us examine if in fact the Secretary claims this extensive, exclusive power. The Secretary holds that the charter of the bank is a contract between the Government of the United States and the stockholders—is this denied? The Secretary holds that by that contract the power to remove the deposits is expressly given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to him alone. Is this denied? In the execution of that contract, the Secretary holds that he must be the agent to exercise that power, and that it cannot be exercised by any other agent without a violation of the obligation of the Government. Is this denied? The Secretary holds that the removal of the deposits by himself is in conformity with the contract, and prostrates the only obstacle to the exertion of the power of Congress over the whole subject and all the interests connected with it. So far from claiming, therefore, power to the prejudice of Congress; so far from denying or attempting to resist their authority, he has loosened the bonds imposed by Congress upon their own hands. Supposing him to have been mistaken in his construction of the charter of the bank, admitting that Congress had the same power as the Secretary, or unlimited power over the deposits, there is now no pretext for accusing the Secretary of the Treasury of setting up claims to an authority above the power of Congress.

TUESDAY, February 4.

Removal of the Deposits—Motion to refer Mr. Taney's Report and Mr. Clay's second Resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the Special Order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to refer the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the second resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, to the Committee on Finance.

In proposing this motion, Mr. WEBSTER said that the intention was to give the committee an opportunity to make a report on the financial part of the subject, and promised that the report should be brought in to-morrow as soon as the Senate were in session.

Some discussion took place on the point of order, whether this reference would not take the subject from before the Senate, and thus arrest the pending discussion; in which Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. CLAY, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. SPRAGUE, took the negative of the question, and Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. KING took the affirmative view.

The motion was then agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, February 5.

Report on the Removal of the Deposits.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits, and the second of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky, made a report, the reading of which being called for,

Mr. WEBSTER read the report, which occupied about an hour and a quarter, and concluded with recommending the adoption of the second resolution introduced by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the report of the committee be printed, and that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the resolution which had been before the committee, with the other resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, be made the special order for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that 6,000 additional copies of the report be printed.

The motion to print 6,000 extra copies was decided in the affirmative—ayes 27.

THURSDAY, February 6.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Special Order, being

The Removal of the Deposits.

MR. WILKINS said before he proceeded to those resolutions he would again deprecate the degree of warmth which had been displayed in connection with the subject. On each side tragic pictures had been drawn of the state of the country. They had been told that they were in the midst of a revolution—that the constitution was lying prostrate and bleeding before them—that the rights of the people had been trampled on, and that, though blood had not yet been drawn, a civil war was fast approaching. They were told that the gloom of '76 and '77 was hovering over them. In the foreground of the picture was depicted an ambitious President, grasping at despotic power, and fast ascending to the despotic throne, with the purse in one hand and the sword in the other, a public robber of the rights and treasure of the people. All this was in the foreground of the picture; while in the background, out of sight, were to be found the real principles of the question. If gentlemen judged of political by physical phenomena, there might be some reason to suppose that the evils spoken of would come upon them. If it were true that a political storm was always preceded by a calm, gentlemen were right in the views they took of this subject. Until the present debate commenced, long after the removal of the deposits, there was an entire calm. The confidence in government was unparalleled. If any change took place in that confidence it was only known by its increase.

A revolution "yet bloodless!" What did the honorable Senator from New Jersey mean? He (Mr. W.) would leave it to be settled by the people. He only wished to say that the picture which had been drawn was too highly colored. He thought that what had been said was uncalled for by any public act of the Government. When this subject was examined, and the very worst made of it, what did it amount to? Simply that no emergency had occurred in the country to justify the removal of the deposits. Take the report of the Committee on Finance, and every thing which had been said and done upon the subject, and what did it amount to? That the Secretary had the power of removing the public money, but that his act was not justified by expediency. The law was with the Secretary, but he had not been governed by expediency. A mere mistake as to the extent of the emergency. And out of this simple fact had grown all the alarms which had been spread through the country. Senators had assembled in peace and quietness. The 1st of December, 1833, came round without any complaint—without even a whisper from the people. Let them look back. Where did the panic come from? On what day did it first make its appearance? On the day that the Senator from Kentucky made his address to the Senate. That voice, to which no man could listen without delight, was followed by this distress. He (Mr. W.) had travelled through his own State, and could say, that if the removal of the deposits had there effected any change, it was in favor of the man who made the removal. He (Mr. W.) had been going on, when he was interrupted, to say that he could have wished that a different course had been adopted by the bank. He could have wished that it had reasoned with the administration and Congress, and suspended, until the result was known, the oppressive measures which it had pursued. The bank, however, had thought proper to act differently. Although it was said to be the agent of Congress, it had never had one word with Congress. It had made war upon its principal, and had also waged war upon an innocent and unoffending community. Liberality or restriction was in its power, and it chose the latter. He (Mr. W.) only asked that the bank would allow Congress the power of arresting it in the particular course which it had adopted. A different course would have been prudent, both as it related to the country and to the stockholders.

He would say one word on the subject of the union of the purse and the sword in the person of the President. There could be no such thing as a union of the purse and the sword as long as the constitution should exist, as long as the people remained free and enlightened. If it were intended to corrupt the people—if corruption were to take hold of the people, such as the conduct of the bank pointed out, then, indeed, a union of the purse and the sword might be talked of. What was the power of the sword, which was so much spoken of? The President was indeed, by the constitution, the commander-in-chief of the militia of the country. But what was that more than a nominal power? What could he do? He could not raise men; he could not clothe them; he could not pay them; he could not appoint a single officer without the consent of Congress. It was Congress that did all this, and not the Executive. Even the very subsistence of the President himself depended upon the will of Congress. The President could not make war or peace; those acts must also emanate from Congress; and if the President overstepped his powers, he was liable to be impeached, to be tried by the Senate, and to be hurled from his office. With regard to the present action of the Executive, in removing the deposits, what power has the President assumed? In his cabinet paper of February, 1833, he cast from him all idea of uniting the purse and the Executive powers; he would have nothing to do with the deposits, but for strong facts respecting the conduct of the bank, which had recently come out. What did this prove? It proved that he had cast away from him the public purse, and that he disclaimed all idea of union between it and the sword.

Mr. President, I will now take up the two resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, and proceed to examine them. The first resolution involves the question of political power; but it charges no corruption on the President; it relates to his peculiar views as to Executive duties, and a power supposed to be assumed by him, which is not authorized by the constitution and laws of the country, and the removal of one man from office on account of his opinions. If even corruption could be proved, it would not restore the former Secretary of the Treasury, who is now precluded by his successor. I took it that the right of removal was admitted; that the Senate were inclined to acquiesce in universal usage; the Senate may, with propriety, acquiesce in the right to remove, when, almost every day, they are confirming or rejecting nominations made by the President, to fill the places of those officers that have been so removed. The resolution itself admits the right of removal in the President, and it charges him with assuming a right over the Treasury of the United States. Why, then, do we persevere in contradicting these authorities? Why have our arguments gone on denying the right of removal? Sir, I am at a loss to know. This resolution consists of two parts; one relates to the removal, and the other to a restoration. But the restoration of the late Secretary is wholly out of the question. No one can look at his conduct and opinions, but he would justify the President from personal considerations, without reference to the public measure. The Secretary came into office, holding towards the President unjust and unjustifiable sentiments: that General Jackson was the most unfit man in the country for our Chief Magistrate; that he was the victim of passion and arbitrary feeling; that he was guided, not by his own judgment, but by a secret cabal; that he never carried out, and never intended to carry out, any political opinion which he had professed. If all this was so, how was it possible to get along with such a Secretary, who was his adviser and counsellor, appointed to aid him, and at the same time held such secret opinions, and had no confidence in the man, or in his political opinions, and deemed them subject to corruption; how was it possible for them to pull together? But this is not all: the Secretary tells the President that the measure was insisted on, not from public considerations, but from vindictive and arbitrary motives; from no good principle; but from a vile, vindictive, and arbitrary feeling. These, sir, are his very epithets. Sir, how was it possible to get along? How was it possible for the President to proceed with a Secretary who, from his feelings and sentiments, could not co-operate with him? But even this is not all; when things became serious between the President and Secretary, the latter promised to resign, but he afterwards refused, for two reasons: because he had made a promise which he never expected to be called upon to fulfil, and in the second place, he determined to remain in office, that he might fix on the President the charge of interfering with an officer of Congress; and he retained his office against the wishes of the President, for no other object but for fixing this charge upon him. Sir, he ought to have been removed the very next moment; he was in the Cabinet, and the President was right in removing him. His office was retained in violation of his promise, and with the purpose of overthrowing the President.

The third section of the second article of the constitution provided that the President should take care that the laws were properly executed. In reference to the execution of the civil law, indeed, the constitution was silent. What then was the meaning of the constitutional injunction? What was meant by the word care? Surely the power was not suspended until some open rebellion had broken out against the constitution. Surely this power was never absent. Surely in all cases it was a part of his duty to attend to the revenue and to the finances. Had he not a right to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to inquire how the collecting officers were doing their duty? This general care was indispensable, and connected with the oath of his own office to defend, protect, and watch over the constitution. [Mr. W. here referred, for corroboration, to Kent's Commentaries.]

In the exercise of the authority which the President assumed, he interfered with no legislative action. The laws had passed from under the hands of the legislature and became his care. The law had given power to the Secretary to remove the deposits, but was silent as to the time and manner. And was it not the duty of the President to take care and watch for the fit time, and when he saw it, suggest it to the Secretary?

Suppose the second resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky ordered a restoration of the deposits, and, after the resolution had been adopted by Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury refused to comply with the requisition, what was to be done with him? He might be impeached; but would it be wise to wait the result of the trial? The country would say, remove this refractory officer. Suppose it had been the universal opinion that the deposits ought to have been removed, and that universal censure would otherwise attend the administration had it refused to remove them according to the general wish, would it be justifiable to remove him? Take the Post Office, for instance: had not all the Presidents walked into that Department, and asked how the Postmaster exercised the power of appointment? And was it not well known that a Postmaster was removed because he had appointed a Postmaster in one of our large cities? The President was justified, morally and politically speaking, in removing officers and in appointing them. Mr. Taney was not appointed by the President because of his pliability of opinion.

[SENATE.]

Distress Memorial.

[FEBRUARY, 1834.]

To the high personal and political character of Mr. Taney, there could be no objections. But it was well known that a conviction of the necessity of the removal of the deposits was no sudden opinion of Mr. Taney's, adopted by him for the purpose of obtaining the situation which he now holds. As early as March last, he stated his opinion that the deposits ought to be removed, in order to give the bank time to wind up its concerns. In looking around, the President had a right to select an officer who would honestly and conscientiously discharge his duty. It was perfectly right in the President to select a man who coincided in opinion with himself. That was no assumption of power on the part of the President, which did not belong to him; and he (Mr. W.) would like to know when an officer was selected by the President, except on account of his political opinions. The selection, then, was no evidence of corruption on the part of the selector or on the part of the person selected.

Distress Memorials.

[Mr. SOUTHARD presented the proceedings of two large meetings in the counties of Morris and Burlington, complaining of the distress and alarm occasioned by the removal of the deposits, and praying their restoration, and spoke at large in support of their object.]

TUESDAY, February 11.

Public Distress.

Mr. McKEAN presented the memorial of a meeting of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, (brought on by a committee of gentlemen appointed by the meeting,) complaining of their great pecuniary embarrassments, and the disordered state of the currency of the country, which they attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their immediate restoration to that institution.

Mr. McK., on presenting the memorial, said, that a committee composed of gentlemen of the first respectability and intelligence, from Philadelphia, now in attendance at the seat of Government, had a few moments since charged him with a memorial to be presented to the Senate, signed by more than ten thousand citizens of that vicinity, deeply complaining of pecuniary distress and derangement of the currency, which they attributed to the recent removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying Congress to interfere for their relief. I have, said Mr. McK., been honored with an interview from a portion of this committee, and have listened to their statements; and however I may differ from them as to the true cause of present embarrassments, and the proper mode of redress, I can no longer doubt the reality and extent of suffering in that quarter. Mr. McK. then moved that the memorial, together with a letter which he had received from the committee, be read by the Secretary, and that both be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. CLAY hoped the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania comprehended not only the printing of the memorial, together with the letter of the committee, but the names of the memorialists.

Mr. McKEAN replied that he had not intended to move for the printing of the names, but he would accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, as a modification of his motion.

Distress Memorial.

Mr. MANGUM presented the resolutions and proceedings of a meeting of a large and respectable body of the citizens of the county of Burke, in the State of North Carolina, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments and deranged state of the currency of the country, which they attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, praying for some mode of relief, and recommending the immediate restoration of the deposits to that institution.

It was perhaps proper, Mr. M. said, on presenting these proceedings and resolutions, to apprise the Senate that they spoke the voice of the immediate friends of the Chief Magistrate of the United States. In no part of the southern country was the phalanx which gave so strong an impulse to the popularity of the Executive, so unbroken, or so firm in its attachment, as was to be found in the district from whence these proceedings came; and yet he learned that in that country the sense of its population was universal in condemnation of those measures which had called forth the sense of the meeting. It was stated in these resolutions, that the money of the United States Bank was entirely driven out of circulation in that section of the country, either in consequence of its being hoarded by those who, having no immediate use for it, deemed it the safest money to keep, or by being absorbed for purposes of exchange, while that whole country was flooded with the trash of this district: even the smallest debts could not be paid but in coin. Sir, (said Mr. M.), these resolutions speak the grave, calm, and deliberate tone of the best friends of the Executive, who emphatically say that they cannot submit to be ruined, to gratify the whims or caprices of any man.

Mr. BROWN, of North Carolina, rose and said, that, although he had not been apprised, but a few minutes before, that this preamble and resolutions were to be presented to the Senate, he felt it to be his imperative duty, as one of the Representatives of the State of North Carolina on this floor, in consequence of the tone of this preamble and these resolutions, and of the remarks of his colleague, to take the present occasion to explain some of his views in reference to this subject. He was one of those who, in his representative capacity, felt every disposition to respect public opinion, whenever that opinion could be properly ascertained. Whenever he should be brought to feel a settled conviction that the opinion of the people of North Carolina was in opposition to the course which he had felt it to be his duty to take on great political measures, and whenever that opinion should be fairly presented to him, he would be either prepared to obey it, or to relinquish the seat which he had the honor to hold on this floor. If he did not adopt one of these alternatives, he should consider that he was acting in opposition to the sacred principles of our republican institutions, and following the practice of those who, while they were issuing denunciations of Executive usurpations of power, were themselves acting in opposition to the expression of opinion of their own constituents; and were thus violating the great principles of republican Government. But he could not consent to take the opinion of these petitioners, respectable as he admitted them to be, as the sense of the people of North Carolina. It was true that some of the signers of this paper had been supporters of the present Executive, but it was equally true that others of them were his decided opponents. From the tone of the resolutions, and the character of the newspapers selected for their publication, he inferred, indeed, that the greater number had been always in opposition to General Jackson. In regard to the great question which was agitating the country from one end of it to the other, his own opinion had been firmly and deliberately made up. From a view of all the circumstances he was satisfied that the agitation and embarrassment which prevailed resulted from the conduct of the bank itself, and the conduct of that political party, the existence of which seemed to depend on that of the bank.

Death of Mr. Bouldin.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Honorable THOMAS TYLER BOULDIN, late a Representative from the State of Virginia—and that his funeral would take place to-morrow at half-past 11 o'clock.

Mr. RIVES rose and said—

Mr. President: The Senate were yesterday apprised by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PIERCE,) in the momentary absence of my colleague and myself, of the melancholy event which has just been communicated to us by the House of Representatives, and which has deprived the State of Virginia of one of her most distinguished Representatives in the legislature of the Union. The event, sir, in all its circumstances and associations, was one of the most solemn and affecting character—well calculated to admonish us, in the midst of our busy cares here, “what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!” I now rise, Mr. President, to ask, at the hands of the Senate, the accustomed marks of respect to the memory of our deceased associate, and which are so eminently due to the high character he maintained in all the relations both of public and of private life. I beg leave, therefore, to offer for the adoption of the Senate the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Honorable THOMAS TYLER BOULDIN, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, at the hour of 11 o'clock, A. M., to-morrow: and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

This resolution having been unanimously agreed to—

On motion of Mr. RIVES,

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet at half-past ten o'clock, A. M., for the purpose of joining the House of Representatives in attending the obsequies of the late Honorable THOMAS T. BOULDIN.

On motion of Mr. RIVES,

The Senate then adjourned.

Portsmouth (N. H.) Memorial.

Mr. BELL presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments and distress prevailing in that section of the Union, which the memorialists attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying that they may be restored to that institution, or that Congress would make such other legislative provisions for the relief of the country, as its wisdom might devise. Mr. B. said, that, while up, it might be proper for him to observe, that the signers of this memorial were men of integrity, character, and respectability,—merchants, ship owners, and men of business, whose names carried as much weight as those of any body of men in the country.

He moved that the memorial be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed, with names attached.

Mr. HILL had not had the privilege of a sight of the original memorial from Portsmouth; but a member of the House, who had a copy of it, had kindly shown that to him. Of two hundred and fifty petitioners, so far as can be ascertained by gentlemen personally acquainted, there is not a solitary friend of the administration upon it. In relation to this memorial, he would ask leave to read extracts from a letter he had recently received from that town:

"On Saturday I perceived, by a notice stuck up at the brick market, that the federalists of this town were about to memorialize Congress upon the subject of the public deposits. Although this invitation was given to all, without distinction of party, yet I feel persuaded that you will not find the name of a single friend of the administration. If they have told you that there is any unusual pressure in this town, it is not true. There is no man here that feels embarrassed for the want of money, save those who have unwarrantably extended their business upon a borrowed capital. Every thing here commands a high price. The agriculturists feel no pressure. They are reaping richly of the blessings of a wise and judicious administration, and of the bounties of a kind Providence. The merchants here might do the same, if it were not for the corrupt and corrupting, and shameful management of the banks. I say banks, because the most of the local banks in this town sympathize strongly in politics with Mr. Biddle's bank and its branches.

"I will venture to assert, and pledge my veracity upon the assertion, that the branch bank in this place has in her vaults at least fifty thousand dollars in specie, and at least thirty thousand dollars in local bills. If the fact be so, it would enable that bank alone to discount over a hundred thousand dollars. How much has been discounted at that bank I have not the means of knowing.

"This bank, also, refuses to send home the bills of the Commercial Bank, although the cashier has been repeatedly requested so to do, and receive the specie for them."

Mr. H. continued: Sir, the number of petitioners attached to the Portsmouth memorial, is less than one-half the number of votes that have sometimes been cast by the opposition party in that town. For some time past, it will be seen that the discount of the Portsmouth branch has averaged about $400,000. On the first of January it was $395,083—it was reduced in that month, when it was necessary to prepare for a petition, to $362,878—making a contraction of more than a thousand dollars in a day. The Portsmouth petitioners probably owe the bank at least three-fourths of the whole debt. There are but few debts due out of that town; and of the bank's debtors the names of some of these few are on the petition. Sir, said Mr. H., very few persons at Portsmouth, or elsewhere in New Hampshire, would think of moving in favor of the bank, except those who act in this matter from party motives; for the bank has been a blighting curse to the men of business of that place. There are, sir, on this petition, several names of persons who failed in business four and five years ago, and whose names are on bad paper at the branch bank, five, ten, twenty, and up to sixty thousand dollars each. There are also other names on the paper of respectable gentlemen, men of reputed wealth, who are reported to have permanent accommodations at the bank, of from 5,000 to 20,000 dollars, which is employed in navigation or manufacturing establishments.

Virginia Memorial.

Mr. TYLER rose to present a memorial from the city of Richmond, signed by nearly nine hundred of the citizens, and certain resolutions adopted by the people of Franklin county, in the State of Virginia. In regard to the memorial, he would say, that it would be borne in mind by the Senate, that he had rarely, very rarely, been called upon, since he had been a member of the Senate, to perform a duty similar to that which he was then in the act of performing. The people of the State which he represented, in part, on this floor, were content, under ordinary circumstances, to leave the expression of their sentiments to be made by those who represented them and their interests in this House and the other; and their departure from that course, on the present occasion, bore to Senators the strongest possible evidence of the great agitation of the public mind. The memorial was signed by persons of all employments and pursuits, and presented an array of names which would compare, for intelligence and the attributes of high moral character, with any similar number from any city or town in the Union. They remonstrated against the late proceedings of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, as involving high assumptions of power. Reared, from early infancy, in the belief that, in order to preserve liberty from overthrow, it was necessary to keep the three departments of the Government separate and distinct, they regard with alarm the late measures of the President, as drawing within the vortex of Executive power, judicial and legislative functions, and in the forfeiture pronounced of a most valuable franchise, or privilege, of that corporation, which had been solemnly ratified to it by charter stipulation, and for which it had paid, they recognize a breach of public faith and violation of individual rights in the persons of the corporators. Mr. T. said, that while he concurred with the memorialists most fully in their views, he should abstain from going into their consideration now, as he proposed, should his health permit and the Senate so please, to express his opinions more at large upon them after the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. WILKINS) should finish the speech which he had commenced. The memorialists also represented that a deep gloom rested on their city and hung over the country; that commercial enterprise and manufacturing industry, deprived of their proper aliment, were stagnated; that all the pursuits of life were paralyzed; that, in consequence thereof, the great staples of production, tobacco and flour, had each fallen twenty per cent. within the last sixty days; that exchanges had fallen from eight to thirteen per cent. in the same period, and as an evidence that no accidental circumstance of trade had produced this state of things, but that all depended upon the condition of the money market, that every day and every hour brought with it its fluctuations. The memorialists saw no glimmering of light through the gloom, but anticipated a darker night yet to come than that which enshrouded them. They looked to Congress for relief. They ask not, said Mr. T., a renewal of the bank charter. No, sir, they implore that a stable system may be introduced. Not one resting on Executive will—not a Treasury resting on agents appointed by the Executive, liable to be displaced at his pleasure—holding their existence but at the breath of his nostrils—fleeting and ephemeral as whim, or caprice, or passion, or political motives might make them: but resting on law—permanent, enduring law—law not to be changed but for high reasons of state policy, approved by the wisdom, and sanctioned by the experience of Congress. To a measure of that character do they look for the restoration of public confidence; and to such measure alone can they look, or can the country look.

Funeral of William Wirt, Esq., late Attorney-General of the United States.

The Journal having been read—

Mr. CHAMBERS rose, and said he had been apprised that the House of Representatives had just adjourned for the purpose of attending the funeral of the late Mr. WIRT; and as many of the Senators not only felt it an imperative duty to join in paying the last tribute of respect to the distinguished individual referred to, but were impelled to do so by a deep sense of feeling, the Senate would not probably be full enough to attend to business. He was not aware that it would be necessary for him to make any motion for the postponement of the resolutions or proceedings that might be expected to come up; and he would, therefore, simply content himself with a motion to adjourn. Whereupon, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 21.

Public Distress.

Mr. SOUTHARD said he had been charged with three memorials from different parts of the State of New Jersey, which he had been requested to present to the Senate. The first came to him from a committee appointed by the citizens of Trenton, and its vicinity, and was signed by 423 names of persons, many of whom were among the most respectable in the State. Two of the committee were well known as having been formerly among the most ardent and active supporters of the present administration, as were also some others on the list. The letter which accompanies the memorial states that the latter expresses the views of the great body of farmers, merchants, mechanics, and working men of that portion of the State, without distinction of party.

The second memorial came from the township of Howell, a part of the county of Monmouth, which is now represented in the State legislature by members who are decided in their support of the present administration; it is signed by about three hundred individuals, of whose characters, standing, and respectability, he was also prepared to speak.

The third memorial was signed by 2,785 of the inhabitants and voters of the county of Burlington, in a different part of the State. It would be well recollected that, some time since, on the occasion of presenting the proceedings of a county meeting, held in the same county, he had ventured to express his opinion that those proceedings contained the sense of the county of Burlington on this great and exciting question. For this, he had been accused, in the very ears of power itself, of deliberate falsehood. Sir, said he, here are the names of a majority of the voters of that county, which is represented by four friends of the administration out of six representatives in the State legislature, three of whom voted for the resolutions instructing their Senators and Representatives in Congress to resist any effort to restore the deposits to the United States Bank. In that county, 4,200 was the highest number of votes which he recollected to have been given at any election; and at the last election, only about 8,500 votes were given. Here, in this memorial, will be found 2,785 names of voters of that county. More than 600 majority is the largest vote which he recollected, and about 1,000 majority, upon such a vote as that by which the members who instructed him held their seats. Was he criminal, then, in the representation which he had before made? Shall the people of that county, and the world, be told that he was guilty of deliberate falsehood in his representation of their opinions? And this, too, by the very mouth-piece of the Executive whose illegal conduct they disapprove? Is calumnious misrepresentation the fit and appropriate offering, at this day, to the ears of power, by its agents and flatterers?—the selected means, by which light is to be excluded from the only quarter in which relief, to a distressed community, can be promptly afforded?

Mr. S. moved that the memorials be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Maine Petitions.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the memorial of 646 citizens of the city of Portland, Maine, in relation to the general distress of the country, and the deranged state of the currency.

Mr. S. said that the memorial sets forth, that the signers, and the community in which they live, are now suffering under great and unexampled pecuniary distress. That there is at present an almost entire prostration of business, and that their prospects for the future, are still more gloomy; and they appeal to the national legislature to afford them some relief from their present suffering, and to avert the threatened danger of still greater injury. They do not undertake to point out in what that relief shall consist, or the mode in which it shall be obtained; but leave it, with confidence, to the wisdom and enlightened patriotism of Congress. They come here to the legislature—they do not go to the Executive—because they do not believe that it belongs to the Executive department of this Government to produce and sustain a sound currency, any more than that it legitimately appertains to it to produce a de-ranked and unsound currency.

This memorial is signed by all classes of citizens—merchants, mechanics, artisans, and laborers—of all parties; and from personal acquaintance with many of the memorialists, I bear willing and cheerful and decided testimony to their high respectability—to the entire confidence which ought to be reposed in all their statements. And, from the knowledge that I have of those who have transmitted the memorial, and given me their certificate as to the high respectability of those with whom I am personally unacquainted, I am confident in the belief, that all the memorialists are highly respectable.

The petitions having been read—

Mr. SHEPLEY rose and said, that very soon after he was called to take a seat in this chamber, he had made a few remarks on the subject of the public distress. He had then borne testimony, that, when he came into the Senate, he was unacquainted with any extraordinary distress then existing in the money market. He had not had occasion to believe, at that day, that he was mistaken in the view which he had presented. He now understood, that, when Congress met, there was no greater distress in the money market in his section of the country, than frequently existed under ordinary circumstances. He wished that it was in his power to believe that the same state of things now existed; but he was now satisfied that it was far otherwise, and that there existed in the money market a distress unparalleled, pervading all classes of the community. It was never his desire to state any thing more than the truth. He had waited during the last eighty days, to understand wherefore it was that, day after day, they were to be told that there was an existing distress, and that this distress was increasing. He thought that he had now obtained so much knowledge, as enabled him to understand the subject. He held in his hand a statement of the condition of the United States Bank on the 1st of this month, which came from a friendly hand, and which he would now beg permission to read to the Senate.

[Here Mr. S. read the monthly statement of the condition of the bank.]

He then went on to say, that, in relation to the deposits in the United States Bank, every experienced banker, as well as every man of good sense, knew that a bank soon became experimentally acquainted with the average of its deposits; and that it was not necessary to retain but a limited amount of specie in the vaults, with a view to meet any rare and extraordinary occasion, because if one dollar was taken out, another was deposited; and thus, what was removed by one depositor, was replaced by another. In this view, he arrived at the conclusion, that it was not necessary for the United States Bank to retain specie to an amount beyond two or three millions, whereas it had now twenty-two millions to meet and fifteen millions to meet it. He had understood that the President of the United States Bank had, on more than one occasion, complained of the accumulation of specie; had at one time transported a quantity to Europe, because there was a surplus in the vaults; and had given it as his opinion, that seven millions of specie was sufficient to meet the greatest circulation of paper. He believed that the president of the bank was correct in this view, and that one dollar in specie was sufficient for an issue of five dollars in paper.

He inferred from this view that it was in the power of the bank, on the 1st of February, to circulate twenty millions more of its bills than it had circulated, and without any danger to itself, and the circulation of ten millions would have greatly relieved the country. The bank had sometimes expressed a desire to relieve the country, but what now was its conduct? It had curtailed, instead of extending its accommodations; and what was to be expected in the future? He held in his hand a paper, which spoke the sentiments of the bank to the people. He wished it to be well understood what the people had to expect from this quarter. A few days since, a communication appeared in a newspaper, asking of the United States Bank to extend its loans to the community. There was now another paragraph in the same newspaper, speaking in a somewhat singular tone, and as if by authority, and adopting such language as no one could use who was not in a situation of some power. If the writer had not the power to carry his suggestions into effect, he must have been a very presumptuous man to use such language. He referred to an article in the National Intelligencer, in the form of a communication, which he would now read.

[Here Mr. S. read the article referred to.]

Mr. S. continued. What did this paper say? It was directed to public opinion, and declared what the bank would do; and that was nothing, until the State banks should be prohibited by their stockholders from receiving the public deposits; thus causing them to be restored to the Bank of the United States. Let this be done, and every thing will go well; distress and anguish will no longer exist. All the evils so loudly complained of will at once be remedied, and confidence and security again prevail. But if the stockholders of the State banks will not move, so as to prohibit their institution from receiving the deposits, why, then, things must grow worse and worse, the distresses of the country become deeper and deeper, until it ends in absolute ruin. He knew not who were authorized to use the language of this paper, but he believed they spoke from some authority; and that, if they did so speak, it was one which sought to control the councils as well as the finances of the nation. They say that not only deep distress is felt throughout the land, but that, unless the deposits are restored to the Bank of the United States, it will become still deeper. Much as he deplored the existence of distress of any kind, he had rather bear any that might arise from pecuniary causes, than submit to a declaration of the kind given in the paper he had referred to; and he well knew that the people of his State would endure the severest privations, no matter from what causes they might arise, sooner than be dictated to by an authority coming from a moneyed institution.

[SENATE.]

SATURDAY, February 22.

Removal of the Deposits—Resolutions and Instructions of the Virginia General Assembly—Resignation of Senator Rives.

Mr. TYLER presented resolutions recently adopted by the two Houses of Assembly of the State of Virginia, expressive of their opinions and views relative to the conduct of the Executive with regard to the Bank of the United States and the deposits of the public revenue. Mr. T. proposed to abstain, at this time, from making any remarks on the subjects embraced in the resolutions, other than to say, that, concurring as he did most fully in the views expressed by the legislature of his State, he should use all the means in his power to carry them in effect. Mr. T. should, at another time more convenient to the Senate, make such remarks as the importance of the subject required. For the present he should merely move for the printing of the resolutions, and their reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RIVES rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The Senate will indulge me, I hope, standing in the position I do, with a few remarks on the subject of the resolutions just read. It is very far from my intention to attempt to impugn, in any manner, the force of those resolutions, or to derogate, in the slightest degree, from the high respect to which they are entitled here and elsewhere. On the contrary, I recognize them as the legitimate expression of the opinion of my State, conveyed through the only authentic organ known to her constitution and laws.

The Senate will have perceived, from the reading of the resolutions, that it is my misfortune to entertain, and to have expressed, on the grave questions now occupying the public mind, opinions very different from those asserted by the resolutions. Notwithstanding this difference of opinion, I should feel it my duty, as one of the representatives of Virginia on this floor, to conform to the views expressed by her legislature, if, in the circumstances in which I am placed, I could do so without dishonor. I hold it, sir, to be a vital principle of our political system, one indispensable to the preservation of our institutions, that the representative, whether a member of this or the other House, is bound to conform to the opinions and wishes of his constituents, authentically expressed; or, if he be unable to do so, from overruling and imperious considerations, operating upon his conscience or honor, to surrender his trust into the hands of those from whom he derived it, that they may select an agent who can better carry their views into effect.

On all occasions involving questions of expediency only, it is, I conceive, the bounden duty of the representative to conform explicitly to the instructions of the constituent body, where those instructions are to be carried into execution by a legislative act, which, as a mandate of the public will, prescribes and directs what shall be done for the public good. But where the instructions contemplate a declaration of principles or opinions, which are contrary to the sincere and honest convictions of the representative, as there is no means of forcing the assent of the understanding to abstract propositions, the only course left to him is, by the surrender of his commission, to put it in the power of his constituents to confer it on another whose opinions correspond with their own.

To apply these principles to my own case, I do not hesitate to say, that, if the instructions of the legislature of my State had required me specifically to vote for a law, or other legislative act, providing for the restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, however highly inexpedient I deem such a measure to be, I should nevertheless have felt it my duty to give the vote required. Such, it will be recollected, was the precise demand of the memorial of the citizens of Richmond, presented a few days ago by my honorable colleague, and which concluded by asking, that Congress "would provide by law for the immediate restoration of the public moneys to the Bank of the United States." But, sir, this is not the shape in which the question is presented to me, by the resolutions of the General Assembly of my State, or by the proceedings pending in this body. Those resolutions instruct the Senators of Virginia, in general terms, "to use their best exertions to procure the adoption by Congress of proper measures for restoring the public moneys to the Bank of the United States." Now, sir, I am bound to inquire, what are those proper measures, in the contemplation of the legislature of Virginia.

We all know, that the only measures proposed or contemplated, in this body, are the two declaratory resolutions offered by the Senator of Kentucky; the first affirming that the conduct of the President, with reference to the removal of the public deposits, was a dangerous and unconstitutional assumption of power; the second, declaring the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for that removal, to be unsatisfactory and insufficient. When the latter of these resolutions, together with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was referred some days ago to the Committee on Finance, that committee did not report a bill or joint resolution for the restoration of the deposits, but simply a recommendation that the Senate should adopt the declaratory resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. In short, it is now avowed and understood, on all hands, that all that is deemed necessary, or will be proposed here, to effect the restoration of the public moneys to the Bank of the United States, is a mere declaration, by Congress, of the insufficiency of the reasons assigned for their removal.

The only measures, then, on which I shall be called to carry into effect the instructions of the legislature of my State are, the declaratory resolutions moved by the Senator from Kentucky, and now depending before the Senate. That these resolutions are, in the estimation of the General Assembly of Virginia, proper measures—that the opinions and principles declared by them are believed by the General Assembly to be correct and well founded—it would be unpardonable blindness to the language and tenor of their instructions not to see. At the same time, it is well known to the Senate that, on each of the propositions declared in these resolutions, I had (and I will take leave to add, after the most careful and anxious investigation) come to opposite conclusions, which I had earnestly asserted and maintained on this floor. I am, therefore, placed, by the instructions of the legislature of my State, in this dilemma—either to vote for the declaratory resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, and thereby express opinions which I not only do not entertain, but the reverse of which I have sincerely and earnestly maintained on this floor; or, by voting against them, to oppose the only measures which are likely to come before this body, having in view the restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, and thus appear in the attitude of disregarding and thwarting the declared wishes of the General Assembly of Virginia. I am sure I but respond to the honorable feelings of all who hear me, in saying that the first branch of the alternative is impossible, while the latter is no less forbidden by my principles, and a proper sense of duty to the constituted authorities of my State. The only course left to me, then, is one which the Senate can be at no loss to anticipate.

Before I close the few remarks with which I have felt myself called on to trouble the Senate, I beg leave to say, that, while I recognize implicitly the resolutions just read as the legitimate and constitutional expression of the opinion of my State, I wish not to be understood as saying that they express the real public opinion of the State—that of the people. On the contrary, my firm and clear conviction is, that the sentiments of the people, in the present instance, are not in unison with the proceedings of the legislative authority. The manifestations of popular sentiment already commencing in various quarters of the State—the principles and opinions heretofore steadily cherished by Virginia—multiplied communications received from the most respectable sources—and my own knowledge, I may be permitted to add, of a people with whom I have been connected, in the relations of public service, for now near twenty years—assure me that they are not; and the revolution of a few months will, I confidently believe, render the fact manifest to all the world. But, in the regulation of my official conduct here, I am not permitted to look beyond the constitutional expression of the opinion of the State, by its regular and proper organ. If a Senator were allowed to set up against the public opinion of his State, as officially and solemnly declared by her legislature, a hypothetical public opinion, which may or may not be that of the people of the State, it is obvious that a door would be opened for the total evasion of all effective responsibility of this body to public opinion. It is on the legislatures of the States that the constitution has devolved the choice of members of this body, and the same legislatures must be the interpreters of the public opinion of their respective States to the Senators chosen by them, whenever an occasion shall arise which may call for a solemn manifestation of that opinion.

This is indeed the only practicable mode of bringing the opinion of the sovereign community, represented in this body, to act, with authoritative influence, on its proceedings; and when it is considered that the Senate is, by the greater permanency of its official tenure, farther removed from the salutary controls of the representative system than any other branch of the Government, all will see the necessity of keeping open a clear and designated channel by which public opinion may promptly reach it, in an authoritative form, and be made effectual on its deliberations. It is thus essential to the practical supremacy of the popular will itself, that the State legislatures should be recognized as the authentic and constitutional exponents of the popular opinion of the respective States, in all relations with this body. If, in any instance, the legislatures of the States shall mistake the opinions of the people, it is, as I conceive, for the people themselves, and not for us, to correct the mistake.

These, Mr. President, are, very briefly, the opinions I entertain on the delicate questions presented for my consideration by the instructions of the legislature of my State, just read; and the only alternative they leave me, in the circumstances in which I am placed, is to surrender the trust with which I have been honored, as a member of this body, into the hands of those from whom I received it. I know well, Mr. President, and I feel, how much of honor and of satisfaction I give up in abandoning my seat on this floor. I abandon what I have ever regarded the highest honor of my public life—an honor than which none higher, in my opinion, can be presented to the ambition of an American citizen. I sacrifice social and kindly relations with many members of this body—I would fain hope with all—which have been the source of the highest satisfaction to me here, and the remembrance of which I shall cherish with sincere pleasure in the retirement whither I go. I know and feel the weight of these sacrifices, but, great as they are, I make them without a sigh, as the most emphatic homage I can render to a principle I believe vital to the republican system, and indispensable to the safe and salutary action of our political institutions.

The resolutions were then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, February 24.

Public Distress.

Mr. SMITH said that he had had committed to his care, with a view of their being presented to the Senate, sundry petitions and resolutions. Two of these petitions were from the town of New Haven, one signed by about 700 citizens of that place. This memorial described the sufferings and the distress under which the petitioners labored, but without going into further detail. Some delay had occurred in the reception of this petition. Finally, another meeting of the citizens was called, and took place at the City Hall, at which sundry resolutions were passed, describing the severity of the public sufferings, ascribing these sufferings to the removal of the deposits, and expressing the opinion of the meeting that the Bank of the United States ought to be rechartered. To this last petition were attached the signatures of about 900 citizens of New Haven.

Another of these petitions was from the city of Hartford, in Connecticut, and was signed by about 300 citizens of that place. He held, also, in his hand, resolutions adopted by the Hartford Bank, in which the directors of that institution ascribed the sufferings under which the community were laboring, to the removal of the public deposits; and expressed it as their grave opinion, that the Bank of the United States should be rechartered, with modifications.

From the Phoenix Bank he had received resolutions similar in their purport. The Connecticut River Bank, established in the same place, had transmitted to him resolutions of the like character. And he had received resolutions, looking to the same object, from the Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, a corporation of great business and high respectability.

TUESDAY, February 25.

New Jersey Resolutions.

Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN presented the resolutions adopted at a county meeting of the citizens of Cumberland county, in the State of New Jersey, and the memorial of the same meeting, containing eight hundred and ten signatures on the subject of the distressed condition and deranged currency of the country, which they ascribe to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration. Mr. F. spoke at large in favor of the object of the petitioners.

WEDNESDAY, February 26.

Public Distress.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he had been charged by a committee of gentlemen, deputed for that purpose, to present the memorial of sundry merchants, mechanics, laborers, and others, of the city of Baltimore, on the subject of the embarrassments of the money market, which the memorialists said had been occasioned by the course pursued by the Bank of the United States, and intended for the purpose of forcing a renewal of its charter. The memorialists, Mr. C. said, express their entire confidence in the Executive, declare that the restoration of the public deposits to the bank would be highly injurious to the country, and pray that they may not be restored. The committee, with whom he was personally acquainted, Mr. C. said, were highly respectable, and, from the character given of the signers of the memorial, he was confident they were equally so. The committee stated that the number of signers to the memorial was 8,558, and he had no doubt of the correctness of the statement. He moved that the memorial be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance. He also asked that the names appended to the memorial be printed, as it was a duplicate of one intended to be presented to the House of Representatives, but, from the press of business in that House, had not yet been done.

The motion of Mr. CHAMBERS was carried.

Pennsylvania Memorials.

Mr. McKEAN said he held a memorial signed by 1,858 inhabitants of Berks county, Pa., reiterating the daily lamentation of pecuniary distress, and remonstrating against the recent action of the Government in removing the public deposits from the United States Bank. This memorial, and the accompanying letter, Mr. M. said he was requested to lay before the Senate, by a highly respectable deputation who had visited the seat of Government for that purpose, and who instructed and especially requested him to state that the memorialists are without distinction of political parties, and, indeed, he said, it could hardly be otherwise, as, he believed, the election returns would show, that scarcely more than half the number that had signed the memorial were, at any time, opposed to General Jackson, in Berks county. He knew a number who were the fast friends of General Jackson, among which he recognized the name of his friend William Addams, who was associated with him (Mr. M.) on the Jackson electoral ticket in 1832. His (Mr. M.'s) objections to the United States Bank remained unchanged, and had never been disguised; but, it was due to truth, and to this respectable portion of his constituents, to make these statements.

He also had in charge the proceedings of a meeting of the mechanics and working men of the Northern Liberties, in the county of Philadelphia, in favor of the bank and a restoration of the deposits; and a memorial signed by fifty-one citizens of Schuylkill county, against the bank and the restoration of the deposits; all of which he desired to send to the Chair, and asked that they be each read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. CLAY said he wished to make an observation or two. He imagined that the supporters of that Executive who holds in his hands the means of affording relief to the distressed people of this country, would no longer insist upon the fact that these various memorials emanated from party feeling. They had found themselves already, in the progress of the session, greatly mistaken in point of fact as respects the distress prevailing in the community. They had been compelled to own their mistake; and he (Mr. C.) trusted that they would now see that the language which is transmitted in the various memorials to Congress, does not proceed from those only who are opposed to the administration, but that it issues from all parties—that the struggle which is now going on is not a party struggle, but one resulting from universal, deeply felt, wide-spread distress throughout the whole country. Let Senators take the case before them as an example. He had it in his power to state, for he had understood it from the gentleman who was charged with the presentation of the memorial, that in 1828, the whole amount of votes given against the Chief Magistrate by the county of Berks, were but 937, whilst he had nearly 5,000 votes; and in 1832, there were 4,544 given for him, and 1,166 against him. This memorial he (Mr. C.) understood was subscribed by 1,880 individuals, and it ought to be added that it came only from a part of the county. In five or six other townships, as he had been informed, of the same county, memorials were in circulation, but the subscriptions to them were not completed, and therefore could not be forwarded with the present one.

The motion of Mr. McKean was agreed to.

Louisville (Ky.) Memorial.

Mr. CLAY rose to present a memorial. When he left, last September, the State of which he was a Senator, he had never beheld it in a condition of higher prosperity. The earth had yielded an abundant crop; and a ready and good market existed for all the products of industry. The people were out of debt, full-handed, in good health; grateful for the numerous blessings which they enjoyed, and without the smallest presentiment of approaching calamity. This gratifying picture was now sadly reversed, and he was charged with the duty of presenting to the Senate a memorial from a large and highly respectable portion of his fellow-citizens, exhibiting the contrast, and imploring redress from Congress of their grievances. Louisville is the third, if not the second, of the three largest cities on the banks of the Ohio River, and, from its location at the rapids of that beautiful stream, is decidedly the first in commercial importance. Her two great sisters, Pittsburg, and Cincinnati, have already addressed their complaints to Congress, and Louisville now comes to unite her voice and her supplications to theirs.

He held in his hand the copy of a petition, the original of which has been confided to the charge of the member of the House of Representatives representing Louisville, to be offered to that House. This copy he now submitted to the Senate. Upwards of 1,000 signatures were attached to it, embracing individuals of both parties, almost the whole of the mercantile class, and men of every pursuit in business in that rising city. He knew personally many of the memorialists, among whom are the president and all the directors who were in Louisville, of the bank which had been selected to receive the Government deposits, and he hazarded nothing in saying that the memorialists constituted the great majority of the men of business, wealth, and respectability of Louisville. That bank, he had understood, by a unanimous vote of the board of directors, had rescinded the contract with the Secretary of the Treasury relating to the public deposits.

The existence of deep, wide-spread, and unexampled distress, is no longer disputed. It cannot be controverted. Intelligence of it is borne from every quarter, by every mail, in every form of private communication, as well as public petition and public proceedings. Those who were at first incredulous, are now forced to confess it. It stretches from the wild lands of Maine to the alluvial formations of the Mississippi. All parts of the Union feel, and are writhing under it. The Senator from Georgia (Mr. Forsyth) had denied its existence at Augusta; but at Augusta we had seen a call, from a large number of citizens, for a public meeting to take into consideration the prevailing distress. He had hoped that Kentucky would have been among the last that would suffer, although he knew it would be among the first to feel and manifest its sympathy for the sufferings of others. But the blight has reached her; and what State, what interest, sooner or later, must not feel its influence!

[Mr. Clay continued to speak at great length upon the topics of the memorial, and was followed by Mr. Tallmadge and Mr. Clayton on the same side.]

MARCH, 1834.]

Philadelphia Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

THURSDAY, February 27.

Public Distress.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he had sundry memorials to present, on the subject which had so much occupied the attention of the Senate. After describing them, Mr. W. said he should ask that they may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance. The first was from all the banks, their presidents and directors, of the town of New Bedford. They pray Congress to take immediate measures for the relief of the present distress of the country. Mr. W. said he had had this memorial in his possession for eight or ten days, but had not before had an opportunity of presenting it. The next was a memorial from the county of Warren, in the State of New York, signed by 808 persons, on the same subject. They say that the major part of them are persons who have been friendly to the present administration of the General Government. They state the distress in their section of the country to be such as has been represented in other papers of a similar character from other parts of the country. It was proper for him to state, Mr. W. said, that this petition was addressed to him, for a reason not very unnatural—the petitioners supposed his views more in accordance with theirs, on the subject of the memorial, than were those of the Senators from their State.

The third was a memorial on the same subject from 866 citizens in the county of Northampton, in the State of Pennsylvania. He had reason to believe that this memorial was most respectably as well as numerously signed; and that it embraced the most respectable portion of the population of the county. This last memorial had been sent to him for similar reasons with those which induced the New York memorialists to send to him theirs. Mr. W. thought it due to the New York Senators, as well as to those from Pennsylvania, who have had memorials of this character to present, to say, that they have presented them in the most decorous and respectful manner. He asked that the memorials be read and referred to the Committee on Finance, which was done accordingly.

MONDAY, March 3.

Delaware Memorial.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial signed by one thousand six hundred and fifty citizens of the county of Newcastle, in the State of Delaware, praying the restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, and the permanent establishment of a sound and uniform currency. After stating the contents of the memorial, Mr. C. observed, that it had been delivered to him by a delegation composed of gentlemen of the first respectability, appointed at a meeting of the citizens of that county, held at the city of Wilmington, on the 22d ultimo, and represented to be the largest assemblage at that place within the recollection of those who attended it. The memorial, said Mr. C., is signed by a majority of all the legal voters of the only county in the State which has ever expressed an opinion by a plurality of votes at any election in favor of the present Chief Magistrate of the United States. Men of all parties, of all trades and professions, of all the grades of life, whether rich or poor, farmers, manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, and laborers, have concurred in the expression of that sentiment which is now pervading all the ranks and classes of men, in other sections of the Union, that the appropriate remedy for the distresses of the country is the restoration of the public treasure to the public agent primarily appointed by Congress to receive it. [Mr. C. then proceeded at great length to expatiate upon all the topics of the memorial, and to enforce its prayer for redress.]

TUESDAY, March 4.

Philadelphia Resolutions.

The Chair communicated the proceedings of, and resolutions adopted at, a town meeting in Philadelphia, of a large number of its citizens, who describe themselves friendly to the administration, and opposed to the United States Bank, but remonstrating against the removal of the public deposits, as impolitic, unjust, and in violation of the public faith; and ascribing the pecuniary embarrassments of the country to that measure.

Mr. CLAY wished to make a few observations on the subject. These resolutions and proceedings, he said, emanated from a large meeting of the real, genuine, and practical friends of General Jackson, as would be seen on referring to them, and we have been told, said he, by the public prints, that the assemblage amounted to several thousand. He had hoped that, considering the quarter from whence the memorial came, that some friend of the administration would have got up; and he expressed his satisfaction that one memorial, at least, had come from the exclusive friends of their party. It has hitherto been said, that all the agitation on this question was a party movement, intended to operate against the administration; but he trusted that gentlemen would now acknowledge that this memorial, in addition to others, gave sufficient evidence that this was not a party question.

Here we see, said Mr. C., as the proceedings will tell us, the pure, genuine, and unadulterated friends of General Jackson, memorializing Congress on this all-absorbing question, and speaking of their grievances, with their hopes and wishes for redress; and yet we see them about to be referred, without any notice, any remark from the friends of the administration, or any answer to the cries of distress which the memorialists convey. He had listened with great pleasure to the reading of the memorial, and was pleased to find that, notwithstanding the extent of the attachment professed for the Executive, the memorialists were opposed to the measures which had produced so much embarrassment and distress. He was pleased, also, to find that the memorialists understood the inevitable consequences of the Executive measures, the establishment of another and a more capacious bank on the ruins of the present one. After such declarations as these, coming from the immediate friends and supporters of the Executive, he trusted that no Senator would rise in his place, and say that the memorials pouring in upon us daily, notwithstanding all the evidences to the contrary, were got up for political effect; and hoped they would believe that the ultimate object of them was to arrest that course of proceeding which had resulted in such ruinous consequences. The memorialists, it seemed, well understood the subject on which they appealed to the Congress of the United States. Was there a candid man in the country who would say, that, with at least five hundred State banks, with twenty-four States who have the right to establish as many banks in addition as they please, and three Territories, Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan, about to be admitted into the Union, who will have the same rights, with twenty-seven State Governments then, who will have the right to establish banks at will, when it is recollected that in the times of the old Bank of the United States there was not one bank in ten to what there is now; with all this, he said, will any candid man pretend to say, that the Government of the United States can get along without a national bank?

The memorial was referred, and ordered to be printed.

Rhode Island Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the select committee to whom was referred the credentials of the Honorable ASHER ROBBINS and ELISHA R. POTTER, on the subject of the contest between those two gentlemen for a seat in the Senate, made a report, which Mr. P. read at the Secretary's table, adverse to the claims of Mr. POTTER, and favorable to the right of Mr. ROBBINS, the sitting member, to his seat.

Mr. POINDEXTER wished to move the printing of the report and the documents. He understood that the minority of the committee wanted to submit a counter report, and he wished to give them time for that purpose, and when the report came up for consideration, he would submit his views.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was bound, in justice to himself and to the honorable Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVZ,) who, it would be recollected by the Senate, was a member of this select committee, but who had upon a late day, resigned his seat in this body, to state a few facts in relation to the proceedings of the committee. According to his recollection, the meeting of the committee to decide the important matters referred to it was held three weeks ago on Saturday last. At that meeting the views of each member of the committee were fully expressed, and it was found that himself and his honorable friend from Virginia, entertained the same opinions, and that their opinions differed with those entertained by the other three members of the committee. He, Mr. W., then understood that the report of the majority of the committee would be drawn up and submitted to the minority at a much earlier period; but he found no fault with the treatment which the minority of the committee had received from the majority. He knew, from his own experience, how little time any member of the Senate could get, from his other duties, to think and write upon subjects so important as those submitted to this select committee. The honorable chairman of the committee, as much pressed with other official duties as any other member of the body, had found it necessary to retain the papers on which the report was to be predicated until the present time, to enable him to draw up the report of the majority of the committee; and his (Mr. W.'s) knowledge of the case enabled him to say, that no person could write a report upon this subject without the possession of the papers before the committee. Such had been the course permitted to the parties by the committee, that those papers were indispensable in drawing a report taking either side of the great questions.

He, Mr. W., by the resignation of the gentleman from Virginia, was now left alone as the minority of the committee, and unexpectedly the labor of drawing up a report, expressing the opinion of the minority of the committee, was devolved upon him; as before the resignation of the honorable Senator, it was understood between them, that that able and much more competent individual should perform that labor. He, Mr. W., should have asked the Senate to elect a member of the committee to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of his honorable friend, had it not been for the fact that the case had been finally decided by the committee before that event happened; but, with his best reflection upon the subject, he had come to the conclusion that placing, at this late period of their action, a new member upon the committee, would give little aid to their deliberations, while it would impose an arduous labor upon some member of the Senate.

A question had been suggested in the committee as to the right, under the rules and practice of the Senate, of the minority of its committees to submit a report. His present object was to say, that himself and his colleague before named upon the committee, had discussed this subject, and in view of the importance of the questions involved, they had considered it to be their duty to present their views to the Senate, in case it should be considered admissible for them to do so. He was aware that he ought to have been prepared, at this time, to submit those views, but want of possession of the papers had prevented him from having made that preparation, and his expectation, entertained until one week ago on Saturday last, that the Senator from Virginia would perform the labor, furnished another reason for his want of preparation.

He would now submit to the Senate the disposition of the whole matter, declaring his disposition, according to his best ability, to discharge his duty as a member of the committee, but entertaining no feeling as to the course which the Senate should indicate. The honorable chairman had moved the printing of the report of the majority, and if the Senate should so order, and no other expression should be made, he should feel it to be his duty, as soon as he could obtain the possession of the papers from the committee, to draw up a report containing the views of the minority of the committee, so far as they came in conflict with those which had been given to the Senate by the majority. Still, if such a report would not be received by the Senate, he desired to be saved the labor of making it, and, therefore, he hoped such expression would be now made as might direct him as to his duty. For himself, he felt no anxiety whatever, but rather regretted that this responsible duty had devolved upon him; but under the circumstances, and standing alone in the minority, he felt so strongly the importance of the questions, that he should not shrink from the attempt to present his views of them, in case they would be received by the Senate, and in that event those views should be presented at the earliest day at which his other duties, and the possession of the papers, would enable him to give them.

Mr. CLAY said that the time had arrived for proceeding to the orders of the day; but he would say, that the parliamentary propriety of allowing a counter report of a committee, no doubt, was not warranted by usage, as it had been applied in this country, until within a few years past. As regarded the practice of the Senate on this subject, he did not know what it was, but he thought it a bad one to introduce. He had no objection to receiving the report of the minority, but he wished now to move the postponement of the subject till to-morrow, and proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, was aware that, until a late period, it was not the practice to present counter reports; it grew up in the House of Representatives, and this morning there were two reports made in that body on the same subject. A few years since, the question was raised in this body. A Senator from South Carolina presented a majority report on the subject of reducing the duty on imported iron; a Senator from New Jersey presented the minority report, on the permission of the Senate. The report was received, for the purpose of enabling the minority fairly and fully to express their views and opinions. He hoped the view of the gentleman from Kentucky would not be carried into effect. If the report could be sent back to the committee, so that the opinions of both the majority and minority could be presented in one view, he thought it would be the preferable course.

Mr. CHAMBERS recollected the case alluded to by the gentleman from Alabama, and if his object was to recommit this report, he thought if the gentleman examined it more closely, he would find himself mistaken in the extent to which he supposed the precedent went, as a justification of a minority report. [Mr. C. here read an extract from the Senate Journal.] Here there was no recommitment. In the progress of the proceeding, the minority presented a paper expressive of their views, which was received, and he was willing to extend the same indulgence to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was in the Chair on the occasion alluded to, and had a distinct recollection of it. It was submitted as a paper, and printed as a paper, not as a report.

Mr. KING replied, that the minority made a report, and it purported to be the report of a minority of the committee, call it by what name you please, and it was also ordered to be printed. What distinction was there in calling it a paper, when it was a report, and was called a report? Now he was anxious to know the grounds, not only on which the majority, but also the minority, founded their opinions; and when a subject of so much importance was presented as one involving the right of an individual to a seat in the Senate of the United States, it was highly desirable to have the whole subject before us, so that Senators might be enabled to examine it thoroughly. He would withdraw his motion to recommit the report, and he hoped the gentleman from New York, on the part of the minority, would present his views on the subject.

Mr. WRIGHT said it was immaterial to him what disposition was made of the question. His object was to discharge his duty as a member of the committee, to the best of his ability, and if it was not a part of his duty to draw up a counter report, he had no desire to do it, but if it was, he would cheerfully undertake it. But from the general expression of the gentleman from Alabama and others on the subject, he would endeavor to do his duty as early as he could get possession of the papers and prepare the report.

The report was ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, March 5.

Mr. PRESTON presented the credentials of BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. WILLIAM C. RIVES.

The credentials of Mr. LEIGH having been read, the oath to support the constitution of the United States was administered to him by the VICE PRESIDENT.

Essex County (N. J.) Memorials.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he had received two memorials, from a very respectable portion of his fellow-citizens, on the absorbing subject of the public deposits. The one, said he, is from three hundred citizens of the township of Orange, in the county of Essex, being a majority of the legal voters in that township, as now organized. My friend who enclosed the memorial assures me that, had it been hoped with good reason that complaints would have prevailed here, nine-tenths of the township might have been readily obtained as memorialists. The other, sir, is from the adjacent township of Bloomfield, in the same county, and consists of about three hundred names, being a clear majority of that community. So that, as far as the public voice of the people has reached us, the Senators who represent New Jersey are consoled by the reflection that it speaks to them in opposition to the tenor of their instructions from the legislature. On the whole, I will say, Mr. President, that these are no "pot-house politicians"—they are the sinew of our manufacturing and agricultural strength. No department of the country can present a greater amount of respectable intelligence and enterprise, or of private and personal worth, and purity of character.

FRIDAY, March 7.

Lancaster County (Pa.) Memorial.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial, signed by 2,500 or 3,000 of the citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, complaining of pecuniary distress, which they ascribe to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration. Mr. McK. moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER would not interfere with the memorial before the Senate, uncalled for; but he thought the subject of sufficient importance to demand some notice. He wished to observe, that, if there was any thing that could impress on the minds of those who lead the Government of this country, a conviction of the necessity of applying a prompt and effectual remedy to the evils brought on the country by Executive measures, it would be found in these frequent memorials, coming, not from one State only, but from all the States, and proceeding not from one class only, but from all the various classes of the community, from all the various trades, occupations, and conditions, of our fellow-citizens. This memorial came from the county of Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania, and was signed by from 2,500 to 3,000 of its citizens, and it was well known to all the members of the Senate, that this was one of the most populous, the most wealthy, and the most beautiful counties of the State. We also know, said Mr. W., that Lancaster is strictly an agricultural county. It did not depend for its wealth on the mineral productions of the earth, nor on manufacturing or commercial enterprise. It was a community of prosperous, thriving, and industrious farmers; and with what industry and success their avocations have been pursued, every one who had visited that beautiful valley could bear witness. This memorial came wholly from the agricultural interest. Sir, when the agricultural interest of the country comes to speak, it must be and shall be heard.

Philadelphia Mechanics' Memorial.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of the building mechanics of the city of Philadelphia; which, on Mr. W.'s motion, was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed. On the introduction of the memorial—

Mr. W. addressed the Chair at length.

I rise, sir, said Mr. W., to perform a pleasing duty. It is to lay before the Senate the proceedings of a meeting of the building mechanics of the city and county of Philadelphia, convened for the purpose of expressing their opinions on the present state of the country, on the 24th of February. This meeting consisted of three thousand persons, and was composed of carpenters, masons, brickmakers, bricklayers, painters and glaziers, lime-burners, plasterers, lumber merchants, and others, whose occupations are connected with the building of houses. I am proud, sir, that so respectable, so important, and so substantial a class of mechanics, have intrusted me with the presentment of their opinions and feelings, respecting the present distress of the country, to the Senate. I am happy if they have seen, in the course pursued by me here, a policy favorable to the protection of their interest, and the prosperity of their families. These intelligent and sensible men, these highly useful citizens, have witnessed the effect of the late measures of Government upon their own concerns; and the resolutions which I have now to present, fully express their convictions on the subject. They propose not to reason, but to testify; they speak what they do know.

MONDAY, March 10.

Massachusetts Resolutions.

Mr. SILSBEE said that he had received from the Governor of Massachusetts a copy of resolutions which had recently been adopted by the legislature of that State, in relation to the currency, and to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States.

That these resolutions (which passed one branch of that legislature with but a single dissenting vote, and the other branch by a vote of three hundred and seven to one hundred and twenty-five) expressed the sentiments of a large majority of the legislature, recently assembled at Boston from every part of the commonwealth, and who carried with them a knowledge of the present and past condition of the agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, and other great interests of that State.

Mr. S. thought these resolutions would not have been sent here if the existing pecuniary embarrassments of the country were not so oppressive as, in the judgment of those who sent them, to call loudly for the interposition of Congress to relieve them. Mr. S. said it was inconceivable to him that any one, who had either ears to hear or eyes to see, could longer entertain a doubt that there was, from some cause or other, a heavy pressure in the money markets of those sections of the country where such pressures are generally first felt, and that this pressure must and would reach the other, and all the other sections of the country, if not already there. Yet he (Mr. S.) understood that there were some, though he believed not many, who even now not only doubted, but even denied the existence of any such distress or pressure.

TUESDAY, March 11.

Burlington (Vt.) Memorial.

Mr. PRENTISS said that a memorial had been transmitted to him from Vermont, praying for a restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, which he was requested to present to the Senate. The memorial, said Mr. P., is signed by one hundred and thirty of the principal business men of Burlington, the chief commercial and trading town in the State. With a very considerable number of the memorialists I am personally acquainted, and know them to be men of intelligence and respectability, some of them holding an eminent rank in the State for their intellectual qualities and moral worth. They are men altogether incapable of sending to this body, under their own signatures, groundless representations, or complaints originating either in fiction or a spirit of hostility to the administration; and I feel every assurance that they are neither influenced by any party prepossessions, nor have in view any party purposes. Some of them have long been known as avowed active friends of the administration; and there is no reason to believe that they are moved by any other than the purest and most patriotic motives. In communicating their complaints and opinions to Congress at this critical and alarming juncture, they perform a duty which they owe to themselves, and the community in which they dwell, and they do it, sir, in the language, and I may add, with the spirit and independence, which become freemen. They trust that the inquiry here will be, not whether the popularity of a high individual, or the strength of party, is sufficient to sustain the recent public measure against which they complain, but whether the measure is right and just in itself, and consistent, in its operations, with the welfare of the country.

New Jersey Petitions.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he had been requested to present a memorial from four hundred and fifty-four of his fellow-citizens of Paterson, New Jersey. I am assured (said he) by the respectable committee who transmitted this memorial, that it is, with few exceptions, signed by all the business men of that town, and by a majority of the legal voters. The memorialists deplore the derangement of our currency, occasioned, as they believed, by the hostile attitude assumed by the administration against the Bank of the United States. To show, sir, the disastrous influence of the late rash measure of the Executive, I will make a short statistical extract from the statements of my correspondents. The number of spindles in operation, in 1832, was 43,439. Owing to the extreme pressure of the times, the proprietors of 24,580 spindles in Paterson, and 5,180 in its immediate vicinity, have been obliged to suspend their operations. The number of spindles now stopped would have required an annual supply of 2,200,000 lbs. of cotton. In view of these results, I beg leave to ask, can it be, sir, that they have been produced by a factitious panic, manufactured here? Can it be, that a mere artificial excitement has silenced the shuffle, paralyzed enterprise, and driven thousands of my fellow-citizens upon an almost hopeless search after employment? When gentlemen make these statements, I respectfully insist upon excepting my constituents from its operation. Sir, they are made of sterner material than to wait for indications here or anywhere, to regulate their judgments or prompt their feelings.

And, Mr. President, I have the consolation to know that many of those in the confidence of the Executive, think as I do, of this measure. The honorable Senator from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) of whom I may say without disparagement, that no Senator more ably sustains and vindicates the policy of the administration, informed us, some time since, that he could not have advised to the removal of the public deposits in the time and manner of the act; and, on yesterday, his honorable colleague assured us, that in a recent journey through six of our States, he ascertained that the public very generally condemned the course of the Executive, on this subject; and the latter gentleman thought that, had we been content to call it a mistake, instead of an encroachment, there would have been a decided expression of dissatisfaction by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. Now, sir, with all this amount of adverse opinion, I am instructed by the legislature of New Jersey to sustain, by "my votes and influence, the course of the Secretary of the Treasury!" When the administration shall harmonize with itself on this point; when its best friends shall conclude to approve of the course of the Secretary, then, sir, I will think of the matter more seriously. But, until then, I choose, with the independence of a freeman, to follow the lead of my own sincere and deep conviction.

WEDNESDAY, March 12.

Memorial from Petersburg.

Mr. LEIGH said he rose to present a memorial on the subject which had so long agitated, was still agitating, and would, he feared, but too long continue to distract this great and lately flourishing country; the Senate would understand, of course, that he alluded to the subject of the deposits. It was a memorial from the merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and other citizens of the town of Petersburg, in Virginia; a town always distinguished for its steady adherence to republican principles, and which, he took upon himself to say, had given as many and signal proofs of patriotism and devotion to the interests, the honor, and the happiness of the nation, as any town in the Union. Its export trade consisted chiefly in the two staples of cotton and tobacco; and the memorialists were perfectly competent to judge of the effects of public measures on their own interests and those of the country of which their town was the home market. [Mr. L. continued to speak at great length on the topics contained in the memorial.]

Removal of the Deposits.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the special order, being Mr. CLAY's resolutions, &c., on the subject of the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States.

Mr. TALLMADGE addressed the Senate as follows:

The first resolution alleges an illegal and unconstitutional exercise of power by the President of the United States. It involves matters of high import. It goes to the very structure of the Government; to the principles on which our whole political fabric is based. It involves the distribution of the powers of the Government under the constitution, and the exercise of those powers by the respective departments to which they are assigned. It becomes us, therefore, to enter upon the examination of such a subject, with all the candor and moderation which its importance demands; and not rashly undertake to unsettle or overturn principles which the wisdom of our ancestors established, and which our own experience in their practical operation has found so salutary.

The powers of the Government are divided into legislative, executive, and judicial. This was the first and fundamental proposition adopted by the convention that framed the constitution; and from this sprung the subsequent organization of the Government. This was the basis of the constitution in the distribution of its powers. It was the theory of the constitution to keep them separate and distinct. The history of other nations had shown that the union of these powers was inconsistent with free government. Other Governments have been more or less free, in proportion as these powers have been separated or united. This separation and distribution became a settled maxim with the American people, at the time of the adoption of the constitution. To this we may attribute the great freedom which we have enjoyed, beyond any other people, in ancient or modern times. Being thus separated, the object has been, and should be, to confine the exercise of each to its proper sphere. It will be my purpose to show, that the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power complained of in the resolution under consideration, acted within the limit of Executive authority, as prescribed by the constitution; that any other construction would deprive him of the power belonging to the Executive department, and thereby impair that fundamental principle which alone gives security and stability to our system.

By the constitution, "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." The President's power, then, depends on the limit assigned to the executive power. To ascertain that limit, it is necessary to inquire into its nature and object. The inconveniences which were experienced by the old Continental Congress, in respect to the powers of Government exercised by it, and the manner of its exercise, subsequently led to the adoption, by the States, of the articles of confederation. Many difficulties were obviated by these articles of perpetual union. Still, there were defects inherent in the very nature of the system of Government thus adopted. Experience soon pointed them out; and amongst them was a very prominent one, namely, "the organization of the whole powers of the General Government in a single assembly, without any separate or distinct distribution of the executive, judicial, and legislative functions." The want of a National Executive was deemed one of the most fatal defects of the confederation. All the powers of Government were vested in a single body. The execution of many of its most important powers was intrusted to a committee composed of one member from each State. This committee was authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, and under certain limitations and restrictions, could exercise the same powers that Congress itself could exercise whilst in session. In the convention that framed the constitution, so apparent was this defect, that the proposition to establish a National Executive seems to have met with universal approbation. There was, however, some diversity of opinion on the question, whether the Executive should consist of a single person, or of a plurality of persons. An examination of the nature of the Executive office soon satisfied the convention that its powers could be much more advantageously and safely exercised by one than by several. They had before them the history of other nations; many which had claimed the name of republics; and, in every instance, it was found that the division of executive power had led to the most disastrous results. Examples from Roman history were presented, of the mischief which had grown out of the discussions between the consuls and military tribunes. Unity, therefore, in the Executive department of the Government, was deemed essential to secure energy and responsibility. Without energy and responsibility, the Government, it was perceived, would not answer the purpose of its creation. The want of these qualities had been severely felt during the war of the revolution, out of which the country had but recently emerged. One of the learned authors of the Federalist summed up the argument on this subject with this emphatic language: "A feeble Executive implies a feeble execution of the Government. A feeble execution is but another phrase for a bad execution; and a Government ill executed, whatever may be its theory, must be, in practice, a bad government."

If the Secretary of the Treasury is recognized as the head of a Department, from whom the President has a constitutional right to require an opinion, then, any difference in the phraseology of laws organizing the several Departments, can have no effect to alter his executive character. To my mind this proposition is so plain, that it is with great reluctance that I presume to occupy a moment of the time of the Senate, in an examination of the alleged distinction arising from legislative construction. This reluctance is only overcome by the fact, that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) with others, has urged it with so much apparent sincerity, that it becomes my duty to show the entire fallacy of the argument attempted to be drawn from that source. To a superficial observer, there would seem, at first view, to be some ground for the distinction. But a critical examination of the action of Congress, will show that its legislation, in this respect, has been in accordance with the provision of the constitution, by which the Treasury Department was created an Executive Department, equally with those whose executive character has never been denied.

The first Congress that assembled under the new constitution in 1789, amongst its earliest proceedings, passed a resolution expressing its opinion that there ought to be established certain Executive Departments: namely, a Department of Foreign Affairs, a Department of Treasury, and a Department of War; and that the head of each Department should be removable by the President. In pursuance of this resolution, a committee reported bills for the establishment of these several Departments. The first was entitled "An act for establishing an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs." This act was afterwards, in the same year, amended, and changed to the "Department of State." The second was entitled "An act to establish an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of War." The third was entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department." From the difference in phraseology in the titles of these acts, the two former being denominated Executive Departments, and the latter not, it has been gravely contended that the Treasury Department was divested of its executive character; and that, therefore, the President could not exercise his power of removal of the head of this Department, as he could with the heads of the other Departments which were termed executive. This power of removal can be exercised over none of these Departments, except on the ground of their being executive. If, then, we look to the acts themselves establishing these Departments, and not confine ourselves to their titles, we shall find that the same power in the President to remove is recognized in all of them alike. Not a power granted by law, but the recognition by law of a power granted by the constitution. It was upon the bill to establish the Department of Foreign Affairs, that the celebrated debate arose as to the power of removal—the one side contending that the power belonged to the President, by virtue of the executive powers of the Government vested in him by the constitution, and the other maintaining that the power of removal should be exercised by the President, conjointly with the Senate. I will not detain the Senate, at this time, by the recapitulation of arguments which were so ably presented on that occasion, and which have been so often referred to on this. It is sufficient for my purpose to state, that the important question was decided by that Congress in favor of the President's power to remove the heads of all these Departments, on the ground of their being Executive Departments. And lest it might, in after times, be inferred that this power was conferred by law, instead of being granted by the constitution, the several bills were so amended as to recognize the power as derived from the constitution, and not as a power granted by law.

What then, are the relative powers and duties of the President and of the Secretary of the Treasury?

First—as to the President's powers.

We have already seen that the Executive power is vested in the President, as fully as the legislative power is vested in Congress, or the judicial power in the Judiciary. He has, by virtue of that power, the control of the Executive Departments, of which the Treasury is one. They are subject to his superintending care and general supervision. Amongst other powers, too, is that of appointment to office, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in certain cases; and, in certain other cases vested in him by law, he has the sole power of appointment. He also has the power to fill vacancies which may happen in the recess of the Senate. But the most important power which he possesses, so far as the questions involved in the present discussion are concerned, is the power of removal from office. This shows the nature of the Executive authority, and how it was intended that the Executive Departments should be under his control and supervision. This power has been already alluded to. The right of the President to remove from office was settled by the Congress of 1789, soon after the adoption of the constitution. The debates on this question throw much light on the powers of the Executive. Many of those great men and pure patriots that composed the Congress of 1789, were the same that framed the constitution, whose powers they were, thus early, called on to interpret. No man understood better the intentions of those who formed, and those who adopted, that instrument, as the great charter of their rights and liberties. In the construction which they gave to this power of removal in the Executive, they were but carrying out the principles which they had adopted in the distribution of the powers of the Government. Any other construction would have mingled and united those powers which the constitution had so carefully separated. It seemed to be held by those sages, that, as the constitution had vested all Executive power in the President, the legislature had no power to limit or modify his executive authority. This legislative enactment, although it could not confer power, was a practical commentary and construction of the constitution, not only in relation to the power of the President, but also as to the duty of the head of an Executive Department. The President is responsible to the people for the faithful execution of the laws; and how can he do his duty, in this respect, unless the officers of the Executive Departments are under his control, and subject to removal by him? If Congress should put any particular duty on the Secretary of the Treasury, which is in its nature executive, and he is to be entirely independent of the President in the discharge of it, it would be a usurpation of the executive power by the legislature. For the President has no power to see that duty faithfully performed, except by his power of removal. If the Secretary could thus be rendered independent in the one instance, he might in all, and the executive power would virtually be wrested from the President, in whom it is all vested by the constitution. His only remedy, then, is the power of removal. This was contemplated by the act establishing the Treasury Department.

It is true, there was a difference of opinion on the subject in the first Congress, when this important question was agitated. It is also true, that General Hamilton, one of the distinguished authors of the Federalist, previous to the ratification of the constitution by the several States, seemed to suppose that the power of removal was one to be exercised by the President conjointly with the Senate. Mr. Madison, his no less distinguished colleague in that great work, was of a different opinion—and it cannot be doubted, that the Congress of 1789, after the most mature deliberation, came to the correct conclusion, namely, that it was a power conferred on the President by the constitution, and one with which the legislative power could not interfere. Whatever diversity of sentiment there may have been at that day, the decision of that Congress was deemed conclusive on the subject, and the matter has been considered at rest, until the agitation of the present question. Such have been the views of learned commentators on the constitution, and, even though they might have differed from the Congress of 1789, were the subject now to be presented for the first time, still they have not had the rashness to even permit themselves to view it as an open question. I beg leave here to introduce an authority in support of my positions. It is that of Chancellor Kent—a man whose fame, in the department of civil jurisprudence, is not confined to his own State, or even to the Union—whose reputation is emphatically the property of the nation, and which the nation will proudly cherish. He says, "In the act for establishing the Treasury Department, the Secretary was contemplated as being removable from office by the President. The words of the act are: 'That whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office, the assistant shall act,' &c. This amounted to a legislative construction of the constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon, as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every officer of Government appointed by the President and Senate, whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by weighty reasons, that the subordinate officers in the Executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle, and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfil it." Another legislative construction is to be found in a concurrent resolution of Congress in 1797, in relation to the distribution of the Laws of the United States: that, amongst others, one set be delivered to the Secretary of State; to the Secretary of the Treasury; to the Secretary of War, &c.; and in the case of the death, resignation, or dismissal from the office of either of said officers, then the laws to belong to the successor, &c. This was in accordance with the principle established by the Congress of 1789, and presents the case even in stronger language—dismissal, instead of removal—the very terms used in the resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, which we are now considering. I hold, therefore, the power of removal in the President to be absolute and unconditional, and to be exercised in his discretion, and without cause assigned. In the language of another learned commentator on this subject, "in the exercise of his political powers, he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country and his own conscience. His decision in relation to these powers is subject to no control; and his discretion, when exercised, is conclusive."

It follows, then, that the President has a controlling influence over the acts of the Secretary of the Treasury in the discharge of his duties in the Executive Department, and can carry into effect his wishes by virtue of his power of removal.

What, then, are the duties of the President?

He is bound, by oath, faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States; and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. He shall also take care that the laws be faithfully executed. How can he discharge those duties, if he suffers himself to be deprived of any portion of the executive power vested in him by the constitution, or if the laws make the heads of the Executive Departments independent of him? It results, then, that though the Secretary of the Treasury has the power, at his discretion, to remove the deposits, still he can be controlled in the exercise of that power, by the superintending executive power of the President. And it is the farther duty of the President to remove the Secretary from office, if, in his judgment, he does not entertain proper views in relation to his duties, and will not carry the views and wishes of the President into effect. In the case of the late Secretary, he was removed, or dismissed, because he did not entertain proper views on the subject of the deposits; and because he was unwilling to carry into effect the views of the President, who had the right to direct him in the discharge of a discretionary duty. The bank cannot complain of the exercise of this power—for its charter was granted subject to the constitutional power of the Executive, and with full knowledge of his rights, as they were understood and settled as early as 1789.

A duty intrusted to the discretion of the Secretary is, in other words, a duty confided by law, to the discretion of the Executive Department of the Government. Whereas, a specific duty imposed, by law, on the Secretary, or even on the President himself, is to be specially performed—in the one case by the Secretary, in the other by the President: and in both, on the responsibility of the Chief Executive to see the laws faithfully executed. If the Secretary could be independent of the President in the discharge of such duty, what becomes of the responsibility which the framers of the constitution intended to secure to every department of the Government? Such a construction would defeat one of the great objects of the constitution in the distribution of its powers. Where Congress imposes on the Secretary the performance of a specific duty, it is imperative, and the responsibility, so far as the propriety of the measure is concerned, rests on Congress—and Congress is responsible to the people for such an act of legislation. Again: where it imposes on him as the head of an Executive Department, a discretionary duty, the responsibility rests on the President, who is also responsible to the people, and can be reached by them, on the recurrence of a re-election, or through their representatives, for a corrupt exercise of the executive powers of the Government. But, if the Secretary, in the performance of such a duty, is beyond the control and supervision of the President, and not subject to removal by him, there is responsibility nowhere—none on the part of Congress, for its legislation was not imperative, but discretionary. None on the part of the President, for he has no power to interfere. None on the part of the Secretary, for there is nobody to whom he is responsible, or by whom he can be called to account. In the removal of the late Secretary of the Treasury, the President only exercised his constitutional power, and assumed a responsibility imposed on him by the constitution—a responsibility which he cannot cast from him, even by giving his assent to a law which should go to curtail his powers. Suppose the charter of the Bank of the United States had said, in so many words, "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in the said bank and branches thereof. But the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time, in his discretion, order and direct them to be removed; and that, in the exercise of that discretion, the President of the United States shall in no wise interfere." Even this language would not have altered the case—could not have curtailed the powers of the President. Such a provision would have been perfectly nugatory. It would be an encroachment of the legislative upon the executive power. If the deposits were unsafe, and the Secretary, under this legislative discretion, should refuse to remove them; or if he was about to remove them to an unsafe place, cannot and ought not the President to remove him? And still such an exercise of power would not be more legitimate than the one under consideration.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that the President in the removal of the late Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of his successor, has not "assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws," and of course, not "dangerous to the liberties of the people."

If the President has assumed such a power, as is alleged in the first resolution submitted by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, the resolution ought not to pass, nor receive the sanction of the Senate, because it is a virtual impeachment of the President.

The second resolution introduced by the Sen-

[SENATE.]

Public Distress.

stor from Kentucky, alleges that the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, are unsatisfactory and insufficient.

This resolution ought not to pass, because it calls for no legislation, and leads to no result. Even admitting it to be true, what follows? There is no action. No legislation is proposed. There may be sufficient reasons, even if the Secretary has not assigned them. If so, then, so far as the action of Congress is concerned, it is perfectly immaterial whether the Secretary's reasons be sufficient or not. What was the object of that provision in the charter requiring the Secretary to report his reasons to Congress? It was, without doubt, to enable Congress to act in its legislative capacity on the subject. How can Congress thus act? Either by express enactment, or by joint or concurrent resolution. Congress can act in no other capacity. The Senate can act in no other capacity. This matter does not appertain to its executive or judicial powers. The object then was, in requiring the Secretary to report his reasons, to enable Congress to legislate—first, by directing the deposits to be restored to the Bank of the United States; or second, by ordering them to some other safe places of deposit. This resolution proposes to attain neither object, and is therefore perfectly nugatory—worse than useless. But it is urged that an expression of the Senate will have its effect on the Secretary; and, in a tone of defiance, it is said, Let him dare refuse or omit to restore the deposits after such an expression? Sir, the Secretary is made of sterner stuff than to yield his opinion of duty to menace, no matter how high the source from whence it comes, or I have altogether misapprehended his character. The step he has taken was from the most mature deliberation—from a thorough conviction that the great and paramount interests of the country required it—and that the bank, from its conduct, had forfeited all claim to the longer custody of the public deposits.

Sir, it was my intention to have gone into a full examination in relation to the rights and duties of the Government directors; but time will not permit. Suffice it to say, that the manner in which the important business of the bank is intrusted to the exchange committee—and that committee appointed by the president of the bank—and the Government directors excluded from any participation in its transactions, evinces a hardihood, a boldness, a recklessness on the part of the bank, rarely equalled, and never surpassed, in the history of a moneyed corporation. The very object of those directors, as it is to be gathered from the original project of Mr. Dallas, and from the whole tenor of the debate on the passage of the bill, has, by the practice of the bank, been defeated. And to cap the climax, these very directors, for the performance of those duties for which their offices were created, and they appointed, have received the marked condemnation of this Senate. It remains to be seen, whether the sentiments of the people can be brought to favor the recharter of an institution which has so grossly attempted to defeat one of the very ends of its incorporation.

THURSDAY, March 13.

Public Distress.

Mr. WEBSTER said he rose to present a memorial, very numerously signed by citizens of Brooklyn, in New York, and to present, also, the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of that place, in which sundry resolutions had been passed, respecting the all-absorbing question which now agitates the country. With some of those citizens he had the honor to be acquainted, and he knew them to be distinguished for knowledge, patriotism, and high character. Both the memorial and the resolutions are framed in the most judicious manner, and are well entitled to the respectful consideration of the Senate. One of the resolutions respected the question of the constitutional power of Congress to incorporate a bank, and stated the question in so few words, and placed it in what appeared to him so just a light, that he would read that resolution, in his place:

"Resolved, That though a public meeting is not an appropriate place for the discussion of constitutional questions, we still deem it proper to express the opinion, that upon questions of that kind, not less than upon those relating to private rights, an adherence to decisions deliberately made, and subsequently acted on as the law of the case, is the rule of safety, and the only rule that can give stability either to law or government. When, therefore, we know that a great proportion of the actual framers and original expounders of the constitution, found no objections either in the letter or spirit of that instrument, against the incorporation of a national bank; when the highest judicial tribunal in the country has solemnly passed upon it, and declared it to be constitutional; when, in two instances, and at distant periods, such acts have been passed by Congress, and received the sanction of successive Presidents; and when we have already lived under them, and submitted to their operation, almost forty years—we consider it too late to disregard all evidences of constitutional right, and to prostrate the public interests, upon a mere difference of opinion, however strongly formed, on the original question."

The memorial, said Mr. W., is numerously signed by substantial, intelligent, and well-known citizens, who see and feel the pressure of the times, and who have felt it their duty to join with others in giving to Congress proofs of their deep and settled conviction that the state of the country is such as to demand, imperiously, effectual and prompt relief.

The memorial and resolutions were then, on the motion of Mr. W., read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Maine Memorials.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he had been intrusted with two memorials, which he would now present to the Senate: one of them from citizens of Eastport, and the other from those of Lubec, in the State of Maine, on the all-absorbing subject which was now before the Senate and the country. That from the citizens of Eastport represented that they were largely engaged in foreign and domestic trade, which for seven years past had been prosperous beyond example; but suddenly they found their prospects and their property destroyed. Many memorialists in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, with whom they were accustomed to trade, had failed, and this, as well as other causes, essentially affected their own prosperity. All these evils they ascribed to the Executive, and they asked relief from Congress; and they especially and solemnly appealed to their wisdom and patriotism, and hoped that no party consideration would outweigh their duty to their country and their constituents. The other memorial, from Lubec, contained the names of many well known to Mr. S. They were merchants and other men of respectability. Their statement was a little stronger than that from Eastport. They said that their sufferings would not be borne; that their business was prostrated, credit at an end, and there was no prospect of a termination of these evils; they had experienced a sudden and terrible change from a state of high prosperity. They asked the restoration of the deposits, and they expressed the belief that the recharter of the United States Bank would benefit the country; that a national currency could be made uniform only by a national institution. They said that the assertion made in high places, that the distress was owing to a wilful act of the bank, was an insult to their understandings, and a mockery to their sufferings.

Mr. S. asked that the memorials might be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; and it was so ordered.

Virginia Memorial.

Mr. TYLER presented a series of resolutions adopted by the people of Accomack county, disapproving in strong terms of the course of the President in relation to the public deposits. He at the same time presented a memorial numerously signed by the citizens of Fredericksburg and Falmouth, reprobating, in strong but respectful language, the late Executive proceedings. As to the first, he would remark, that the county of Accomack was one of the largest counties in the State, and equal to any other for intelligence and patriotism—that he recognized in the names of some of those who appeared to have had the most active agency in the meeting, gentlemen with whom he had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance, and for whose high qualities, both intellectual and moral, it was not necessary for him to avouch. As to the resolutions, they spoke for themselves, and called for no commentary.

The memorialists from Fredericksburg and Falmouth constitute as intelligent and as respectable a body of men as can anywhere be found—they represent that great distress had flowed from the Executive proceedings; and indulge in anticipations of still greater to come. They remonstrate against those proceedings, as unwise, illegal, and unjust, and as involving assumptions of authority not warranted by the constitution or laws, and urge upon Congress a return of the public moneys to the depository provided by law, the Bank of the United States. And why, said Mr. T., should the deposits not be restored? Many weeks ago the Senate had been told, that the restoration of the deposits and the recharter of the bank meant one and the same thing; and that the only question before the country was "bank or no bank."

[Mr. T. continued his remarks, going fully into the consideration of all the points presented in the memorial.]

TUESDAY, March 18.

Boston Memorial.

Mr. WEBSTER said that it would be perceived by the Senate, that he had a roll before him, of no ordinary dimensions. It was a protest, respectfully addressed to both Houses of Congress, against the recent proceedings of the Executive Government in regard to the public moneys of the United States, and urgently requesting Congress, by the interposition of its own just authority, to restore the constitution and laws to that free and proper action which the public interest and prosperity demanded. This paper, sir, (Mr. W. said,) proceeded from a place not altogether obscure—not altogether unknown in the history of the United States. It came from the people of Boston, assembled in Faneuil Hall: it came from those walls in which the earliest accents of independence rang—from under that roof beneath which our young American liberty shook her wings, ere she went forth to fly over a thousand hills, and to proclaim independence to three millions of souls. It was sent by those, and the sons of those, who, in that same place, in '74, '75, and '76, heard the voices of Otis, of Warren, and of Hancock, and who gave to those distinguished speakers as much impulse as they received from them. This paper, Mr. W. said, was signed by 6,841 independent voters, tax-payers, and men of property of the city of Boston. Here were no men of straw; this paper presented the names of men of different habits and occupations, of numbers whom he had mentioned as the electors of that city; and, as far as he knew, of a greater number of persons than any excited election had ever called together before. The names were here for the inspection of the Senate; and his colleague, who was well acquainted with many of them, could vouch for their high standing and respectability. Whatever character the memorial might bear elsewhere, it here challenged investigation.

This paper had been brought here by a committee of gentlemen, of whom, as they were his neighbors and friends, he could hardly speak with delicacy; and especially as some of them were as well known to Congress as to himself, and needed no recommendation from him. Believing the law to have been violated, they came to Congress; believing that distress exists to a calamitous extent, and believing that no other power on earth can relieve it, their commission is to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States exclusively. Their protest was on such a subject that no considerations on earth could have induced them to sign such a paper, had it not been for that alarming, shocking state of things, so deeply affecting the public interests. Had not all incredulity on the subject become satisfied? Had not the whole of the population, from Maine to New Orleans, been satisfied—had not all their doubts been silenced? If there be on the vast surface of this happy country, on the sides of its fertile hills, and in the soil of its rich valleys—if there be any spot so favored, that distress has not reached it, let the inhabitants of that spot rejoice; but let them rejoice with fear and with trembling; for, so sure as the light of the sun—if he might compare what was beneficent in action with that which was deleterious—so sure as the rays of the sun would, in due time, penetrate the deepest shades of the forest, so sure was it that the distress which now affected the industry and prosperity of a great part of the country, must act everywhere and be felt everywhere.

[Mr. W. continued his remarks at much length, and was followed by Mr. Sprague on the same side.]

Rechartering Bank United States.

MR. WEBSTER said: I rise, Mr. President, pursuant to notice, to ask leave to bring in a bill to continue, for six years, the act incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States; and shall hope for that indulgence of the Senate which is usually granted on such occasions, if I accompany its introduction with some remarks on the general state of the country, as well as on the nature of the measure proposed. If leave be granted, it is my purpose to move to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance, that it may take the usual course, and come up for the consideration of the Senate in due season.

Mr. President, in the midst of ample means of national and individual happiness, we have, unexpectedly, fallen into severe distress. Our course has been suddenly arrested. The general pulse of life stands still, and the activity and industry of the country feel a pause. A vastly extended and beneficent commerce is checked; manufactures suspended, with incalculable injury to those concerned in them; and the labors of agriculture threatened with the loss of their usual reward. Our resources are, nevertheless, at the same time, abundant, and all external circumstances highly favorable and advantageous; such as fairly promised us, not only a continuance of that degree of prosperity which we have actually enjoyed, but its rapid advancement, also, to still higher stages.

The condition of the country is, indeed, singular. It is like that of a strong man chained. In full health, with strength unabated, and all its faculties unimpaired, it is yet incapable of performing its accustomed action. Fetters and manacles are on all its limbs. If we could but unbind it, if we could break these iron chains, if we could once more set it free, it would, in a moment, resume its activity, and go on again in its rapid career. It is our duty, sir, to relieve this restraint, to unshackle the industry of the people, and give play, once more, to their common action and their common energies. The evils, all the evils, which we now feel, and feel so acutely, result from political measures; and by political measures, and political measures alone, can they be redressed. They have their origin in acts of Government, and they must find their cure in other acts of Government.

Only six months ago, sir, the country presented an aspect, in regard to all its great interests, exceedingly satisfactory and gratifying. Our commerce was highly prosperous, and our manufactures, for the present, at least, flourishing. Agricultural products commanded fair prices, and the general appearance of things exhibited more than a usual degree of activity. The year elapsing between the autumn of 1833 and that of 1834, was a year of great prosperity. In the activity of commerce, it is possible enough that some degree of overtrading had taken place; but there is nothing to show that great excess had been committed in that particular. In general, the state of things was sound, as well as prosperous. The commerce of the country had reached, I think, to a greater extent than in any former year; the amount of exports for 1833 being, according to the Treasury estimate, no less than ninety millions of dollars, and that of the imports no less than one hundred and nine millions. The internal and coasting trade was in a still more flourishing condition. This branch of the national industry has grown into the very highest importance, affording a vast field for active usefulness, enriching all parts of the country by its mutual exchanges of commodities, and furnishing profitable employment to great numbers of the people. It was carried on last year, both by sea and land, with great vigor; and the situation of the currency of the country gave it facilities such as never existed elsewhere over so broad an extent. The money circulation was free, and the banks in good credit. They were doubtless somewhat too economical in the use of specie, and sustained their credit on a basis not sufficiently broad to be quite secure. But no great degree of danger to the circulation was felt, or generally feared.

Six months ago a state of things existed, highly prosperous and advantageous to the country, but liable to be injuriously affected by precisely such a cause as has now been put into operation upon it. Business was active, and carried to a great extent. Commercial credit was expanded, and the circulation of money was large. This circulation, being of paper, of course rested on credit; and this credit was founded on banking capital, and bank deposits. The public revenues, from the time of their collection to the time of their disbursement, were in the bank and its branches; and, like other deposits, contributed to the means of discount. Between the Bank of the United States and the State banks, there was a degree of watchfulness, perhaps of rivalry; but there was no enmity, no hostility. All moved in their own proper spheres, harmoniously and in order.

The Secretary disturbed this state of peace. He broke up all the harmony of the system. By suddenly withdrawing all the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, he forced that bank to an immediate correspondent curtailment of its loans and discounts. It was obliged to strengthen itself; and the State banks, taking the alarm, were obliged to strengthen themselves also, by similar measures. So that the amount of credit actually existing, and on which men were doing business, was suddenly greatly diminished. Bank accommodations were withdrawn; men could no longer fulfil their engagements by the customary means; property fell in value; thousands failed; many thousands more maintained their individual credit by enormous sacrifices; and all being alarmed for the future as well as distressed for the present, forbore from new transactions and new engagements. Finding enough to do to stand still, they do not attempt to go forward. This deprives the industrious and laboring classes of their occupations, and brings want and misery to their doors. This, sir, is a short recital of cause and effect. This is the history of the first six months of the "experiment."

It is difficult, sir, to restrain one's indignation, when, to so much keen distress, there is added so much which has the appearance of mere mockery. Sir, let the system of the administration go on, and we shall soon not know our country. We shall see a new America. On the map where these United States have stood, we shall behold a country that will be strange to us. We shall see a class of idle rich and a class of idle poor; the former a handful, the latter a host. We shall no longer behold a community of men, with spirits all active and stirring, contributing, all of them, to the public welfare, while they partake in it, pushing on their fortunes and bettering their own condition, and helping to swell, at the same time, the cup of the general prosperity to overflowing. We shall see no more of that credit which reaches out its hand to honest enterprise; of that certainty of reward which cheers on labor to the utmost stretch of its sinews; of that personal and individual independence which enables every man to say that no man is his master. Sir, I will not look on the picture. I will not imagine what spectacle shall be exhibited, when this country not only halts on her onward march, but recedes; when she tracks back in the long and rapid strides of her forward movement; when she sets herself to undo all that she has done; when she renounces the good she has attained; when she obstructs credit, destroys enterprise, arrests commerce, and smothers manufactures.

I will now, sir, state the general substance of the bill which I ask leave to introduce.

The first section proposes to continue the present bank for six years, but with this provision, viz., that so much of the present charter as gives the bank an exclusive right shall not be continued, but that Congress may make any other bank, if it see fit, to come into existence at any time after 1836.

This is the great feature of the bill. It continues the bank for a short period, and takes away the exclusive right. Congress is thus left at perfect liberty to make another bank whenever it chooses. When the present agitation shall have subsided, when a day of calm consideration comes, and the people have had time for deliberation, then Congress may make a permanent provision, satisfactory to itself and to the country. Can any thing be more reasonable than this? Can the bitterest enemy of the present bank refuse to give it time to wind up its affairs without distress to the people? Can the most ardent advocate of a new bank refuse, meantime, to allow the country to relieve itself, by the use of the present, until a new one shall be established?

Sir, I am not dealing in plausibilities only. I mean to leave the whole question between the bank and a new one, fairly open. I mean to give to neither any manner of advantage. If Congress establish a new bank, it may easily go into operation while the present is gradually retiring from operation, and the business of the country will feel no violent shock.

I mean to give the present bank no claim to a renewal; but, on the contrary, the only new power conferred on it by this bill, is a power to enable it to wind up its concerns.

As to the time, I think six years not too long. If we were now certain that a new bank would come into existence in 1836, I think it would be convenient, for all parties, that this bank should have six years to run. The new bank would hardly get into full operation under a year or two, and time is absolutely necessary to enable this bank gradually to collect its debts. A hastened collection must distress the people. With an existing debt of fifty-five millions, and pressed and solicited, on all sides, still further to extend its loans, in order to relieve the country, all must see that the affairs of the bank cannot be closed without intolerable pressure on the community, unless time be given for that purpose. But, if six years be thought too long, I will consent to five, or to four. My own opinion is, that six years is not too long.

The second section provides, that the public moneys, becoming due after the 1st of July, shall be deposited in the bank and its branches, as heretofore, subject, however, at any time after this act shall be accepted, to be removed by order of Congress. If Congress shall establish a new bank, they will of course remove the deposits into it. The effect of this provision will be to give to Congress, at all times, what rightfully belongs to them—a full control over the public purse. It separates that purse from the sword, and re-establishes the just authority of the legislature.

Then comes the section by which the bank is to pay $300,000 a year, for each of the six years, as compensation for the benefits of a continuance of its charter. This provision is adopted from the bill of 1832. For one, I should have been willing that a fixed percentage should have been paid, instead of this bonus, to be divided among the States, according to numbers; but others objected to this, and I have sought to avoid all new causes of difference.

The next section authorizes Congress to restrain the bank from issuing notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, if it shall see fit so to do, any time after March, 1836. This, too, is borrowed from the bill of 1832, and its object was fully discussed on that occasion. That object is to get rid of the circulation of all notes under five dollars, and, by so doing, to extend the specie basis of our circulation. When the States shall direct their own banks to issue no notes less than five dollars, then it is proposed that Congress shall direct the Bank of the United States to issue no notes below twenty dollars. The state of our currency will then be, as I explained the other day, that, up to five dollars, the currency will be silver and gold; above five dollars, it may be silver and gold and notes of State banks; and above twenty dollars, silver and gold and notes of State banks and notes of the Bank of the United States. This greater use of silver and gold, for common purposes, and small payments, I have thought to be a desirable object, as I have often before said.

The next section looks to the winding up of the affairs of the bank; and it provides that, at any time within the last three years of its continuance, its directors may divide, among the stockholders, any portion of the capital which they may have withdrawn from active operation. The remaining sections are only such as are formal and necessary; one continues the acts of Congress connected with the bank, such as those providing for forging its notes; and the other requires the acceptance of this bill by the bank, in order to give it validity and effect.

Such, Mr. President, are the provisions of this bill. They are few and simple:

1. The bank is to be continued for six years.
2. The deposits are to be restored after the 1st of July.
3. Congress is to be at perfect liberty to create any new bank, at any time after March, 1836.
4. The directors, in order to wind up their concerns, may, three years before the six years expire, begin to divide the capital among the stockholders.

Mr. President, this is the measure which I propose; and it is my settled belief that, if we cannot carry this, we can carry nothing.

I have thus, sir, stated my opinions, and discharged my duty. I see the country laboring, and struggling, and panting under an enormous political evil. I propose a remedy which I am sure will produce relief, if it be adopted, and which seems to me most likely to obtain support. And now, sir, I put it to every member of Congress, how he can resist this measure, unless by proposing another and a better. Who among the agents and servants of the people assembled in these Houses, is prepared, in the present distressed state of the country, to say, that he will oppose every thing, and propose nothing? For one, sir, I can only say, that I have been driven to this proposition by an irresistible impulse of obligation to the country. If I had been suddenly called to my great reckoning in another world, I should have felt that one duty was left unattempted, if I had no measure to recommend, no expedient to propose, no hope to hold out to this suffering community.

WEDNESDAY, March 19.

Public Distress.

Mr. TOMLINSON presented the memorial of the merchants, manufacturers, and other citizens of the town of Bridgeport, in Connecticut, relative to the embarrassments and distress consequent on the course of the Executive respecting the currency and banking institutions in the country.

With the memorial, Mr. T. said, he had received a communication from several respectable citizens of that town, authorizing him to state that the memorial is subscribed by 380 persons, who are entitled to vote at the town and State elections; and that there are but a few more than 400 legal voters residing in the town.

For the information of the Senate, it may not be improper, said he, to state, that, notwithstanding the fluctuations of trade heretofore, Bridgeport has steadily and rapidly advanced in wealth and improvement. At the commencement of the present century, it was comparatively but an inconsiderable village. Now, the borough of that name exceeds in population any other port in that important and populous section of the State. It not only participates largely in the trade and business of the productive and rich county of Fairfield, but extends its commercial relations into the very important and prosperous counties adjoining it.

Mr. T. moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed; which was ordered.

Philadelphia Mechanics' Memorial.

Mr. McKean said, a committee of sixteen gentlemen, mechanics of Philadelphia, consisting of cabinet-makers, pianoforte-makers, chair-makers, upholsterers, fancy furnishers, fringed-makers, carvers, gilders, varnishers, turners, lamp-makers, coach-makers, and others engaged in furnishing materials for the same, have charged me with a memorial, to be presented to the Senate, signed, as I am informed, by about seven hundred of these meritorious citizens. They state that they have been steadily pursuing their various occupations, and endeavoring to fulfil their duties as mechanics and citizens, without interfering in political affairs further than simply exercising their rights at the polls; and that, up to the period of the removal of the public deposits from the United States Bank, their various branches of business were becoming increasingly prosperous; they were thankfully enjoying the fruits of honest industry, and indulging a prospect of their continued increase. But, since the event alluded to, they have experienced an almost total prostration of their business, which, if not averted soon, must involve them and their families in utter ruin; and that they can ascribe their present distress to no other cause than the removal of the deposits, and earnestly request their immediate restoration.

New Orleans Memorial.

Mr. WAGGAMAN presented resolutions and a memorial adopted at a meeting of the merchants of New Orleans. On the presentation of which Mr. W. said:

Mr. President: I hold in my hand a document containing sundry resolutions and a memorial, adopted at one of the largest public meetings ever convened in New Orleans, on any preceding occasion, which it becomes my duty, as the co-representative of Louisiana on this floor, to communicate to the Senate. And I will also take leave to observe, though it may be disagreeable to the ears of some gentlemen, that that meeting was composed of every description of persons, without distinction as to party, Jackson men and anti-Jackson men, administration and anti-administration men, supporters and opponents of the present administration. The proceedings had at that meeting were signed by its chairman, Mr. Oakley, who has been, from the earliest period of the aspirations of the present Chief Magistrate for political power and high official station, down to the present moment, through good and through evil report, one of his most ardent, active, and zealous friends, spending more money, and consuming more time in aid of the cause, than any other man known to me in that State. Sir, I say it in no term of reproach to that gentleman, but am happy to avail myself of this public occasion to bear testimony in favor of his most excellent character, believing, as I do, that whatever he has done in partisan acts in aid of this administration, has been done with the purest and most patriotic motives. I have thought it proper to be thus minute and circumstantial, in order to show that the meeting was not devised and got up in aid of party views and party purposes, but wholly and exclusively for the intents and purposes set forth in the memorial.

These resolutions and memorial state facts that no declarations, however bold and reckless, can deny; nor arguments, however eloquent, ingenious, and artfully woven, can weaken. It states the deep and abiding distress of the people, I mean the agricultural and commercial people of Louisiana, who, notwithstanding their heretofore successful enterprise, have not, in this dark hour of pecuniary distress and want, been able to shield themselves from its ruinous consequences. Their rich and fertile lands, aided as they have been by the hands of their skilful and industrious cultivators, have in vain yielded forth their accustomed rich fruits and abundant harvests; they remain without demand, or are sold at prices far and ruinously below the reasonable and just expectations of those, by the sweat of whose brows, and the toil of whose hands, they have been produced.

THURSDAY, March 20.

Rechartering Bank United States.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate resumed the consideration of his motion for leave to introduce a bill to continue, for a limited time, the charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT said it was not his purpose to enter into a discussion of the great principles involved in the passage of the bill upon the table. His object in obtaining the floor, upon a former day, had been to reply to some things which had fallen from the honorable Senator from Virginia, (Mr. LEXEN,) and to notice a few remarks made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, (Mr. WEBSTER,) when he offered the bill. He must, he said, however, be permitted to congratulate himself that the Senate had now reached what he had, from the commencement of the session, considered the true question before Congress and the country—the question of “bank or no bank;” the question whether the present Bank of the United States should be rechartered for any period of time, or whether any national bank should be created by the authority of Congress, after the expiration of the charter of the present bank. These questions, he considered, must be involved in the present discussion, and he must be permitted farther to congratulate himself that, as to the constitutional power of Congress to pass the bill now under consideration, or any bill to charter a bank similar to that now existing, the opinions of the honorable Senator from Virginia (Mr. LEIGH) and his own perfectly coincided. The honorable Senator did not believe, nor did he himself believe, that Congress possessed any such power, and therefore, so far as their action was concerned, no such bank could exist after the year 1836, when the charter of the present bank will expire by its own limitation. Mr. W. said he would not attempt to repeat the arguments which the honorable Senator had so happily used, in his clear and strong manner, to establish the correctness of their opinions. Any attempt by him to do so might weaken what had been so well and so concisely said by the Senator; but he would detain the Senate to add one view of this subject, which had not been taken by the honorable Senator, and which had struck his mind with great force. Upon all former occasions, when the power of Congress to charter a bank had been under discussion, reference had been made to that clause of the constitution which reads in the following words:

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof."

All, Mr. W. said, as he understood, had formerly argued that this necessity must be shown before the power could be inferred, and he had also understood that all had admitted that this constitutional necessity must be a necessity growing out of the wants of the Government, and not out of the wants of business; that it must be a necessity arising from the collection, distribution, and disbursement of the public revenues, not out of the wants of the commercial interests, the mercantile interests, the manufacturing interests, or any other branch of labor and enterprise; that it must be a necessity growing out of the wants of the public Treasury and the administration of the finances of the country, and not out of the wants of the individual citizens. What, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.) have we heard urged as constituting this necessity, in the whole course of this debate, in all the various shapes and forms in which it has been carried on in this body for now about four months? The wants of ordinary business, the demand for capital, the regulation of exchanges, the importance of a uniform paper currency; not the wants of the Treasury. These last, sir, have not been mentioned in the comparison, while the former are made the indisputable evidence that a bank is necessary. Sir, said Mr. W., the wants of the Treasury, and the wants of the Treasury alone, can constitute this constitutional necessity. The wants of business cannot be the legitimate subjects of consideration for those who seek to derive the power to charter a bank from this provision of the constitution. He said he was one of those who did not believe that any power whatever was granted to Congress by this provision, much less the power to charter a bank; but he must believe that those who did infer such a power from it, would, at least, admit the necessity must be such a one as the constitution contemplated, and that the constitution could not have contemplated any other than a necessity connected with the collection, distribution, and disbursement of the revenues of the Government, not the ordinary necessities of trade and exchange. These last were the wants which gentlemen feared the State banks could not supply, though they were willing to engage to collect and distribute the public moneys upon the same terms that the United States Bank had done it. He begged the Senate to look at this view of the case before they permitted a necessity, imaginary or real, unknown to the constitution, to influence their action.

We are told, Mr. President, by the honorable Senator, said Mr. W., that we must have a national bank; and what, sir, is the reason urged, as conclusive upon us, to establish the position? It is the existence of the present pressure upon the money market of the country, said to exist, in contemplation of the winding up of the present bank. Sir, said Mr. W., this proves to me merely, not that we want a bank, but that we have a bank. Whence does the distress and pressure complained of proceed? It, no doubt, has its origin in a complication of causes, among which a general system of over-trading and the change of the revenue laws are among the most important; but I cannot doubt that by far the most powerful cause, at this time in operation, is the hostile attitude which the Bank of the United States has thought it for her interest to assume towards the State banks. We have it in evidence among the documents of Congress, upon the oath of the chief officer of the bank, Mr. Biddle himself, that that institution has the power to crush the State banks at pleasure; that they exist by its clemency alone, and not because it has not the power to shut their doors. The evidences of a disposition to exert that power, have, for the last few months, been strong and numerous. Have we not heard it predicted, Mr. President, from all sides of this chamber, that the State banks would be compelled to stop specie payments within a short period of time? Have we not seen the bank presses calling on the community to make runs upon those banks, telling the poor laborer who had a five dollar note of a State bank to call and get the specie for it before it became a valueless rag in his pocket? Can these indications have been mistaken, sir? In the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, I am happy to know that they have not either been mistaken or disregarded; and I hope I may not find myself mistaken in the belief, that the banks of that State are prepared to meet the blow intended for them. From the latest advices I have received, I am authorized to suppose that they have withdrawn from circulation and redeemed from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 of their notes, within the last sixty or seventy days. The effect of this extensive curtailment upon the merchants, and, indeed, upon all classes of the community, must be severe, but self-protection and self-preservation require the course at the hands of the banks, and they have no volition. It would be madness for them not to prepare for their defence, when they are publicly told that this immense moneyed power, with $35,000,000 of capital at command, is about to aim a deadly blow at them; when they know it has vaunted its power over them, and proved upon oath that its forbearance was the tenure by which they held their existence. The banks, then, cannot extend themselves while this all-powerful enemy stands ready to take the first advantage of their exposure, and to push it to their ruin. Sir, is there any other cause for this rapid curtailment, and this close defensive position assumed by the State banks? I know of none. There can be none. There is no peculiar demand for specie growing out of the state of trade and the condition of exchange; but, on the contrary, the reverse is to a greater extent true than it has been at any former period of our history. Specie is, at this moment, abundant in the country, and its flow is to, not from us.

I cannot, then, be mistaken when I say, that if the Bank of the United States would cease its efforts for, and its hopes of, a re-existence, and would endeavor to perform its duty to the country, by closing its affairs with as little injury as possible to any individual or public interest, the State banks would be able to extend their loans, confidence would be restored, and the pressure upon the money market would soon cease. Apprehension, a just apprehension of the hostile movements of this great institution, is the most powerful cause of the present scarcity of money. This scarcity must exist so long as this apprehension continues. How, then, is it to be allayed, would seem to be the pertinent inquiry? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts answers us by the bill upon your table. Recharter the bank; appease the monster by prolonging its existence and increasing its power! I say, No, sir; but act promptly and refuse its wish; destroy its hope of a recharter, and you destroy its inducement to be hostile to the State institutions. A different interest, the interest of its stockholders to wind up its affairs as profitably to themselves as possible, becomes its ruling object, and will direct its policy. The more prosperous the country, the more plenty the money of other institutions, the more easily and safely can this object be accomplished; and every hope of a continued existence being destroyed, that this will be the object of the bank is as certain as that its moneyed interest governs a moneyed incorporation. Mr. President, this is unquestionably the opinion of the country. Look, sir, at the files of memorials upon your table, and however widely he may differ as to their views of the bank, they all hold to you this language, "Act speedily, and finally settle the question."

But we are told, sir, that the country cannot sustain the winding up of the affairs of this bank. Is this so? What does experience teach us upon this subject? The old Bank of the United States, within four months of the close of its charter, was more extended in proportion to the amount of its capital than the present bank is at this moment, and still it is almost two years to the close of its charter. The old bank struggled as this does for a re-existence; the country was then alarmed, memorials in favor of the bank were then, as now, piled upon the tables of the members of Congress; the cries of distress rung through these halls then as distinctly as they now do; nay, more, gentlemen were then sent here from the commercial cities to be examined upon oath, before the committees of Congress, to prove the existence and the extent of the distress; business was then in a state of the utmost depression in all parts of the Union; commerce was literally suspended by the restrictive measures of the Government; trade was dull beyond any former example; property of all kinds was unusually depressed in price; and the country was on the eve of a war with the most powerful nation in the world. Still Congress was unmoved, and the old bank was not rechartered. Such is the history of that period, and, with the final action of Congress, all knowledge of the distress ceased. Who has ever heard of disasters to the business of the country proceeding from the winding up of the old bank? I, sir, can find no trace of any such consequences. I do find that, in a period of about eighteen months after the expiration of the charter, the bank disposed of its other obligations, and divided to its stockholders about eighty-eight per cent. upon their stock.

It is now admitted on all hands, that the country is rich and prosperous in an unusual degree; property of all kinds is abundant; commerce is free and extensive and flourishing, and business of every description is healthful and vigorous. If, then, we cannot, in this condition of things, sustain the closing of the affairs of this great moneyed incorporation, it is safe to assume that the country will never see the time when it can do it. Grant it longer life and deeper root, and in vain shall we try in future to shake it from us. It will dictate its own terms, and command its own existence. Indeed, Mr. President, the whole tendency of the honorable Senator's argument, seemed to me to be to prove the necessity of a perpetual bank of this description, and we have been repeatedly told, during the debate of the last three months, that this free, and rich, and prosperous country, cannot get on without a great moneyed power of this description to regulate its affairs. The bill before the Senate proposes to repeal the monopolizing provision in the existing charter, and the honorable Senator tells us that this is to be done that Congress may, within the six years over which this is to extend the life of the present bank, establish a new bank to take its place, and into which the affairs of the old may be transferred, so as to be finally closed without a shock to the country. Sir, this is not the relief I seek. My object is the entire discontinuance and eradication of this or any similar institution. We are told the distresses of the country will not permit this now. When, sir, will it ever permit it better? When will the time come that this odious institution can be finally closed with less distress than now? Never, while cupidity obeys its fixed laws.

This distress, Mr. President, did not exist when we left our homes; we heard not of it then; it commenced with the commencement of our debates here; and I doubt not it will end when our debates end, and our final action is known, whatever may be the result to which we shall arrive. It must necessarily be temporary; and it does not prove to my mind the necessity of a bank, but the mischiefs a bank may produce. I care not whether it be or be not in the power of the bank to ameliorate the evils now complained of. That it can cause them in any manner, is proof that, if the disposition exist, it can cause them at pleasure, and this very fact is the strongest evidence, to my mind, that no institution, with such a power, ought to exist in this country.

Sir, the subject of our present action involves two great principles: one of constitutional power, and one of governmental expediency. Upon neither should our action be governed solely by considerations of temporary derangement and distress in the money market. Revolutions in trade and business and pecuniary affairs will happen. They must be temporary; the country will restore itself, and money will again be plenty; but the settlement of important principles must involve consequences of an enduring character—consequences which will exert an influence for good or evil, through all time.

FRIDAY, March 31.

Public Distress.

Mr. CLAY said he had been desirous for some days past of an opportunity of presenting to the Senate a memorial, but had not been able to do it, in consequence of the intervention of other business. It was a memorial signed by upwards of three thousand persons, clerks of mercantile men, and others engaged in trade, in the city of New York. The memorial came from a class of men embracing almost every variety of situation; men, old and young, married men and single men. The majority of these men are without capital or property of any kind, other than that probity, industry, and public confidence, which obtains for them business, and the others are men of small capital. The memorial came from a class of men which, he was informed, was highly intelligent and respectable. They did not pronounce their opinion on the causes which have produced the distress and pecuniary embarrassment, of which daily and hourly such afflicting evidence is received; but they bear testimony to the existence of that distress, of which nobody doubts. They pray Congress to afford such remedy as the urgency of the case demands. The paper was not long, Mr. C. said, and he would take the liberty to read it for the information of the Senate.

[Here Mr. CLAY read the memorial.]

While up, Mr. C. said, as it was somewhat difficult, owing to the number of petitions in the hands of gentlemen, to get an opportunity to present one to the Senate, he would present another petition on the same subject, and would move that both the memorials be referred at the same time. This second memorial was from a large number of traders from as many as ten different States in the valley of the Mississippi who happened lately to be in Philadelphia where they were called in the course of their business, for the purpose of laying in their stock of goods for the season. These men were engaged in every variety of trade, were of every political party, though they give no political character to their memorial. Many of these gentlemen came from his, Mr. C.'s, own State, and with many of them he was well acquainted; and, from all the information in his possession, he was gratified to say, they were intelligent, highly respectable, and of character and standing in society. They were men whose course of business makes them well informed of the condition of affairs in the section of country they come from. They find that the state of exchange greatly embarrasses their business, and makes them exceedingly anxious for the future. The meeting was altogether promiscuous, was assembled accidentally, and the memorial was agreed on with perfect unanimity of sentiment. As it was, like the New York memorial, also a short one, Mr. C. said he would also take the liberty of reading it himself.

[Mr. CLAY then read the memorial.]

Mr. C. moved that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Finance, and be printed; which motion was carried.

New Jersey Memorials.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented five memorials: one from three of the banks of New Jersey, and the others from the counties of Monmouth, Gloucester, and Hunterdon, in the same State, complaining of the pecuniary embarrassments of the country, which they attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration, with such other measure of relief as Congress may devise. The memorialists also express the opinion that the instructions given by the legislature of New Jersey to their Senators in Congress, were not warranted by the sense of the people of that State, a vast majority of whom were opposed to them.

On the presentation of these memorials, Mr. S. spoke for nearly an hour in commenting upon their contents, showing the number and respectability of the signers, enforcing their prayer for the relief which Congress alone could give.

Maryland Memorials.

Mr. KENT said he had been requested to present to the Senate, memorials from four banks located in the western part of the State of Maryland, three of them in Frederick city, and one in Williamsport, in Washington county. Those from Frederick city were silent on the subject of the removal of the deposits, though decidedly in favor of the recharter of the Bank of the United States.

These memorials are couched in respectful language, and I beg leave to state to the Senate that the subscribers to them are gentlemen of acknowledged intelligence and of great worth and respectability of character; possessing much experience in their line of business, intimately acquainted with the interests of their surrounding country, and the feelings that pervade its population. These memorialists have been conducting for years banks of as much solidity as any in the State, located in a rich and fertile country, in the midst of a population proverbial for their skillful, unremitted industry and great frugality; and be assured, Mr. President, they would scorn to come here with any complaints, either on their own account or that of their enterprising countrymen, unless they had been made to feel the pressure that now overshadows our land, and deeply feel it too.

Mr. K. moved that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed; which was carried.

Rechartering Bank United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the first special order to be the granting leave to introduce a bill to recharter the Bank of the United States.

Mr. CALHOUN said: I rise in order to avail myself of an early opportunity to express my opinion on the measure proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and the questions immediately connected with it, on the ground that, on a subject so immediately connected with the interests of every class in the community, there should be an early declaration of their sentiments by the members of this body, so that all might know what to expect, and on what to calculate.

I shall vote for the motion of the Senator, not because I approve of the measure he proposes, but because I consider it due, in courtesy, to grant leave, unless there be strong reasons to the contrary, which is not the case in this instance; but while I am prepared to vote for his motion, and, let me add, to do ample justice to his motives for introducing the bill, I cannot approve of the measure he proposes. In every view which I have been able to take, it is objectionable. Among the objections, I place the uncertainty as to its object. It is left perfectly open to conjecture, whether a renewal of the charter is intended, or a mere continuance with the view of affording the bank time to wind up its affairs; and what increases the uncertainty is, if we compare the provisions of the proposed bill with the one or the other of these objects, it is equally unsuited to either. If a renewal of the charter be intended, six years is too short; if a continuance, too long. I, however, state this as a mere minor objection. There is another of far more decisive character; it settles nothing, it leaves every thing unfixed—it perpetuates the present struggle which so injuriously agitates the country—a struggle of bank against bank—of one set of opinions against another; and prolongs the whole, without even an intervening armistice, to the year 1842—a period that covers two Presidential terms, and, by inevitable consequence, running, for two successive Presidential elections, the politics of the country into the bank question, and the bank question into politics, with the mutual corruption which must be engendered; and, during the whole period, keeping the currency of the country, which the public interest requires should have the utmost stability, in a state of uncertainty and fluctuation.

But why should I pursue the objections to the plan proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) He himself acknowledges the measure to be defective, and that he would prefer one of a more permanent character. He has not proposed this as the best measure, but has brought it forward under a supposed necessity—under the impression that something must be done—something prompt and immediate—to relieve the existing distress which overspreads the land. I concur with him in relation to the distress—that it is deep and extensive; that it fell upon us suddenly, and in the midst of prosperity almost unexampled; that it is daily consigning hundreds to poverty and misery, blasting the hopes of the enterprising, taking employment and bread from the laborer, and working a fearful change in the relative condition of the moneyed man and the money dealer on one side, and the man of business and the man of property on the other—taking up the former rapidly to the top of the wheel, whilst it is whirling the latter, with equal rapidity, to the bottom. While I thus agree with the Senator as to the distress, I am also sensible that there are great public emergencies in which no permanent relief can be afforded, and when the wisest are obliged to resort to expedients; to palliate and to temporize in order to gain time, with a view to apply a more effectual remedy; but there are also emergencies of precisely the opposite character; when the best and most permanent is the only practical measure; and when mere expedients tend but to distract, to divide and confound, and thereby to delay or defeat all relief; and such, viewed in all its relations and bearing, I consider the present; and that the Senator from Massachusetts has not also so considered it, I attribute to the fact that, of the two questions blended in the subject under consideration, he has given an undue prominence to that which has by far the least relative importance; I mean the questions of the bank and of the currency. As a mere bank question, as viewed by the Senator, it would be a matter of but little importance whether the renewal should be for six years, or for a longer period; and a preference might very probably be given to one or the other as it might be supposed most likely to succeed; but I must say, that, in my opinion, in selecting the period of six years, he has taken that which will be much less likely to succeed than one of a reasonable and proper duration. But had he turned his view to the other and more prominent question involved; had he regarded the question as a question of currency, and that the great point was to give it uniformity, permanency, and safety; that in effecting these essential objects the bank is a mere subordinate agent, to be used or not to be used, and to be modified as to its duration and other provisions wholly in reference to the higher question of the currency, I cannot think he would ever have proposed the measure which he has brought forward, which leaves, as I have already said, every thing connected with the subject in a state of uncertainty and fluctuation.

All feel that the currency is a delicate subject, requiring to be touched with the utmost caution; but in order that it may be seen, as well as felt, why it is so delicate, why alight touches, either in depressing or elevating it, agitate and convulse the whole community, I will pause to explain the cause. If we take the aggregate property of a community, that which forms the currency, constitutes, in value, a very small proportion of the whole. What this proportion is in our country and other commercial and trading communities, is somewhat uncertain. I speak conjecturally in fixing it as one to twenty-five or thirty, though I presume that is not far from the truth; and yet this small proportion of the property of the community regulates the value of all the rest, and forms the medium of circulation by which all its exchanges are effected; bearing, in this respect, a striking similarity, considering the diversity of the subjects, to the blood in the human or animal system.

If we turn our attention to the laws which govern the circulation, we shall find one of the most important to be, that, as the circulation is decreased or increased, the rest of the property will, all other circumstances remaining the same, be decreased or increased in value exactly in the same proportion. To illustrate: If a community should have an aggregate amount of property of thirty-one millions of dollars, of which one million constitutes its currency;

if that one million be reduced one-tenth part, that is to say, one hundred thousand dollars, the value of the rest will be reduced in like manner one-tenth part, that is, three millions of dollars. And here a very important fact discloses itself, which explains why the currency should be touched with such delicacy, and why stability and uniformity are such essential qualities; I mean, that a small absolute reduction of the currency makes a great absolute reduction of the value of the entire property of the community, as we see in the case supposed; where a reduction of one hundred thousand dollars in the currency reduces the aggregate value of property three millions of dollars, a sum thirty times greater than the reduction of the currency. From this results an important consideration. If we suppose the entire currency to be in the hands of one portion of the community, and the property in the hands of the other portion, the former, by having the currency in their possession, might control the value of all the property of the community, and possess themselves of it at their pleasure. Take the case already selected, and suppose that those who hold the currency diminish it one-half by abstracting it from circulation; the effect of which would be, to reduce the circulation to five hundred thousand dollars; the value of property would also be reduced one-half, that is, fifteen millions of dollars. Let the process be reversed, and the money abstracted gradually restored to circulation, and the value of the property would again be increased to thirty millions. It must be obvious, that by alternating these processes, and purchasing at the point of the greatest depression when the circulation is the least, and selling at the point of the greatest elevation when it is the fullest, the supposed moneyed class, who could at pleasure increase or diminish the circulation, by abstracting or restoring it, might also at pleasure control the entire property of the country. Let it be ever borne in mind, that the exchangeable value of the circulating medium, compared with the property and the business of the community, remains fixed, and can never be diminished or increased by increasing or diminishing its quantity; while, on the contrary, the exchangeable value of the property compared to the currency, must increase or decrease with every addition or diminution of the latter. It results from this that there is a dangerous antagonist relation between those who hold or command the currency and the rest of the community; but, fortunately for the country, the holders of property and of the currency are so blended as not to constitute separate classes. Yet, it is worthy of remark—it deserves strongly to attract the attention of those who have charge of the public affairs—that under the operation of the banking system, and that particular distribution of property existing in the shape of credit or stocks, public and private, which so strikingly distinguishes modern society from all that preceded it, there is a strong tendency to create a separate moneyed interest, accompanied with all the dangers which must necessarily result from such separation, which deserves to be most carefully watched and resisted.

With these impressions, and entertaining a deep conviction that an unfixed, unstable, and fluctuating currency is to be ranked among the most fruitful sources of evil, whether viewed politically or in reference to the business transactions of the country, I cannot give my consent to any measure that does not place the currency on a solid foundation. If I thought this determination would delay the relief so necessary to mitigate the present calamity, it would be to me a subject of the deepest regret. I feel that sympathy, which I trust I ought, for the suffering of so many of my fellow-citizens, who see their hopes daily withered; I, however, console myself with the reflection that delay will not be the result, but, on the contrary, relief will be hastened, by the view which I take of the subject. I hold it impossible that any thing can be effected regarding the subject as a mere bank question. Viewed in that light, the opinions of this House, and of the other branch of Congress, are probably definitively made up. In the Senate, it is known that we have three parties, whose views, considering it as a bank question, appear to be irreconcilable. All hope, then, of relief, must centre in taking a more elevated view, and in considering it in its true light, as a subject of currency. Thus regarded, I shall be surprised if, on full investigation, there will not appear remarkable coincidence of opinion, even between those whose views, on a slight inspection, would seem to be contradictory. Let us then proceed to the investigation of the subject under the aspect which I have proposed.

What, then, is the currency of the United States? What its present state and condition? These are the questions which I propose now to consider, with a view of ascertaining what is the disease? what the remedy, and what the means of applying it, that may be necessary to restore our currency to a sound condition?

The legal currency of this country—that in which alone debts can be discharged according to law, are certain gold, silver, and copper coins, coined at the mint of the United States, and issued by their authority, under an express provision of the constitution. Such is the law. What now are the facts? That the currency consists almost exclusively of bank notes; gold having entirely disappeared, and silver in a great measure, expelled by banks instituted by twenty-five distinct and independent powers, and notes issued under the authority of the direction of those institutions. They are, in point of fact, the mint of the United States. They coin the actual money, (for such we must call bank notes,) and regulate its issue and consequently its value. If we inquire as to their number, the amount of their issue, and other circumstances calculated to show their actual condition, we shall find that, so rapid has been their increase, and so various their changes, that no accurate information can be had. According to the latest and best that I have been able to ascertain, they number at least four hundred and fifty, with a capital of not less than one hundred and forty-five millions of dollars, with an issue exceeding seventy millions; and the whole of this immense fabric standing upon a metallic currency of less than fifteen millions of dollars, of which the greater part is held by the Bank of the United States. If we compare the notes in circulation with the metallic currency in their vaults, we shall find the proportion about six to one; and if we compare the latter with the demands that may be made upon the banks, we shall find that the proportion is about one to eleven. If we examine the tendency of the system at this moment, we shall find that it is on the increase—rapidly on the increase. There is now pending a project of a ten million bank before the legislature of New York; but recently one of five millions was established in Kentucky; within a short period one of a large capital was established in Tennessee; besides others in agitation in several of the other States. [Here Mr. PORTER, of Louisiana, said that one of eleven millions had just been established in that State.]

This increase is not accidental. It may be laid down as a law, that where two currencies are permitted to circulate in any country, one of a cheap and the other of a dear material, the former necessarily intends to grow upon the latter, and will ultimately expel it from circulation, unless its tendency to increase be restrained by a powerful and efficient check. Experience tests the truth of this remark, as the history of the banking system clearly illustrates. The Senator from Massachusetts truly said that the Bank of England was derived from that of Amsterdam, as ours in turn are from that of England. Throughout its progress, the truth of what I have stated to be a law of the system is strongly evinced. The Bank of Amsterdam was merely a bank of deposit—a storehouse for the safe keeping of the bullion and precious metals brought into that commercial metropolis, through all the channels of its widely-extended trade. It was placed under the custody of the city authorities: and, on the deposit, a certificate was issued as evidence of the fact, which was transferable, so as to entitle the holder to demand the return. An important fact was soon disclosed; that a large portion of the deposits might be withdrawn, and that the residue would be sufficient to meet the returning certificates; or, what is the same in effect, that certificates might be issued without making a deposit. This suggested the idea of a bank of discount as well as deposit. The fact thus disclosed fell too much in with the genius of the system to be lost, and, accordingly, when transplanted to England, it suggested the idea of a bank of discount and of deposit; the very essence of which form of banking, that on which their profit depends, consists in issuing a greater amount of notes than it has of specie in its vaults. But the system is regularly progressing under the impulse of the laws that govern it, from its present form to a mere paper machine—a machine for fabricating and issuing notes, not convertible into specie. Already has it once reached this condition, both in England and the United States, and from which it has been forced back, in both, to a redemption of its notes, with great difficulty.

Such is the strong tendency of our banks to terminate their career in the paper system—in an open suspension of specie payment. Whenever that event occurs, the progress to convulsion and revolution will be rapid. The currency will become local, and each State will have a powerful interest to depreciate its currency more rapidly than its neighbor, as the means, at the same time, of exempting itself from the taxes of the Government and drawing the commerce of the country to its ports. This was strongly exemplified after the suspension of specie payments during the late war, when the depreciation made the most rapid progress, till checked by the establishment of the present Bank of the United States, and when the foreign trade of the country was as rapidly converging to the point of the greatest depreciation, with a view of exemption from duties, by paying in the debased currency of the place.

What, then, is the disease which afflicts the system; what the remedy; and what the means of applying it? These are the questions which I shall next proceed to consider. What I have already stated points out the disease. It consists in a great and growing disproportion between the metallic and paper circulation of the country, effected through the instrumentality of the banks, a disproportion daily and hourly increasing, under the impulse of most powerful causes, which are rapidly accelerating the country to that state of convulsion and revolution which I have indicated. The remedy is to arrest its future progress, and to diminish the existing disproportion—to increase the metals, and to diminish the paper—advancing till the country shall be restored to a sound, safe, and settled condition. On these two points all must be agreed. There is no man of any party, capable of reflecting, and who will take the pains to inform himself, but must agree that our currency is in a dangerous condition, and that the danger is increasing; nor is there any one who can doubt that the only safe and effectual remedy is to diminish the disproportion to which I have referred. Here the extremes unite; the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BEN-ROX,) who is the open and avowed advocate of a pure metallic currency, and the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who stands here as the able and strenuous advocate of the banking system, are on this point united, and must move from it in the same direction, though it may be the design of the one to go through, and of the other to halt after a moderate advance.

No one can be more sensible than I am of the responsibility that must be incurred in proposing measures on questions of so much magnitude, and which, in so distracted a state of the public mind, must affect, seriously, great and influential interests. But this is no time to shun responsibility. The danger is great and menacing, and delay hazardous, if not ruinous. While, however, I would not shun, I have not sought the responsibility. I have waited for others, and had any one proposed an adequate remedy, I would have remained silent. And here, said Mr. C., let me express the deep regret which I feel, that the administration, with all that weight of authority which belongs to its power and immense patronage, had not, instead of the deposit question, which has caused such agitation and distress, taken up the great subject of the currency, examined it gravely and deliberately in all its bearings, pointed out its diseased condition, designated the remedy, and proposed some safe, gradual, and effectual means of applying it. Had that course been pursued, my zealous and hearty coöperation would not have been wanting.

Whatever diversity of sentiment there may be as to the means, on one point all must be agreed: nothing effectual can be done; no check interposed to restore or arrest the progress of the system by the action of the States. The reasons already assigned, to prove that banking by one State compels all others to bank, and that the excess of banking in one, in like manner compels all others to like excess, equally demonstrate that it is impossible for the States, acting separately, to interpose any means to prevent the catastrophe which certainly awaits the system, and perhaps the Government itself, unless the great and growing danger to which I refer be timely and effectually arrested. There is no power anywhere, but in this Government—the joint agent of all the States, and through which the concert of the action of the whole can be effected—adequate to this great task. The responsibility is upon us, and upon us alone. The means, if means there be, must be applied by our hands, or not applied at all—a consideration in so great an emergency, and in the presence of such imminent danger, calculated, I would suppose, to dispose all to coöperation, and to allay every party feeling in the heart even of the least patriotic.

What means do we possess, and how can they be applied? If the entire banking system was under the immediate control of the General Government, there would be no difficulty in devising a safe and effectual remedy to restore the equilibrium so desirable between the specie and the paper which compose our currency. But the fact is otherwise. With the exception of the Bank of the United States, all the other banks owe their origin to the authority of the several States, and are under their immediate

Rechartering Bank United States.

[SENATE.]

control, which presents the great difficulty experienced in devising the proper means of effecting the remedy which all feel to be so desirable.

Among the means which have been suggested, a Senator from Virginia, not now a member of this body, (Mr. RIVZS,) proposed to apply the taxing power to suppress the circulation of small notes, with a view of diminishing the paper and increasing the specie circulation. The remedy would be simple and effective, but is liable to great objection. The taxing power is odious under any circumstances; it would be doubly so when called into exercise with an overflowing treasury; and still more so, with the necessity of organizing an expensive body of officers to collect a single tax, and that on an inconsiderable subject. But there is another, and of itself a decisive objection. It would be unconstitutional—palpably and dangerously so. All political powers, as I stated on another occasion, are trust powers, and limited in their exercise to the subject and object of the grant. The tax power was granted to raise revenue, for the sole purpose of supplying the necessary means of carrying on the operations of the Government. To pervert this power from the object thus intended by the constitution, to that of repressing the circulation of bank notes, would be to convert it from a revenue into a penal power—a power in its nature and object essentially different from that intended to be granted in the constitution; and a power which in its full extension, if once admitted, would be sufficient of itself to give an entire control to this Government over the property and the pursuits of the community, and thus concentrate and consolidate the entire power of the system in this Government.

What, then, Mr. C. inquired, what other means do we possess, of sufficient efficacy, in combination with those to which I have referred, to arrest the farther progress and correct the disordered state of the currency? This is the deeply important question, and here some division of opinion must be expected, however united we may be, as I trust we are thus far, on all other points. I intend to meet this question explicitly and directly, without reservation or concealment.

After a full survey of the whole subject, I see none—I can conjecture no means of extricating the country from its present danger, and to arrest its farther increase, but a bank—the agency of which, in some form, or under some authority, is indispensable. The country has been brought into the present diseased state of the currency by banks, and must be extricated by their agency. We must, in a word, use a bank to unbank the banks, to the extent that may be necessary to restore a safe and stable currency—just as we apply snow to a frozen limb, in order to restore vitality and circulation, or hold up a burn to the flame to extract the inflammation. All must see that it is impossible to suppress the banking system at once. It must continue for a time. Its greatest enemies and the advocates of an exclusive specie circulation, must make it a part of their system to tolerate the banks for a longer or a shorter period. To suppress them at once, would, if it were possible, work a greater revolution, a greater change in the relative condition of the various classes of the community, than would the conquest of the country by a savage enemy. What, then, must be done? I answer, a new and safe system must gradually grow up under, and replace, the old; imitating, in this respect, the beautiful process which we sometimes see, of a wounded or diseased part, in a living organic body, gradually superseded by the healing process of nature.

How is this to be effected? How is a bank to be used as the means of correcting the excess of the banking system? And what bank is to be selected as the agent to effect this salutary change? I know, said Mr. C., that a diversity of opinion will be found to exist, as to the agent to be selected, among those who agree on every other point, and who, in particular, agree on the necessity of using some bank as the means of effecting the object intended; one preferring a simple recharter of the existing bank—another, the charter of a new Bank of the United States—a third, a new bank ingrafted upon the old—and a fourth, the use of the State banks, as the agent. I wish, said Mr. C., to leave all these as open questions, to be carefully surveyed and compared with each other, calmly and dispassionately, without prejudice or party feeling; and that to be selected which, on the whole, shall appear to be best—the most safe; the most efficient; the most prompt in application, and the least liable to constitutional objection. It would, however, be wanting in candor on my part, not to declare that my impression is, that a new Bank of the United States, ingrafted upon the old, will be found, under all the circumstances of the case, to combine the greatest advantages, and to be liable to the fewest objections; but this impression is not so firmly fixed as to be inconsistent with a calm review of the whole ground, or to prevent my yielding to the conviction of reason, should the result of such review prove that any other is preferable. Among its peculiar recommendations, may be ranked the consideration, that while it would afford the means of a prompt and effectual application for mitigating and finally removing the existing distress, it would, at the same time, open to the whole community a fair opportunity of participation in the advantages of the institution, be they what they may.

When Mr. CALHOUN had concluded—

Mr. BENTON expressed his satisfaction that the Senator from South Carolina had restored the debate to the elevation that belonged to the Senate; he did not mean to descend from that elevation, not of sentiment, thought, and style, to which he had no pretension; but in the mode of conducting the debate, descending to no personal or partisan object, but keeping solely in view the great interests of the country, and the means of accomplishing those interests. Mr. B. said it was now six years since he had begun to oppose the renewal of the charter of this bank, but he had not, until the present moment, found a suitable occasion for showing the people the kind of currency which they were entitled to possess, and probably would possess, on the dissolution of the Bank of the United States. This was a view of the subject which many wished to see, and which he felt bound to give; and which he should proceed to present, with all the brevity and perspicuity of which he was master.

I. In the first place he was one of those who believed that the Government of the United States was intended to be a hard money Government; that it was the intention, and the declaration, of the Constitution of the United States, that the Federal currency should consist of gold and silver; and that there is no power in Congress to issue, or to authorize any company of individuals to issue, any species of Federal paper currency whatsoever.

Every clause in the constitution, said Mr. B., which bears upon the subject of money—every early statute of Congress which interprets the meaning of these clauses—and every historic recollection which refers to them, go hand in hand, in giving to that instrument the meaning which this proposition ascribes to it. The power granted to Congress to coin money is an authority to stamp metallic money, and is not an authority for emitting slips of paper containing promises to pay money. The authority granted to Congress to regulate the value of coin, is an authority to regulate the value of the metallic money, not of paper. The prohibition upon the States against making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender, is a moral prohibition, founded in virtue and honesty, and is just as binding upon the Federal Government as upon the State Governments; and that without a written prohibition; for the difference in the nature of the two Governments is such, that the States may do all things which they are not forbid to do, and the Federal Government can do nothing which it is not authorized by the constitution to do. The power to punish the crime of counterfeiting is limited to the current coin of the United States, and to the securities of the United States, and cannot be extended to the offence of forging paper money, but by that unjustifiable power of construction which founds an implication upon an implication, and hangs one implied power upon another. The word currency is not in the constitution, nor any word which can be made to cover a circulation of bank notes. Gold and silver is the only thing recognized for money. It is the money, and the only money, of the constitution; and every historic recollection, as well as every phrase in the constitution, and every early statute on the subject of money, confirms that idea. People were sick of paper money about the time that this constitution was formed. The Congress of the confederation, in the time of the Revolution, had issued a currency of paper money. It had run the full career of that currency. The wreck of two hundred millions of paper dollars lay upon the land. The framers of that constitution worked in the midst of that wreck. They saw the havoc which paper money had made upon the fortunes of individuals, and the morals of the public. They determined to have no more Federal paper money. They created a hard money Government; they intended the new Government to recognize nothing for money but gold and silver, and every word admitted into the constitution, upon the subject of money, defines and establishes that sacred intention.

Legislative enactment, continued Mr. B., came quickly to the aid of constitutional intention and historic recollection. The fifth statute passed at the first session of the first Congress that ever sat under the present constitution, was full and explicit on this head. It defined the kind of money which the Federal Treasury should receive. The enactments of the statute are remarkable for their brevity and comprehension, as well as for their clear interpretation of the constitution, and deserve to be repeated and remembered. They are: That the fees and duties payable to the Federal Government shall be received in gold and silver coin only; the gold coins of France, Spain, Portugal, and England, and all other gold coins of equal fineness, at 89 cents for every pennyweight; the Mexican dollar at 100 cents; the crown of France at 111 cents; and all other silver coins of equal fineness, at 111 cents per ounce. This statute was passed the 30th day of July, 1789—just one month after Congress had commenced the work of legislation. It shows the sense of the Congress composed of the men, in great part, who had framed the constitution, and who, by using the word only, clearly expressed their intention that gold and silver alone was to constitute the currency of the new Government.

In support of this construction of the constitution, Mr. B. referred to the phrase so often used by our most aged and eminent statesmen, that this was intended to be a hard money Government. Yes, said Mr. B., the framers of the constitution were hard money men; but the chief expounder and executor of that constitution was not a hard money man, but a paper system man! a man devoted to the paper system of England, with all the firmness of conviction, and all the fervor of enthusiasm. God forbid, said Mr. B., that I should do injustice to General Hamilton—that I should say, or insinuate, aught to derogate from the just fame of that great man! He has many titles to the gratitude and admiration of his countrymen, and the heart could not be American which could dishonor or disparage his memory. But his ideas of Government did not receive the sanction of general approbation, and of all his political tenets, his attachment to the paper system was most strongly opposed at the time, and has produced the most lasting and deplorable results upon the country. In the year 1791, this great man, then Secretary of the Treasury, brought forward his celebrated plan for the support of public credit—that plan which unfolded the entire scheme of the paper system, and immediately developed the great political line between the federalists and the republicans. The establishment of a national bank was the leading and predominant feature of that plan; and the original report of the Secretary, in favor of establishing the bank, contained this fatal and deplorable recommendation:

"The bills and notes of the bank, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, in gold and silver coin, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States."

This fatal recommendation became a clause in the charter of the bank. It was transferred from the report of the Secretary to the pages of the statute book; and from that moment the moneyed character of the Federal Government stood changed and reversed. Federal bank notes took the place of hard money; and the whole edifice of the new Government slid, at once, from the solid rock of gold and silver money, on which its framers had placed it, into the troubled and tempestuous ocean of a paper currency.

Mr. B. said it was no answer to this most serious charge of having changed the moneyed character of the Federal Government, and of the whole union, to say that the notes of the Bank of the United States are not made a legal tender between man and man. There was no necessity, he said, for a statute law to that effect; it was sufficient that they were made a legal tender to the Federal Government; the law of necessity, far superior to that of the statute book, would do the rest. A law of tender was not necessary; a forced incidental tender, resulted as an inevitable consequence from the credit and circulation which the Federal Government gave them. Whatever was received at the custom houses, at the land offices, at the post offices, at the marshals' and district attorneys' offices, and in all the various dues to the Federal Government, must be received and will be received by the people. It becomes the actual and practical currency of the land. People must take it, or get nothing; and thus the Federal Government, establishing a paper currency for itself, establishes it also for the States and for the people, and everybody must use it from necessity, whether compelled by law or not.

II. In the next place, Mr. B. believed that the quantity of specie derivable from foreign commerce, added to the quantity of gold derivable from our own mines, were fully sufficient, if not expelled from the country by unwise laws, to furnish the people with an abundant circulation of gold and silver coin, for their common currency, without having recourse to a circulation of small bank notes.

The truth of these propositions, Mr. B. held to be susceptible of complete and ready proof. He spoke first of the domestic supply of native gold, and said that no mines had ever developed more rapidly than these had done, or promised more abundantly than they now do. In the year 1824 they were a spot in the State of North Carolina; they are now a region spreading into six States. In the year 1824 the product was $5,000; in the last year the product, in coined gold, was $868,000; in uncoined, as much more; and the product of the present year, computed at two millions, with every prospect of continued and permanent increase. The probability was that these mines alone, in the lapse of a few years, would furnish an abundant supply of gold to establish a plentiful circulation of that metal, if not expelled from the country by unwise laws. But the great source of supply, both for gold and silver, Mr. B. said, was in our foreign commerce. It was this foreign commerce which filled the States with hard money immediately after the close of the revolutionary war, when the domestic mines were unknown; and it is this same foreign commerce which, even now, when Federal laws discourage the importation of foreign coins and compel their exportation, is bringing in an annual supply of seven or eight millions. With an amendment of the laws which now discourage the importation of foreign coins, and compel their exportation, there could be no delay in the rapid accumulation of a sufficient stock of the precious metals to supply the largest circulation which the common business of the country could require.

Mr. B. believed the product of foreign mines, and the quantity of gold and silver now in existence, to be much greater than was commonly supposed; and as a statement of its amount would establish his proposition in favor of an adequate supply of these metals for the common currency of the country, he would state that amount, as he found it calculated in approved works of political economy. He looked to the three great sources of supply: 1. Mexico and South America; 2. Europe and Northern Asia; 3. The coast of Africa. Taking the discovery of the New World as the starting point from which the calculation would commence, and the product was:

1. Mexico and South America, $6,458,000,000
2. Europe and Northern Asia, - 628,000,000
3. The coast of Africa, - 150,000,000

—making a total product of seven thousand two hundred and thirty-six millions, in the short space of three centuries and a half. To this is to be added the quantity existing at the time the New World was discovered, and which was computed at $2,800,000,000. Upon all these data the political economists, Mr. B. said, after deducting $2,000,000,000 for waste and consumption, still computed the actual stock of gold and silver in Europe, Asia, and America, in 1832, at about seven thousand millions of dollars, and that quantity constantly and rapidly increasing.

Mr. B. had no doubt but that the quantity of gold and silver in Europe, Asia, and America, was sufficient to carry on the whole business of the world. He said that States and empires—far greater in wealth and population than any now existing—far superior in public and private magnificence—had carried on all the business of private life, and all the affairs of national government, upon gold and silver alone; and that before the mines of Mexico and Peru were known, or dreamed of. He alluded to the great nations of antiquity—to the Assyrian and Persian empires; to Egypt, Carthage, Rome; to the Grecian republics; the kingdoms of Asia Minor; and to the empire, transcending all these put together—the Saracenic empire of the Caliphs, which, taking for its centre the eastern limit of the Roman world, extended its dominion as far west as Rome had conquered, and farther east than Alexander had marched. These great nations, whose armies crushed empires at a blow, whose monumental edifices still attest their grandeur, had no idea of bank credits and paper money. They used gold and silver alone. Such degenerate phrases as sound currency, paper medium, circulating media, never once sounded in their heroic ears. But why go back, exclaimed Mr. B., to the nations of antiquity? Why quit our own day? Why look beyond the boundaries of Europe? We have seen an empire in our own day, of almost fabulous grandeur and magnificence, carrying on all its vast undertakings upon a currency of gold and silver, without deigning to recognize paper for money. I speak, said Mr. B., of France—great and imperial France—and have my eye upon that first year of the consulate, when a young and victorious general, just transferred from the camp to a council, announced to his astonished ministers that specie payments should commence in France by a given day! In that France which, for so many years, had seen nothing but a miserable currency of depreciated mandates and assignats! The annunciation was heard with the inward contempt and open distrust which the whole tribe of hack politicians everywhere feel for the statesmanship of military men. It was followed by the success which it belongs to genius to inspire and to command. Specie payments commenced in France on the day named; and a hard money currency has been the sole currency of France from that day to this.

Mr. B. here cited a passage from a letter of Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Ingham, then Secretary of the Treasury, (Dec. 1829,) to confirm what he said of the French currency.

THE PASSAGE.

"For the last twenty-five years the coinage of France has been far greater than that of any other country. I hardly need to observe that this is due to the almost total expulsion of paper as currency. The Bank of France alone issues paper, and none of a denomination less than 500 francs; so that it is used almost exclusively for commercial transactions and remittances, and makes no part of the currency, properly so called, of the country. Paper, as all know, necessarily drives away the precious metals, which will naturally flow to the places where paper is not used. They (the precious metals) are a dearer, but the only safe circulating medium; and no country that will resort to other means, can expect to have a sound and uniform currency."

Such, said Mr. B., is the currency of France; a country whose taxes exceed a thousand millions of francs—whose public and private expenditures require a circulation of three hundred and fifty millions of dollars—and which possesses that circulation, every dollar of it, in gold and silver. After this example, can any one doubt the capacity of the United States to supply itself with specie? Reason and history forbid the doubt. Reason informs us that hard money flows into the vacuum the instant that small bank notes are driven out. France recovered a specie circulation within a year after the consular government refused to recognize paper for money. England recovered a gold circulation of about one hundred millions of dollars within four years after the one and two pound notes were suppressed. Our own country filled up with Spanish milled dollars, French crowns, doubloons, half joes, and guineas, as by magic, at the conclusion of the revolutionary war, and the suppression of the continental bills. The business of the United States would not require above sixty or seventy millions of gold and silver for the common currency of the people, and the basis of large bank notes and bills of exchange. Of that sum more than one-third is now in the country, but not in circulation. The Bank of the United States holds above ten millions. At the expiration of her charter, in 1836, that sum will be paid out in redemption of its notes—will go into the hands of the people—and, of itself, will nearly double the quantity of silver now in circulation. Our native mines will be yielding, annually, some millions of gold; foreign commerce will be pouring in her accustomed, copious supply; the correction of the erroneous value of gold, the liberal admission of foreign coins, and the suppression of small notes, will invite and retain an adequate metallic currency. The present moment is peculiarly favorable for these measures. Foreign exchanges are now in our favor; silver is coming here, although not current by our laws; both gold and silver would flow in and that immediately, to an immense amount, if raised to their proper value, and put on a proper footing, by our laws. Three days' legislation on these subjects would turn copious supplies of gold and silver into the country, diffuse them through every neighborhood, and astonish gentlemen when they get home at midsummer, at finding hard money where they had left paper. Mr. B. was against a small paper currency, not against large bank notes, and expressed a concurrence in much that was said on paper money by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) though differing so much on the subject of the national bank.

III. In the third place, Mr. B. undertook to affirm, as a proposition free from dispute or contestation, that the value now set upon gold by the laws of the United States, was unjust and erroneous; that these laws had expelled gold from circulation; and that it was the bounden duty of Congress to restore that coin to circulation, by restoring it to its just value. In this he had the pleasure to concur heartily with the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.)

That gold was undervalued by the laws of the United States, and expelled from circulation, was a fact, Mr. B. said, which everybody knew; but there was something else which everybody did not know; which few, in reality, had an opportunity of knowing, but which was necessary to be known, to enable the friends of gold to go to work at the right place to effect the recovery of that precious metal which their fathers once possessed—which the subjects of European kings now possess—which the citizens of the young republics to the South all possess—which even the free negroes of San Domingo possess—but which the yeomanry of this America have been deprived of for more than twenty years, and will be deprived of forever, unless they discover the cause of the evil, and apply the remedy to its root.

I have already shown, said Mr. B., that the plan for the support of public credit which General Hamilton brought forward in 1791, was a plan for the establishment of the paper system in our America. We had at that time a gold currency which was circulating freely and fully all over the country. Gold is the antagonist of paper, and, with fair play, will keep a paper currency within just and proper limits. It will keep down the small notes; for no man will carry a five, a ten, or a twenty dollar note in his pocket, when he can get guineas, eagles, half eagles, doubloons, and half joes, to carry in their place. The notes of the new Bank of the United States, which bank formed the leading feature in the plan for the support of public credit, had already derived one undue advantage over gold in being put on a level with it in point of legal tender to the Federal Government, and universal receivability in all payments to that Government: they were now to derive another, and a still greater undue advantage over gold, in the law for the establishment of the national mint; an institution which also formed a feature of the plan for the support of public credit. It is to that plan that we trace the origin of the erroneous valuation of gold, which has banished that metal from the country. Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in his proposition for the establishment of a mint, recommended that the relative value of gold to silver should be fixed at fifteen for one; and that recommendation became the law of the land, and has remained so ever since. At the same time, the relative value of these metals in Spain and Portugal, and throughout their vast dominions in the new world, whence our principal supplies of gold were derived, was at the rate of sixteen for one; thus making our standard six per cent. below the standard of the countries which chiefly produced gold. It was also below the English standard, and the French standard, and below the standard which prevailed in these States before the adoption of the constitution, and which was actually prevailing in the States at the time that this new proportion of fifteen to one was established.

Mr. B. was ready to admit that there was some nicety requisite in adjusting the relative value of two different kinds of money—gold and silver for example—so as to preserve an exact equipoise between them, and to prevent either from expelling the other. There was some nicety, but no insuperable or even extraordinary difficulty, in making the adjustment. The nicety of the question was aggravated in the year '92, by the difficulty of obtaining exact knowledge of the relative value of these metals, at that time, in France and England; and Mr. Gallatin has since shown that the information which was then relied upon was clearly erroneous. The consequence of any mistake in fixing our standard, was also well known in the year '92. Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in his proposition for the establishment of a mint, expressly declared that the consequence of a mistake in the relative value of the two metals, would be the expulsion of the one that was undervalued. Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, in his contemporaneous report upon foreign coins, declared the same thing. Mr. Robert Morris, financier to the revolutionary Government, in his proposal to establish a mint, in 1782, was equally explicit to the same effect. The delicacy of the question and the consequence of a mistake, were then fully understood forty years ago, when the relative value of gold and silver was fixed at fifteen to one. But, at that time, it unfortunately happened that the paper system, then omnipotent in England, was making its transit to our America; and every thing that would go to establish that system—every thing that would go to sustain the new-born Bank of the United States—that eldest daughter and spem gregis of the paper system in America—fell in with the prevailing current, and became incorporated in the federal legislation of the day. Gold, it was well known, was the antagonist of paper; from its intrinsic value, the natural predilection of all mankind for it, its small bulk, and the facility of carrying it about, it would be preferred to paper, either for travelling or keeping in the house; and thus would limit and circumscribe the general circulation of bank notes, and prevent all plea of necessity for issuing smaller notes. Silver, on the contrary, from its inconvenience of transportation, would favor the circulation of bank notes. Hence the birth of the doctrine, that if a mistake was to be committed, it should be on the side of silver! Mr. Secretary Hamilton declares the existence of this feeling when, in his report upon the establishment of a mint, he says: "It is sometimes observed, that silver ought to be encouraged, rather than gold, as being more conducive to the extension of bank circulation, from the greater difficulty and inconvenience which its greater bulk, compared with its value, occasions in the transportation of it." This passage in the Secretary's report proves the existence of the feeling in favor of silver against gold, and the cause of that feeling. Quotations might be made from the speeches of others to show that they acted upon that feeling; but it is due to Gen. Hamilton to say that he disclaimed such a motive for himself, and expressed a desire to retain both metals in circulation, and even to have a gold dollar.

The proportion of 15 to 1 was established. The 11th section of the act of April, 1792, enacted that every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver, should be equal in value, in all payments, with one pound of pure gold; and so in proportion for less quantities of the respective metals.* This act was the death warrant to the gold currency. The diminished circulation of that coin soon began to be observable, but it was not immediately extinguished. Several circumstances delayed, but could not prevent that catastrophe. 1. The Bank of the United States then issued no note of less denomination than ten dollars, and but few of them. 2. There were but three other banks in the United States, and they issued but few small notes; so that a small note currency did not come directly into conflict with gold. 3. The trade to the lower Mississippi continued to bring up from Natchez and New Orleans, for many years, a large supply of doubloons, and long supplied a gold currency to the new States in the West. Thus, the absence of a small note currency, and the constant arrivals of doubloons from the lower Mississippi, deferred the fate of the gold currency; and it was not until the lapse of near twenty years after the adoption of the erroneous standard of 1792, that the circulation of that metal, both foreign and domestic, became completely and totally extinguished in the United States. The extinction is now complete, and must remain so until the laws are altered.

In making this annunciation, and in thus standing forward to expose the error, and to demand the reform of the gold currency, he (Mr. B.) was not setting up for the honors of a first discoverer, or first inventor. Far from it. He was treading in the steps of other, and abler men, who had gone before him. Four Secretaries of the Treasury, Gallatin, Dallas, Crawford, Ingham, had, each in their day, pointed out the error in the gold standard, and recommended its correction. Repeated reports of committees, in both Houses of Congress, had done the same thing. Of these reports he would name those of the late Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina; of Mr. Sanford, late a Senator from New York; of Mr. Campbell P. White, now a Representative from the city of New York. Mr. B. took pleasure in recalling and presenting to public notice, the names of the eminent men who had gone before him in the exploration of this path. It was due to them, now that the good cause seemed to be in the road to success, to yield to them all the honors of first explorers; it was due to the cause also, in this hour of final trial, to give it the high sanction of their names and labors.

Mr. B. would arrest for an instant the current of his remarks, to fix the attention of the Senate upon a reflection which must suggest itself to the minds of all considerate persons. He would ask how it could happen that so many men, and such men as he had named, laboring for so many years, in a cause so just, for an object so beneficial, upon a state of facts so undeniable, could so long and so uniformly fail of success? How could this happen? Sir, exclaimed Mr. B., it happened because the policy of the Bank of the United States required it to happen! The same policy which required gold to be undervalued in 1792, when the first bank was chartered, has required it to be undervalued ever since, now that a second bank has been established; and the same strength which enabled these banks to keep themselves up, also enabled them to keep gold down. This is the answer to the question, and this the secret of the failure of all these eminent men in their laudable efforts to raise gold again to the dignity of money. This is the secret of their failure, and this secret being now known, the road which leads to the reformation of the gold currency lies uncovered and revealed before us; it is the road which leads to the overthrow of the Bank of the United States—to the sepulchre of that institution; for, while that bank lives, or has the hope of life, gold cannot be restored to life. Here then lies the question of the reform of the gold currency. If the bank is defeated, that currency is reformed; if the bank is victorious, gold remains degraded, to continue an article of merchandise in the hands of the bank, and to be expelled from circulation to make room for its five, its ten, and its twenty dollar notes. Let the people then, who are in favor of restoring gold to circulation, go to work in the right place, and put down the power that first put down gold, and which will never suffer that coin to rise while it has power to prevent it.

Mr. B. did not think it necessary to descant and expatiate upon the merits and advantages of a gold currency. These advantages had been too well known, from the earliest ages of the world, to be a subject of discussion in the nineteenth century; but, as it was the policy of the paper system to disparage that metal, and as that system, in its forty years' reign over the American people, had nearly destroyed a knowledge of that currency, he would briefly enumerate its leading and prominent advantages. 1. It had an intrinsic value, which gave it currency all over the world, to the full amount of that value, without regard to laws or circumstances. 2. It had a uniformity of value, which made it the safest standard of the value of property which the wisdom of man had ever yet discovered. 3. Its portability; which made it easy for the traveller to carry it about with him. 4. Its indestructibility; which made it the safest money that people could keep in their houses. 5. Its inherent purity; which made it the hardest money to be counterfeited, and the easiest to be detected, and, therefore, the safest money for the people to handle. 6. Its superiority over all other money; which gave to its possessor the choice and command of all other money. 7. Its power over exchanges; gold being the currency which contributes most to the equalization of exchange, and keeping down the rate of exchange to the lowest and most uniform point. 8. Its power over the paper money; gold being the natural enemy of that system, and, with fair play, able to hold it in check. 9. It is a constitutional currency; and the people have a right to demand it, for their currency, as long as the present constitution is permitted to exist.

* "The present rate was the result of information clearly incorrect, respecting the then value of gold and silver in Europe, which was represented as being at the rate of less than 15 to 1, when it was in fact from 15.5 to 15.6: 1. It would be better, at all events, to discontinue altogether the coining of gold than to continue the present system. The average premium on the American gold coins, for the last four and a half years, has been about 5 1-4 on the nominal value."—Mr. Gallatin's letter to Mr. Ingham December, 31 1829.

Mr. B. said that the false valuation put upon gold had rendered the mint of the United States, so far as the gold coinage is concerned, a most ridiculous and absurd institution. It has coined, and that at a large expense to the United States, 2,262,717 pieces of gold, worth $11,852,890; and where are these pieces now? Not one of them to be seen! all sold and exported! and so regular is this operation that the director of the mint, in his latest report to Congress, says that the new coined gold frequently remains in the mint, uncalled for, though ready for delivery, until the day arrives for a packet to sail to Europe. He calculates that two millions of native gold will be coined annually hereafter; the whole of which, without a reform of the gold standard, will be conducted, like exiles, from the national mint to the seashore, and transported to foreign regions, to be sold for the benefit of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. B. said this was not the time to discuss the relative value of gold and silver, nor to urge the particular proportion which ought to be established between them. That would be the proper work of a committee. At present it might be sufficient, and not irrelevant, to say that this question was one of commerce—that it was purely and simply a mercantile problem—as much so as an acquisition of any ordinary merchandise from foreign countries could be. Gold goes where it finds its value, and that value is what the laws of great nations give it.

In Mexico and South America—the countries which produce gold, and from which the United States must derive their chief supply—the value of gold is 16 to 1 over silver; in the island of Cuba it is 17 to 1; in Spain and Portugal it is 16 to 1; in the West Indies, generally, it is the same. It is not to be supposed that gold will come from these countries to the United States if the importer is to lose one dollar in every sixteen that he brings; or that our own gold will remain with us, when an exporter can gain a dollar upon every fifteen that he carries out. Such results would be contrary to the laws of trade; and therefore we must place the same value upon gold that other nations do, if we wish to gain any part of theirs, or to regain any part of our own. Mr. B. said that the case of England and France was no exception to this rule. They rated gold at something less than 16 for 1, and still retained gold in circulation, but it was retained by force of peculiar laws and advantages which do not prevail in the United States. In England the circulation of gold was aided and protected by four subsidiary laws, neither of which exists here: one which prevented silver from being a tender for more than forty shillings; another which required the Bank of England to pay all its notes in gold; a third which suppressed the small note circulation; a fourth which alloyed their silver nine per cent. below the relative value of gold. In France the relative proportion of the two metals was also below what it was in Spain, Portugal, Mexico, and South America, and still a plentiful supply of gold remained in circulation; but this result was aided by two peculiar causes; first, the total absence of a paper currency; secondly, the proximity of Spain, and the inferiority of Spanish manufactures, which gave to France a ready and a near market for the sale of her fine fabrics, which were paid for in the gold of the New World. In the United States gold would have none of these subsidiary helps; on the contrary, it would have to contend with a paper currency, and would have to be obtained, the product of our own mines excepted, from Mexico and South America, where it is rated as sixteen to one for silver. All these circumstances, and many others, would have to be taken into consideration in fixing a standard for the United States. Mr. B. repeated that there was nicety, but no difficulty, in adjusting the relative value of gold and silver so as to retain both in circulation. Several nations of antiquity had done it; some modern nations also. The English have both in circulation at this time. The French have both, and have had for thirty years. The States of this Union also had both in the time of the confederation, and retained them until this Federal Government was established, and the paper system adopted. Congress should not admit that it cannot do for the citizens of the United States, what so many monarchies have done for their subjects. Gentlemen, especially, who deery military chieftains, should not con-less that they themselves cannot do for America, what a military chieftain did for France. Above all, those who are now engaged in decrying the State Governments, and representing them as unfit to be trusted with their currency without a master, should not come out with a practical confession that this boasted Federal Government cannot perform for the Union what the State Governments, each for itself, performed for its citizens, for the whole period which elapsed from the close of the Revolution to the establishment of this Government.

SATURDAY, March 22.

Public Distress.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he had been requested to present to the Senate the proceedings of a meeting held at Chambersburg, in the county of Franklin and State of Pennsylvania, attended by very many citizens of that county; and also a memorial respectfully addressed to both Houses of Congress, signed by more than 1,800 of the inhabitants and electors, expressing their opinions, hopes, and fears, in regard to the present condition of public affairs. The presentation of this paper to Congress was attended by the presence of a large committee, composed of persons of the first respectability, who, notwithstanding what they have seen of the numerous applications to Congress—notwithstanding the abundant evidence which has been furnished of the distress pervading all parts of the country, and the necessity of some governmental interference to alleviate that distress, yet had felt it their duty to accompany their memorial to the seat of Government, and to assist in producing a conviction on the two Houses of Congress, that some legislative measures were necessary.

The county of Franklin was one of the most respectable and wealthy in the great State of Pennsylvania. It was situated in a rich limestone valley, and, in its main character, was agricultural. He had the pleasure, last year, to pass through it, and see it for the first time, when its rich fields of wheat and rye were ripening, and, certainly, he little thought then, that he should, at this time, have to present to the Senate such undeniable proofs of their actual, severe, and pressing distress. These memorialists, for themselves, were sick, sick enough of the Executive experiment. They thought the interests of themselves and the country generally were too important to be made the subject of a rash experiment. They did not come to seek a boon from the Executive—they sought no extraordinary degree of attention from Congress. They only ask that the laws be administered according to their spirit. They ask that the laws might take their course, and secure their social and political rights. They desired that the war going on between the President and the bank may cease. They feel themselves unsafe while this state of hostility continues. They desire to see Congress interpose to check the usurpations of Executive power, which, in the language of a British statesman, has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. Mr. W. said he would only add his solemn conviction of the truth of what the memorialists said, and moved that the memorial and proceedings be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed. The motion was agreed to.

Rhode Island Memorials.

Mr. ROBBINS presented two memorials on the subject of the general distress and pecuniary embarrassments of the country; one from the town of Newport, Rhode Island, and the other from the inhabitants of the towns of Smithfield and Cumberland, in the same State.

In offering these memorials, Mr. R. addressed the Senate earnestly in support of their objects, concurring with them in their representation that the removal of the deposits had brought upon their business the great depression of which they complained, and that nothing but their restoration could restore prosperity.

Both memorials were then referred to the Committee on Finance.

MONDAY, March 24.

Lynn (Mass.) Memorial.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial signed by nine hundred of the inhabitants of the town of Lynn, in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration, with such other measures as Congress may deem expedient.

Those members of the Senate, said Mr. W., who have travelled from Boston to Salem, or to Nahant, will remember the town of Lynn. It is a beautiful town, situated upon the sea, is highly industrious, and has been hitherto prosperous and flourishing. With a population of eight thousand souls, its great business is the manufacture of shoes. Three thousand persons, men, women, and children, are engaged in this manufacture. They make and sell, ordinarily, two millions of pairs of shoes a year, for which, at 75 cents a pair, they receive one million five hundred thousand dollars. They consume half a million of dollars' worth of leather, of which they buy a large portion in Philadelphia and Baltimore, and the rest in their own neighborhood. The articles manufactured by them are sent to all parts of the country, finding their way into every principal port, from Eastport round to St. Louis. Now, sir, when I was last among the people of this handsome town, all was prosperity and happiness. Their business was not extravagantly profitable; they were not growing rich over fast, but they were comfortable, all employed, and all satisfied and contented. But, sir, with them, as with others, a most serious change has taken place. They find their usual employments suddenly arrested, from the same cause which has smitten other parts of the country with like effects; and they have sent forward a memorial, which I have now the honor of laying before the Senate. This memorial, sir, is signed by nine hundred of the legal voters of the town; and I understand the largest number of votes known to have been given is one thousand. Their memorial is short; it complains of the illegal removal of the deposits, of the attack on the bank, and of the effect of these measures on their business.

Mr. President, when will this foolish experiment be abandoned? All men may commit errors, but wise men, and candid men, will retract them so soon as they see them to be errors. They will not adhere to error, in spite of experience, and grow more obstinate and more angry, in proportion as that error becomes more and more manifest. Sir, we have come to a pass, in which attachment to preconceived opinions, and to hastily adopted purposes, must give way to truth and reason. The times are becoming too sober, quite too sober, for any man, or any set of men, to make a stubborn point of what they may call their own consistency. The country must be saved; and the people must save it by compelling those who have adopted ruinous measures, to retrace their steps, if they will not retrace them of their own free will, having seen their utter and absolute failure, and the enormous mischiefs which they have produced.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON said: The daily morning apparition of these distress petitions was a novelty in this chamber, and they were presented in a novel manner—with elaborate speeches, when the rules of the Senate only admit the contents to be stated, as nothing is to be done with them except to refer them to a committee—to which nobody objects. Then why the speeches? They are certainly for the country, not for the Senate, and certainly tend to increase the distress of which they complain. No doubt the country is distressed, struck down from prosperity in a few weeks; and no doubt the Bank of the United States has done it, and done it for the purpose of forcing a recharter and a restoration of the deposits through the distresses of the people. They all say the same thing, that nothing but this restoration and recharter will relieve the distress. Well! the bank will not be rechartered, nor the deposits restored, and yet the distress will cease, and all the imputed causes of the distress will be found to be a mistake.

TUESDAY, March 25.

Memorial from Philadelphia.

Mr. CLAYTON presented resolutions adopted at a large public meeting of silversmiths, watchmakers, jewellers, &c., of the city of Philadelphia.

He stated the substance of the resolutions, and expressed his regret that an earlier opportunity for the presentation of them had been denied him, in consequence of the great press of business before the Senate.

Mr. C. proceeded to enforce the opinions and arguments adopted at the meeting, by comments on the respectability of those who advanced them, and the peculiar character of the meeting. It was composed of a class of men whose business was, of all others perhaps, most affected by disastrous fluctuations in the currency, being the manufacture and sale of such articles as are most liable to be dispensed with by a suffering people in any state of general embarrassment; and he held it due to the Senate to observe that, from the intelligence and integrity of those whose names appeared on the face of the proceedings, the sentiments advanced in reference to a subject which necessarily engaged so much of their attention as men of business, were entitled to be weighed with the highest respect by this honorable body. On his motion, the resolutions were read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, March 26.

Young Men's Distress Memorial, Philadelphia, 5,000 Signers—Committee of 25 Young Men to bring it on.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the proceedings of a meeting, held on the 14th of the present month, in the city of Philadelphia, composed entirely of the young men of that city and neighborhood, ascribing the present calamitous condition of the country to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. On presenting these memorials—

Mr. S. said: On the 14th of this month, a meeting was held in the city of Philadelphia, at which 25 persons were appointed to proceed to this place, for the purpose of having the proceedings of the meeting properly presented to Congress, and suitable means used to effect their object. It was also resolved to forward to me a copy of their proceedings, to be laid before the Senate. I comply, with great cheerfulness, with their request, and now offer them to your consideration. The meeting was not of an ordinary character, nor composed of individuals usually found in political, or other public meetings. It was called by more than 5,000 young men, and composed entirely of young men—a portion of them not yet belonging to any of the parties into which the politicians of the country have been divided; who have, as yet, assumed no party name, and learned to follow no party leader. They have no name written upon their standards, or marked upon their foreheads. The only flag which they have used, is that of their common country. They were attracted, or rather urged, sir, to this meeting, and to the expression of their feelings and opinions, by what they saw around, and knew of the action of the Executive upon the currency and prosperity of the country. They have just entered, or are about entering, on the busy occupations of manhood, and are suddenly surprised by a state of things around them, new to their observation and experience. Calamity had been a stranger in their pathway. They have grown up through their boyhood in the enjoyments of present comfort, and the anticipation of future prosperity—their seniors actively and successfully engaged in the various occupations of the community, and the whole circle of employments open before their own industry and hopes—the institutions of their country beloved, and their protecting influence covering the exertions of all for their benefit and happiness. In this state they saw the public prosperity, with which alone they were familiar, blasted, and for the time destroyed. The whole scene, their whole country was changed; they witnessed fortunes falling, homesteads ruined, merchants failing, artisans broken, mechanics impoverished, all the employments on which they were about to enter, paralyzed; labor denied to the needy, and reward to the industrious; losses of millions of property, and gloom settling where joy and happiness before existed. They felt the sirocco pass by, and desolate the plains where peace, and animation, and happiness exulted. The act itself they regard as one of high-handed power, which spurns constitutional checks, and overleaps the barriers prepared by our fathers against arbitrary Governments; as destroying confidence in the currency of the country, and the policy of the Government, and the stability of our institutions; and meriting the deep and lasting execrations of an injured and outraged people.

Mr. S. then moved that the proceedings be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRESTON said: I rise, Mr. President, for the double purpose of seconding (which I do by the request of the memorialists) the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, and of announcing to the Senate, that, when that motion is disposed of, I will have the honor of presenting to the Senate, a memorial from the 8d Congressional district of Pennsylvania. I shall avail myself of the present occasion to submit what I have to say upon both memorials.

That which is now under the formal consideration of the Senate is distinguished from all others which have been heretofore received, in this, that whereas heretofore memorials have been presented either from promiscuous assemblages of citizens, or from assemblages of citizens of particular avocations, as merchants, manufacturers, &c., but all representing the great, active, and what may be called the political body of the community, the present memorialists are not designated from the mass of our citizens by trade, or calling, or pursuits in life, but are distinguished from it by the fact, that they are young men. Four thousand young men sign the memorial before us, and venture to suggest their sentiments to the Senate of the United States. It is obvious that those who defend the measures of the administration, and whose business it is to detract from the efficacy of every manifestation of public opinion, will be prompt with the inquiry, By what title to respect do the young men of Philadelphia claim the consideration of the Senate? Why should those, who are just beginning to look upon life, assume to express opinions upon the gravest and most complex concerns? For my part, said Mr. P., I think I can perceive in these proceedings a most instructive lesson.

It may happen, sir, that the influences of youthful ardor have as little effect in giving bias to the judgment, as the peculiar pursuits, the accidental interests, and, above all, the party spirit, of those who have entered fully into the more strenuous pursuits of life. If these memorialists are young, they are unsophisticated—if their judgment be considered immature, let it be remembered that their hearts are sound and generous; and, above all, let us not forget that these gentlemen express what the bold, the generous, the untrammelled, and the unselfish feel; and, if you please, sir, that they reflect and indicate the emotions which so profoundly agitate our country from one end to the other. It is obvious, sir, that a deep feeling of anxiety has taken possession of the public mind; a feeling independent of actual suffering, and independent too of a full perception of the extent of the misrule to which we are subjected. It is not only those whose fortunes and hopes in life have been prostrated. It is not only those who stand upon the brink of ruin, and look to each coming day with dread of its results. It is not only those whose business or habit it is to mark the progress of political changes, and note coming events in the shadows which they cast before them. To none of these classes belong the memorialists before us; but, every order of society, every condition of life, all ages, and both sexes, are aroused by the blow which has been struck, by the Executive, upon that cord which binds every heart to our common country; and these memorialists, sir, when they declare that the laws have been violated, and the constitution endangered, find an echo in every man's bosom. It will be found that the memorialists confine themselves to these topics. These are the topics which occupy and agitate the community; and so absorbing have been the feelings excited by the seizure of the public money, so much has it astounded and alarmed the public mind, that all other subjects have been forgotten, all other acts of misrule overlooked, while this has claimed an exclusive and intense attention.

Sir, said Mr. P., I trust that the prayers of our fellow-citizens will be answered. The memorial presented by the Senator from New Jersey adds to their numbers, and when it is disposed of, I shall have the honor of presenting another, signed by 4,677 voters in the third Congressional district of Pennsylvania, which I will propose shall take the same course.

Mr. BROWN said that the remarks which had fallen from the gentlemen who had just addressed the Chair, (Messrs. SOUTHWARD and PRESTON,) seemed to require from him some reply; but, before he proceeded farther, he would take occasion to compliment gentlemen on the other side, on their having recovered the position that they had for some time lost sight of. Their strong political phalanx seemed to have been wavering. He began to think that all was not well with them; and that they did not command that entire unity of action which formerly distinguished them. They told us at one time, said Mr. B., that the violated laws, and an outraged constitution, was the only issue before the Senate; and when we told them that the recharter of the Bank of the United States was the only true issue, that was stoutly met and denied. A bill to recharter the bank had been presented a few days ago, and the honorable gentleman who introduced it opened the debate with a full discussion on all its merits, and with an ingenuity characteristic of able parliamentary leaders; that issue had been withdrawn, and the notes of distress were again sounded. He again congratulated gentlemen on the recovery of their former position.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) prefaced his remarks by saying that one of the circumstances peculiarly marking the present times was the presentment of a memorial from the young men of the country. What do we see? (said Mr. B.) For the first time in the history of the country, the young men brought forward to fight the battles of the Bank of the United States; and this showed the talismanic power of that institution, that they were able to mingle such incongruous elements in the conflict. What do we see? he again asked. Why, the bank reduced to the necessity, after having undergone a review before the people of the United States, and discomfited there, of taking refuge among a parcel of boys. The honorable gentleman continues to harp upon the great distress prevailing throughout the country; and what does he infer from this? That the people are opposed to the administration on this bank question? Did the elections give any evidence of the kind? Had there been a single election since, that had not given the administration a triumphant majority? Witness the elections in Virginia, in New Hampshire, and everywhere that elections had been held. How, then, did the gentleman infer that the people were against the administration on this bank question, when the elections gave such undeniable evidence to the contrary? The honorable gentleman had gone on to inquire into the state of our foreign relations, and he would take upon himself to answer him. There never had been a time, since the formation of our Government, when our foreign relations were conducted with such unparalleled success; and with what dignity and skill, might be read in a nation's hearts, and find an approving throb in every patriot bosom. It appeared to him that this was rather an unfortunate topic for the gentleman to advert to. Matters of old controversy with foreign powers, which had heretofore baffled the skill of the ablest negotiators, had been settled, and satisfactorily settled, under this administration. The gentleman had spoken of the vacancies in our diplomatic corps; but he (Mr. B.) was not aware of any foreign court at which the United States were not represented, either by a minister or a chargé; and, as to Russia, the gentleman must be aware that it was but a very short time since our minister to that court had returned home. The gentleman asked why we were not represented at the court of England? Now, he believed that a satisfactory answer to that question might be found in the circumstance that the appointments of the Executive to that court had not always met with the approbation of the Senate. A few years ago, the appointment of a minister to England was made, and with what success, the history of that body (the Senate) would show. Again: the gentleman had referred to the tendency of this Government to concentrate power in the hands of one man; but, if there was such a one, he could only say there was a counter tendency in the people towards the support of liberty. Did not the gentleman perceive a tendency in the Bank of the United States towards an unauthorized assumption of power? "Look on this picture, and on that." We see an institution taking an attitude wholly unparalleled in the history of the country, and yet we have heard it draw down from gentlemen no denunciations. It had been repeatedly charged that the President was disposed to arrogate to himself monarchical power—to assume the imperial purple; and yet, when we look to the age of the man, to his habits, and to his character, we may well ask what object he can have in view for abusing the high trust reposed in him? On the contrary, he has every inducement not to tarnish that fame acquired by such distinguished services, and by a long life of patriotic devotion to the institutions of the country. Mr. B. concluded by saying, he had conceived it to be his duty to make these few remarks, in reply to what had fallen from the gentlemen from New Jersey and South Carolina.

The memorials, as moved, were then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, March 27.

Lexington (Kentucky) Memorial.

Mr. CLAY said he was desirous of calling up the resolutions he had submitted some days ago, but as he did not perceive the gentleman from Georgia, who he was inclined to believe wished to make some observations on the subject, to be in his place, he would waive the motion, and take the present opportunity of presenting a memorial from the citizens of Lexington, and of the town and county of Fayette, Kentucky, on the subject so interesting to the people of the United States. This memorial was signed by upwards of 1,200 persons, embracing mechanics, manufacturers, farmers, merchants, and the great body of men of business of those places; it was signed by numbers of his friends and neighbors—by individuals, some of whom he had known for forty years. It was on the common topic which had so often and for so long a time engaged the attention of the Senate—the existing distress of the country. It was very true, that the memorialists did not speak of very great pressure in their portion of the country; they spoke of the approach of great distress, and expressed their apprehensions that it would continue to increase. But in what country, in what climate, the most favored by Heaven, can happiness and prosperity exist against bad government, against misrule, and against rash and ill-advised experiments? On the mountain's top, in the mountain's cavern, in the remotest borders of the country, everywhere, every interest has been affected by the mistaken policy of the Executive. While he admitted that the solicitude of his neighbors and friends was excited in some degree by the embarrassments of the country, yet they felt a deeper solicitude for the restoration of the rightful authority of the constitution and the laws. It is this which excites their apprehensions, and creates all their alarm. He would not, at this time, enlarge farther on the subject of this memorial. He would only remark, that hemp, the great staple of the part of the country from whence the memorial came, had fallen twenty per cent. since he left home, and that Indian corn, another of its greatest staples, the most valuable of the fruits of the earth for the use of man, which the farmer converted into most of the articles of his consumption, furnishing him with food and raiment, had fallen to an equal extent. There were in that county six thousand fat bullocks now remaining unsold, when, long before this time last year, there was scarcely one to be purchased. They were not sold, because the butchers could not obtain from the banks the usual facilities in the way of discounts; they could not obtain funds in anticipation of their sale wherewith to purchase; and now $100,000 worth of this species of property remains on hand, which, if sold, would have been scattered through the country by the graziers, producing all the advantages to be derived from so large a circulation. Every farmer was too well aware of these facts one moment to doubt them. We are, said Mr. C., not a complaining people. We think not so much of distress. Give us our laws—guarantee to us our constitution—and we will be content with almost any form of government.

Mr. C. asked that the memorial be read, printed with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Finance; which motion was carried.

FRIDAY, March 28.

Albany Memorial.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial signed by about twenty-eight hundred of the citizens of Albany. On presenting this memorial, Mr. WEBSTER said:

Mr. President: I have the honor to present to the Senate, a memorial from the city of Albany.

New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston, have already laid before Congress, the opinions entertained in those cities by men in all classes of society, and of all occupations and conditions in life, respecting the conduct of the administration in removing the public deposits. To these, Albany now joins her voice—a voice not less clear, not less strong, not less unanimous, than that of her sister cities.

It is well known to you, sir, and to gentlemen on the floor of the Senate, that Albany, for its size, is an extremely commercial city. Connected with the sea by one of the noblest rivers on earth, it is placed, also, at the point, at or near which many hundred miles of inland navigation, from the west and from the north, accumulate the products of a vast and fertile interior, and deliver them, for further transport, into receptacles proper to be borne on tide-waters, or to be impelled by steam. In return for these riches of inland industry, thus abundantly poured forth to the sea, Albany receives, of course, large amounts of foreign merchandise, to be forwarded inward, and to be distributed for consumption in the western district of the State, along the shores of the lakes, and even to the banks of the Mississippi itself. It is necessarily, therefore, a place of vast exchanges of property; in other words, a place of great trade. Albany, I believe, sir, has a population of twenty-eight or thirty thousand people. It has given, I learn, on interesting occasions, nearly, but not quite, thirty-eight hundred votes. The paper, sir, whose folds I am now unrolling, and which I have risen to present to the Chair, bears twenty-eight hundred names, all believed to be qualified electors. Great pains have been taken to be accurate in this particular; and if there be a single name to this paper not belonging to a qualified voter, it is not only here by mistake, but here after careful scrutiny has been had, for the purpose of avoiding such mistakes. Every man, sir, whose name is here, is believed to have a right to say "I am an American citizen; I possess the elective franchise; I hold the right of suffrage; I possess and exercise an individual share in the sovereign power of the State; I am one of those principals, whose agent Government is, and I expect from Government a proper regard to my interests."

It will thus be seen, sir, that this paper expresses the sentiments of three-fourths of as many citizens of Albany as have ever been collected, on any occasion, at the polls of the city. What these sentiments are, the Senate will be at no loss to understand, when the paper shall be read.

Sir, our condition is peculiar. One hardly knows how to describe it. In the midst of all the bounties of Providence, and in a time of profound peace, we are poor. Our Secretary of the Treasury, sir, is not Midas. His touch does not turn every thing to gold. It seems rather to turn every thing into stone. It stops the functions and the action of organized social life, and congeals the whole body politic. It produces a kind of instantaneous petrification. We see still the form of our once active social system, but it is without life. We can trace the veins along its cold surface, but they are bloodless; we see the muscles, but they are motionless; the external form is yet fair and goodly, but there is a cessation of the principle of life within.

[Mr. W. continued his remarks for some time, and then moved the reference and printing of the memorial, which was agreed to without opposition.]

Removal of the Deposits.—Mr. Clay's Resolutions: the Vote Taken.

The CHAIR called the order of the day, being the resolution reported upon by the Finance Committee, with the resolutions moved by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. MOORE said he did not rise now with a view of entering into the discussion of this question, but for the purpose only of preventing, during these times of high political excitement, any misrepresentation of the views which influenced the vote he was about to record. The first question presented for the consideration of the Senate, was—whether the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the measure adopted in the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States to the State institutions, in whose custody they had been placed, were satisfactory? Mr. M. said it was his honest and clear conviction they were not satisfactory, but insufficient and untenable; and that, in the act and the manner of effecting their removal, was involved an assumption of power, the legitimate exercise of which properly belonged to the legislative department of the Government. But, admitting the removal of the public money, and the manner of that removal, to have been improper, and as meriting censure, yet their restoration to the Bank of the United States, under all the circumstances that surround us, he thought was fairly questionable; and particularly if the proposition of a recharter of the bank, at this time, be viewed as settled in the negative, of which he could not entertain a doubt, their repossession by the Bank of the United States, for the short time it had to exist, could not be very important, either as related to the prosperity of the institution itself, or the interest of the community; whilst their withdrawal from the banks in whose custody they have been placed, would greatly reduce their means and power to afford that relief to the wants and distresses of the people, called for in every direction. But a more powerful consideration operating upon his mind, was the supposed will and wishes of a majority of those whom he had the honor to represent; for, although he was well aware that a very respectable minority, including gentlemen of the first intelligence and great moral worth, were decidedly opposed to this act of the Executive in the removal, and in favor of a restoration, yet he was bound to believe, from the indications of public sentiment which he had received, that a majority of the citizens of the State entertained different views, and he therefore gave his vote in favor of a tribute due to public opinion.

Mr. McKEAN said that he intended to vote against both of the resolutions under consideration, for several reasons, but especially because they were exclusively censorious in their character, and were calculated further to distract and excite the angry feelings which already existed. If the resolutions pass, they effect no remedy for the extreme distress, of which we have heard so much, nor do they point to any future legislation for that purpose. His votes on these resolutions were not to be taken as evidence of what his course would be when a distinct proposition, granting relief to a suffering community, should be presented.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the first of the resolutions, being that reported by the Committee on Finance, in the following words:

Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States, deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to Congress on the fourth day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient.

And decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, King of Ga., Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—18.

Mr. CLAY, at the instance of some of his friends, modified his resolution, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.

And the question being taken on agreeing to this resolution, it was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Gold and Silver Currency.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report to the Senate, and to the House, respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made—

1st. In the value of the gold coined at the mint of the United States, so as to check the exportation of that coin, and to restore it to circulation in the United States.

2d. In the laws relative to foreign coins, so as to restore the gold and silver coin of foreign nations to their former circulation within the United States.

3d. In the joint resolution of 1816, (for the better collection of the revenue,) so as to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars, from revenue payments, after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country.

WEDNESDAY, April 2.

Death of Mr. Blair, of South Carolina.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Franklin, their clerk:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, April 2d, 1834.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify that body of the death of JAMES BLAIR, late one of the Representatives from the State of South Carolina, and that his funeral will take place this day, at four o'clock in the afternoon, from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PRESTON said: I am sure the Senate will sympathize with me in those emotions of profound sorrow with which I rise to propose the customary resolution upon such an event. The sudden death of General BLAIR, in the vigor of life, and in the midst of its most strenuous pursuits, cannot fail to impress all minds with the most solemn feelings—which to us are enhanced by his association with us in the same pursuits, and by the fact that this is the second instance this session of such an awful and sudden dispensation of Providence. We, his colleagues of the South Carolina delegation, lament his loss not the less that he has differed with us in some points of public policy. Such differences have never extended to personal separation; for each has excused the zeal of the other, by a mutual and equal acknowledgment of zeal, and God forbid that any such difference should impede for a moment the sad current of feeling which passes through my heart. To whatever the deceased addressed himself, he brought uncommon force of character, firmness of purpose, and vigor of intellect. His country and his constituents have to mourn the loss of these qualities at this important juncture of our affairs; and upon me devolves the melancholy duty of moving the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. JAMES BLAIR, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of South Carolina, at the hour of four o'clock this evening; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was then unanimously adopted; and, on motion of Mr. PRESTON, The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 3.

Bath (Me.) Memorial.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a memorial of the citizens of Bath, in Maine.

Mr. S. said that this was a memorial on the all-absorbing subject which had occupied the Senate for so many months, and to which Senators now lent such an unwilling ear, as led him almost to believe that their hearts had become callous to the sufferings of the community, as they increased in intensity. The memorial was signed by upwards of 800 of the citizens of Bath, State of Maine, who represent that this infliction on the country, in its travels to the Northeast, had reached them, and that they were now feeling its disastrous effects; that they were increasing, and that every indication as to the future gave them reason to apprehend they would be still more and more severe. They had before them, in prospect, as they express it, the utter prostration of business, bankruptcy, and ruin.

The memorial was referred, and ordered to be printed.*

[SENATE.]

Faneuil Hall Resolutions.

Mr. BOSTON rose to present the resolutions adopted by the friends of the administration, and opponents of the United States Bank, at their great meeting in Faneuil Hall, on the 14th of March last. He said, that in the great multitude of petitions, memorials, and resolutions, which had been presented to the Senate, few, if any, ever came forward with more imposing claims to the respectful consideration of the Senate. They come from a city, great in itself, and greater still in the commerce which enriches it—the arts and literature which adorn it—and the historic recollections which illustrate it. They come from a large portion of the population of that eminent city—5,000 being computed to be within the walls, and 2,000 without—making a mass of 7,000 citizens, whose voices were united and embodied in these resolutions. They were adopted on a spot sacred to American history, and memorable for scenes of patriotic impulsion—in that Faneuil Hall, whose name alone imparts an interest to every thing which emanates from it.

These resolutions, said Mr. B., are twenty-eight in number. They embrace all the points which have grown out of the question which has occupied and engrossed the public attention since the meeting of Congress; and are full and explicit in approving the conduct of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, and in condemning the conduct of the United States Bank. Concurring, as he heartily did, in the sentiments expressed by these resolutions, he felt a particular gratification in being the organ of their communication to the Senate. They would be read, and would speak for themselves; and would show that any attempt on his part to add to their point and power, would be vain and nugatory. He should not make the attempt—he should not pretend to go over ground so fully occupied and so ably explored; but he would take leave to make a few remarks on some points mentioned in the resolutions, either of a more general application or of a nature not to be sufficiently illustrated in the limited scope of a resolution.

Mr. B. remarked upon the identity of the scene which was now presented with the one which was witnessed at the approaching termination of the first bank charter in 1811, when there was no removal of deposits to be charged with the distresses of the country. All the machinery of alarm and distress was in as full activity at that time as at present, and with the same identical effects. Town meetings—memorials—resolutions—deputations to Congress—alarming speeches in Congress. The price of all property was shown to be depressed. Hemp sunk in Philadelphia from $350 to $250 per ton; flour sunk from $11 a barrel to $7 75; all real estate fell 30 per cent.; 500 houses were suspended in their erection; the rent of money rose to 1½ per month on the best paper. Confidence destroyed—manufactories stopped—workmen dismissed—and the ruin of the country confidently predicted. This was the scene then; and for what object? Purely and simply to obtain a recharter of the bank—purely and simply to force a recharter from the alarm and distress of the country; for there was no removal of deposits then to be complained of, and to be made the scapegoat of a studied and premeditated attempt to operate upon Congress through the alarms of the people and the destruction of their property. There was not even a curtailment of discounts then. The whole scene was fictitious; but it was a case in which fiction does the mischief of truth. A false alarm in the money market produces all the effects of real danger; and thus, as much distress was proclaimed in Congress in 1811—as much distress was proved to exist, and really did exist—then as now; without a single cause to be alleged then, which is alleged now. But the power and organization of the bank made the alarm then; its power and organization make it now; and fictitious on both occasions; and men were ruined then, as now, by the power of imaginary danger, which in the moneyed world, has all the ruinous effects of real danger. No deposits were removed then, and the reason was, as assigned by Mr. Gallatin to Congress, that the Government had borrowed more than the amount of the deposits from the bank; and this loan would enable her to protect her interest in every contingency. The open object of the bank then was a recharter. The knights entered the list with their visors off—no war in disguise then for the renewal of a charter under the tilting and jousting of a masquerade scuffle for recovery of deposits.

That the real object of all this alarm in the country—all this pressure upon some parts of the country—for the section south of the Potomac had enjoyed a remarkable exemption—he was permitted to believe was to secure the recharter of the bank. Such must have been the design of the bank; and the manner in which the bill for the recharter was brought forward, and then laid over, certainly favored the idea. It was brought forward under an agonizing cry of distress, and a vehement appeal for immediate relief from actual, insufferable distress. It was then laid down that it might not interfere with another debate; that other debate came to a close in two days; then the bill which was fixed for the 1st of March, was taken up to be fixed again for the 21st of April; and before the 21st of April comes, a set of important elections will take place in the two great States of New York and Virginia. Thus after working the machinery of alarm for three months, and filling the Union with cries for the restoration of the deposits, the bank suddenly presents a demand for a recharter; and then adjourns that demand, urgent as it might be, until certain important elections were over!

Mr. B. remarked upon the political character of this bank. He said it was born a political institution, and was the first measure of the Government to develop the line which so long and so distinctly marked the political parties of this country. The creation of this bank went to the origin of party. It went to the source where parties should be formed—to principles, to great and fundamental principles in the administration of the Government. It involved the question of constructive, and of granted powers; and was the entering wedge to all the implied powers afterwards assumed by Congress. Prohibitory tariffs—local internal improvement—and the whole American system. He said the bank was the head of the American system, and if it was rechartered, it would re-establish that system in greater power and glory than it ever possessed. That it would do so, was proved, he said, by what it was now doing—struggling for those deposits which were the fruit of the high tariff policy—struggling for money which many gentlemen held to have been unconstitutionally levied, and therefore, not levied at all, but taken tortuously. He warned gentlemen who were opposed to the American system, not now to re-establish this eldest and strongest member of that system; and which, if re-established, would certainly set up the whole family again; especially that high tariff which furnished her with those surpluses of revenue, for the keeping of which she now shows such an invincible inclination.

Mr. B. remarked upon the resolution which spoke of the exclusion of the Government directors from a knowledge and participation in the affairs of the bank, for the purpose of reminding the American people that there were no Government directors at this time in the bank. The institution, in its management, was now a mere private affair, governed by the directors of the individual stockholders; wielding and using the money, the name, the character, and the influence of the United States, precisely as they pleased. The immense power which the Government had put into the hands of the bank, was now used independently of the Government; and in the absence of directors, it became a matter of the highest moment to the people to have a thorough investigation into the affairs of the bank, to see how far its tremendous powers had been used for good, or for evil; for favor, or affection; for the relief, or oppression of the American people. Until that examination was made, and especially in the absence and exclusion of the Government directors, it was certainly an extraordinary case of presumption for the bank to come forward and demand a recharter.

The equality of the State banks with the branches of the Federal bank, as places of deposit for the public moneys, as mentioned in one of the resolutions, was next adverted to by Mr. B. He did it for the purpose of remarking that the strong and conclusive argument against the assumption, that the Federal bank was the Federal Treasury, growing out of the 14th fundamental article of the constitution of the bank, could no longer escape public attention. The notice which was taken of it in such a meeting, and such a place, would ensure it a general and conspicuous regard in time to come.

FRIDAY, April 11.

Distress Petitions and Petitioners—Compilation and Enumeration—Numbers and Quantity.

Mr. CLAY rose to present a motion or order, to which he invited the attention of the Senate. We have had, said he, a great variety of memorials and petitions presented in the progress of this session, on the state of the country, its distresses, and the relief which the petitioners think ought to be extended to the country. It appeared to him that the compilation of these papers would form a document one would like to possess, to see the aggregate number of petitioners, pro and con., on a most interesting subject, and to have a collected view of the sentiments of their fellow-citizens who had come before the Senate. With a view of ascertaining these particulars, he submitted the following order, which, as he supposed, did not require a delay on the table of one day, he hoped the Senate would consider at once:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to cause to be ascertained and reported to the Senate, the aggregate numbers of all who have, or shall have, on the day of his report, presented petitions, memorials, or other proceedings to the Senate, for or against the Executive measure of the removal of the public deposits, distinguishing the number appertaining to each.

Mr. WRIGHT rose to inquire whether the rule did not require the order to lie on the table one day.

The CHAIR having replied in the negative,

Mr. WRIGHT thought there were many reasons which would render the execution of such an order a matter not only of difficulty, but of delicacy to the Secretary. He would mention one single difficulty that had come under his own observation. During the last week, there had been received from the public printer two memorials from Albany, New York, printed with the names. The names had been printed on his motion. Now, when one of these memorials was presented, it was said to contain 2,812 names; but, on counting them, he found but 1,812. The number of names in the other memorial also differed in the printed copy from that the original was said to contain. He made these remarks with no invidious feelings. He did not attribute the mistake to the printer, or to any one else, but to show, if the order was passed by the Senate, that it would be very difficult to execute it. For these reasons, he would prefer laying the order on the table.

Mr. CLAY was aware that absolute and entire precision was not to be obtained; but he thought an approximation was sufficient. Where there were 100,000 signatures, it was not to be expected but that there might be some fictitious ones among them, and the number of names stated to be affixed to memorials might also be misstated, being a few more or less; but this would be of little consequence. It would, however, be as well, if practicable, to put the Senate in possession of such information as would enable it to discriminate between those individuals in possession of the elective franchise, and those who had it not—between the fictitious and the real names. The name of the Presiding Officer of the Senate had been found affixed to the Baltimore memorial, and he (Mr. C.) knew not how many John Does and Richard Roes; but notwithstanding all this, he was willing to take them altogether, for he wanted to see the real amount of the signatures—to get some near approximation; it was all that was requisite in a case like this.

With respect to what had been said by the honorable Senator from New York, in regard to the Albany memorial, he felt persuaded there was some mistake. If he understood the honorable Senator correctly, his list was greater than that of his opponents, and perhaps that had been done, though not by the honorable gentleman himself, but by some one else, who might have contrived to cut off the tail of our petition, in order to annex it to his. He (Mr. C.) would not say it had happened; but he had understood that a large number of the names that were attached to a petition which had been gotten up in Philadelphia by the glass manufacturers, for a purpose unconnected with this subject, had been cut off and affixed to a memorial addressed to the other House on the subject of the removal of the deposits.

As regarded the Albany memorial, it would become the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and he (Mr. C.) had such confidence in him that he was sure that officer would examine how the matter stood. With respect to the gentlemen who had brought the memorial from Albany, he believed that what they had stated they thought to be perfectly true, that there were 2,800 and odd signatures. He had not seen the printed document to which the honorable gentleman had referred, but he (Mr. C.) would venture to say, if there was not the number of names which had been stated, there had occurred some accident or mistake. He thought the document—though, he repeated, he might not get at the absolute fact—would be a valuable one, as furnishing something like the aggregate numbers, and would show the real state of the matter, pro and con. He had taken the opportunity of inquiring of one of the clerks in the office as to the practicability of obtaining this document, and he had assured him (Mr. C.) that it could be prepared in two or three days. It was a duty which could be accomplished without difficulty.

Mr. WRIGHT believed the Secretary would do him the justice to say that he had not seen the Albany memorial.

Mr. CLAY hoped the gentleman did not understand him as intending to make any such charge.

The order was adopted.

Printing Old Journals—Abuse of Printing.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to take up for consideration the resolution offered by him a few days since, relative to the printing of the old Journals of Congress.

Mr. KING said that when he considered the heavy draws made upon the contingent fund of the Senate during the present session, he was sorry to see another resolution of this character pressed upon the consideration of the Senate. He said that probably the honorable Senator from Mississippi had not considered the expense of carrying the resolution into effect. It would, if he mistook not, cost from $30,000 to $40,000. But, he said, it was not alone this resolution at this particular time that he objected to, but to the whole system of printing and binding books for the individual use of the members.

Sir, said Mr. K., the abuses of the privilege of extra printing, as it is called, for the use of the members of the two Houses of Congress, which practically results in the purchase of libraries for the members, to be kept or even sold, as their private property, is very justly considered as one of the grievances of the nation, and a practice, he said, which the people would not much longer quietly submit to.

Why, said Mr. K., as a part of the history of this abuse, allow me to refer to a vote of the other House a few days since, by which they passed a resolution that, according to the statement of one member, it would cost the Government some $80,000; and this the House passed too, said he, with as little ceremony as they would vote the printing of a village memorial.

The House, he said, had been almost spasmodically contracted with economy at the beginning of the session, and refused at first to pass the appropriation bill, with a clause that allowed this privilege of printing books. But now they justified the practice in the House by the bad precedents of the Senate, and seemed determined to run with it a race of prodigality. The Senate, he said, had already passed one resolution during the session, that was said would cost $48,000; some other purchases had been also made, besides an unusual quantity of extra printing; and if this resolution passed, we should see at the next session the startling item of $150,000 for the contingent expenses of the Senate.

Sir, said Mr. K., it is not only an abuse, but an excess of power. The constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but by an appropriation made by law. If it should be said that the cost of books might be, and usually was, smothered up in the appropriation bill for contingent expenses of the Senate, he could only say in answer, that this would be a fraudulent concealment of the object, which object was itself unconstitutional.

The pay of members, he said, by one clause of the constitution, was to be fixed by law. It was fixed by law at eight dollars per day; but by this practice, by the receipt of their money, and the sale of their books, they were likely to double it, as in point of fact the members frequently never received into their possession a volume of the works given them by Congress to qualify them for the performance of their duties; but sold them to booksellers, and gave orders for them on the officers of the House. Not expecting the Government to give him a library, he said, and being determined that it should not, if he could help it, he had negotiated for the purchase of a work which Congress had voted to the members at the last session, at a cost of $55,000. The bookseller, he said, offered him an order on the clerk for a copy, which he had purchased from a member. [Here Mr. CLAY asked for the name of the member who sold it.] Mr. K. answered, that if he was rightly informed, the practice was common, and too general to justify any particular exposure. He said, however, if he thought it of any consequence to the argument, he would make the disclosure, but it was of no consequence whether they kept the books as a valuable property of their own, or sold them and received their value in money. In fact, he said, if Congress gave members the books with the "jus disponendum," he did not see that we had any further concern with them; and they might make, without any impropriety, the same disposition of them that they made of their other property, especially after their term of service expired. Where is the difference, said Mr. K., whether they sold them or kept them as their own? Constitutions, he said, were not made to guard against what men probably will do, but what they may do. But if gentlemen thought it important to know that sales had actually been made, he could refer them to a notorious instance of a former member of this body, (about which there was no concealment,) having sold the books given to him during a single term of service to a foreign minister for $900!

The only power, he said, which Congress had on the subject, was to print for the use of the members as an official body, and then only to print and furnish official facts, for the information of the members whilst in the performance of their duties. But he denied the power to reprint and bind books of authority and history, either to enrich the libraries of the members or to enlighten the country. Where is the practice to stop? said Mr. K. If we can print and furnish one book because it is useful to the politician, why not reprint any other? Why not reprint some of the books of Livy, Gibbon's Decline and Fall, and all the useful books on history, politics, and political economy? For those books, he said, were all used by politicians, especially at home, much more than the books which it was now proposed to furnish, and much more than the books generally reprinted by Congress, and distributed among the members. The work, he said, which it is now proposed to print, at such an enormous expense, had been once reprinted by Congress already, and was a work on which no member who had it, he believed, placed much value as a library book. He had known one copy given away by a member as an incumbrance to his shelves. And no work could be more worthless, except to members whilst here, and they can refer to the eight or ten copies which are now in the library, and scarcely once touched, he would venture to say, during a whole session.

Look farther, said Mr. K., at the practical inequality of the system. It depends on members themselves how much they will waste of the treasury of the nation in this way. The House and the Senate seem now trying who shall get the most books. Look again how the system fails in its object, even where the members keep their books. His honorable predecessor, he said, (no doubt against his wish,) had voted to him last session, books that cost the Government some hundreds of dollars, just one volume of which he received whilst he was a member, but which are to be sent hence to him by the Secretary to qualify him for the duties of a seat he has long since resigned; and I, said Mr. K., who fill the seat, am without the books, and intend to remain so, unless I choose to purchase them with my own funds. Books, he said, which were sent home to members who had resigned, or whose time expired before the books were completed, and also such as were sold to booksellers, or carried by the purchasers to Europe, were, he supposed, "enlightening the members for the performance of their duties and spreading useful information among the people." But, sir, said Mr. K., it is of no consequence what they do with them, if they are allowed to carry them off as their own; the reasons given for the practice are mere evasions. Congress has no power to enlighten the people, or school their members in this way. Let us, he said, when necessary, print useful official documents for the use of the office, and not buy or make books for the officer. If the rule were adopted, he said that works printed by Congress were to be left in the Capitol, under control of the public officers, for the use of members for the time being, we should at least get rid of purchasing the same books from year to year, at a progressively increasing expense "to put new members on a footing with the old"—the plan lately adopted by the House. In fact, he said, with this rule we should soon get rid of the abuse altogether, as the argument of "spreading useful information," &c., he apprehended, would be much weakened with many gentlemen, when they knew they were only to use the books whilst in the service of the country. In fine, he said, this practice was one of the grossest abuses, as well as one of the most palpable usurpations that ever had crept into the legislative branch of the Government, and he thought it due to the character of the two Houses, that whilst they were daily charging usurpation and abuse upon one department of the Government, that they should cast an eye to their own department. They should first sweep out their own chambers before they complained too harshly of the disorders elsewhere. He concluded by moving that the resolution lie on the table for the balance of the session.

Mr. PIERSON having asked whether the resolution was so worded as to give the books to the members—

Mr. KING said the resolution was in the usual form, he believed—that was to place the books at the disposal of the Senate; and the constant practice was, to first supply the members; but he did not know, nor could he imagine, what was to be done with the balance of the one thousand copies.

Mr. EWING having supported the principle of printing and buying books for the use of members, &c., and contending that Congress had the implied power on the same principle that they had power to build the Capitol, &c.:

Mr. KING did not deny the power to print for the use of members in their official character, as he had already explained; and he thought the course a hopeless one, that invoked the aid of an analogy so unfortunate. Sir, said Mr. K., I understand that this Capitol, being built at the public expense, is for the use of the members of Congress and other officers, for the time being; and when the honorable Senator should be able to prove that the members had the power to vote the Capitol to be their own property, and sell it if they choose, and put the proceeds in their own pockets, the analogy would bear him out, and not before. Mr. K. went on to answer more fully the arguments of Mr. E. and to enforce his views, and concluded by renewing his motion.

Mr. POINDESTER had never before heard the statement made by the honorable Senator from Georgia, of members of the other House having sold their books. Such an abuse of the privilege given to members was certainly reprehensible, and he did not know the name of any one who had been guilty of such a practice. The power seemed to him to rest in the general discretion of Congress.

Mr. PORTER asked if the books were to be given to members?

Mr. KING said the proposition was in the usual form; he supposed a number of copies would be distributed here, and the rest throughout the country.

Mr. PORTER approved of the course recommended by the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr.

SOUTHARD,) and thought the subject ought to be referred to a committee. He, Mr. P., wished to know more about it; at present he could not say whether he should vote for the printing or not.

Mr. POINDESTER did not think the subject could be referred. The present was a proposition for the action of the Senate alone. He had no objection, however, to the reference, if it could be made.

Mr. KANE disapproved of the whole practice, and moved that the resolution be laid indefinitely on the table.

MONDAY, April 14.

New York Memorials.

Mr. CLAY presented two memorials, numerously signed; one from the city of Troy, the other from the city of Schenectady, New York.

On presenting the above proceedings—

Mr. C. said he was charged with the pleasing duty of presenting to the Senate the proceedings of a public meeting of the people, and two memorials, subscribed by large numbers of his fellow-citizens, in respect to the existing state of public affairs.

The first he would offer were the resolutions of the young men of Troy, assembled upon a call of upwards of seven hundred of their number. He had recently visited that interesting city. It is, said he, one of the most beautiful of a succession of fine cities and villages that decorate the borders of one of the noblest rivers of our country. In spite of the shade cast upon it by its ancient and venerable sister and neighbor, it has sprung up with astonishing rapidity. When he saw it last fall, he never beheld a more respectable, active, enterprising, and intelligent business community. Every branch of employment was flourishing. Every heart beat high in satisfaction with present enjoyment, and in hope from the prospect of future success. How sadly had the scene changed! How terribly have all their anticipations of continued and increasing prosperity been dashed and disappointed by the folly and wickedness of misguided rulers!

The next document which he had to offer was a memorial, signed by near nine hundred mechanics of the city of Troy. Several of them were personally known to him. And judging from what he knew, saw, and heard, he believed there was not anywhere a more skilful, industrious, and respectable body of mechanics than in Troy. They bear testimony to the prevalence of distress, trace it to the illegal acts of the Executive branch of the Government in the removal of the public deposits; ask their restoration, and the recharter of the Bank of the United States. And the committee, in their letter addressed to him, say: "We are, what we profess to be, working men, dependent upon our labor for our daily bread, confine our attention to our several vocations, and trust in God and the continental Congress for such protection as will enable us to operate successfully."

The last memorial he would present, had been transmitted to him by the secretaries of a meeting stated to be the largest ever held in the county of Schoenectady, in New York. It is signed by about eight hundred persons. In a few instances, owing to the subscriptions having been obtained by different individuals, the same name occurs twice. The memorialists bring their testimony to the existence of distress, and the disorders of the currency, and invoke the application of the only known, tried, and certain remedy, the establishment of a national bank.

Mr. BENTON, adverting to the diurnal presentation of distress memorials, and distress orations in support of them, said they had become a regular morning service, in which each opposition Senator took his turn, and performed his office with equal gravity, but it would seem with not much more of invention in the orators than in the petitioners; for all were composed of the same staple, both woof and warp. The petitions presented ruin and desolation brought upon a happy, prosperous, and unoffending people, by the ruthless act of one man; the orators eulogized the petitioners, gave interesting statistics of their town and county, agreed in all they said, and concurred in the remedy, which was perfectly logical, with the exception of being drawn from all premises. The premises were, that the removal of the deposits made the distress; the conclusion was, that the restoration of the deposits would cure the distress; very logical, but very false. The removal of the deposits did not make the distress, (so far as there was any,) and their restoration would not cure what their removal did not create.

Mr. B. said public bodies had sometimes got names from circumstances which characterized them. Thus, several English parliaments had got names which history embalms, as the Blessed Parliament, because all its acts were for the good of the people; the Parliamentum indocuum, because it was a parliament in which few could read; the Long Parliament, because it sat so many years; the Rump Parliament, because reduced to a few rag-end members. In like manner this Congress may have earned a name, growing out of its characteristic features—distress and terror. The lamentations which have filled its halls might suggest the name of the most sorrowful patriarch, and Jeremiah Congress become its historical appellation. But a name from the heathen mythology would suit it better, and one would readily be found in the cognomen of that frightful god—half man, and half beast—whose dreadful appearance could scare an army out of its senses. Pan, his name, and Panic the name of this Congress!

The papers were then read, printed, and referred.

TUESDAY, April 15.

Death of Mr. Dennis.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Walter S. Franklin, Esq., their Clerk, notifying the Senate of the death of the honorable LITTLETON PURNELL DENNIS, late a member of that House, from the State of Maryland, and that his funeral would take place from the Hall of the House of Representatives, to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. KENT rose and said: Mr. President: The message which has just been read, announces to you, and to the Senate, the death of the late Mr. DENNIS, one of the Representatives from the State of Maryland, in the other branch of Congress. Already, Mr. President, our feelings have been repeatedly agonized by the sudden death of several of our associates, in the legislative labors of the session, and the one that has just been made known to us is little less sudden than those that have preceded it.

But a few days since, and the deceased was busily engaged in the attentive discharge of the duties of his station, and he is now numbered with the dead. He is gone to "that bourne from whence no traveller returns." Truly has it been said, "in the midst of life we are in death." The deceased was a native of Somerset county, in Maryland, a prominent member of a highly respectable family, in the 50th year of his age, and although of a delicate constitution, was justifiable in looking forward yet to many years of usefulness and happiness. He was a member of the bar, justly esteemed in his profession, and always in possession of the confidence of his countrymen. His modest, unassuming, and retiring habits, could not conceal from them his good sense and high attainments, and early in life he was returned a delegate to the General Assembly of Maryland, and has been continued in the discharge of his legislative labors, with but little interruption, to the period of his decease.

Mr. KENT then submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. LITTLETON P. DENNIS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Maryland, at the hour of 12 o'clock to-morrow; and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

On motion of Mr. KENT,
The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 17.

Message from the President:—Protest against the Senate's proceedings against him.

To the Senate of the United States:

It appears by the published Journal of the Senate, that, on the 26th of December last, a resolution was offered by a member of the Senate, which, after a protracted debate, was, on the 28th day of March last,

APRIL, 1834.]

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

modified by the mover, and passed by the votes of twenty-six Senators, out of forty-six who were present and voted, in the following words, viz.:

Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Having had the honor, through the voluntary suffrages of the American people, to fill the office of President of the United States during the period which may be presumed to have been referred to in this resolution, it is sufficiently evident that the censure it inflicts was intended for myself. Without notice, unheard and untried, I thus find myself charged on the records of the Senate, and in a form hitherto unknown in our history, with the high crime of violating the laws and constitution of my country.

It can seldom be necessary for any department of the Government, when assailed in conversation, or debate, or by the strictures of the press, or of popular assemblies, to step out of its ordinary path for the purpose of vindicating its conduct, or of pointing out any irregularity or injustice in the manner of the attack. But when the chief Executive Magistrate is, by one of the most important branches of the Government, in its official capacity, in a public manner, and by its recorded sentence, but without precedent, competent authority, or just cause, declared guilty of a breach of the laws and constitution, it is due to his station, to public opinion, and to a proper self-respect, that the officer thus denounced should promptly expose the wrong which has been done.

In the present case, moreover, there is even a stronger necessity for such a vindication. By an express provision of the constitution, before the President of the United States can enter on the execution of his office, he is required to take an oath or affirmation in the following words:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States; and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

The duty of defending, so far as in him lies, the integrity of the constitution, would indeed have resulted from the very nature of his office; but by thus expressing it in the official oath or affirmation, which, in this respect, differs from that of every other functionary, the founders of our republic have attested their sense of its importance, and have given to it a peculiar solemnity and force. Bound to the performance of this duty by the oath I have taken, by the strongest obligations of gratitude to the American people, and by the ties which unite my every earthly interest with the welfare and glory of my country, and perfectly convinced that the discussion and passage of the above-mentioned resolution were not only unauthorized by the constitution, but in many respects repugnant to its provisions and subversive of the rights secured by it to other co-ordinate departments, I deem it an imperative duty to maintain the supremacy of that sacred instrument, and the immunities of the department intrusted to my care, by all means consistent with my own lawful powers, with the rights of others, and with the genius of our civil institutions. To this end, I have caused this, my solemn protest against the aforesaid proceedings, to be placed on the files of the Executive department, and to be transmitted to the Senate.

It is alike due to the subject, the Senate, and the people, that the views which I have taken of the proceedings referred to, and which compel me to regard them in the light that has been mentioned, should be exhibited at length, and with the freedom and firmness which are required by an occasion so unprecedented and peculiar.

Under the Constitution of the United States, the powers and functions of the various departments of the Federal Government, and their responsibilities for violation or neglect of duty, are clearly defined, or result by necessary inference. The legislative power, subject to the qualified negative of the President, is vested in the Congress of the United States, composed of the Senate and House of Representatives. The executive power is vested exclusively in the President, except that in the conclusion of treaties and in certain appointments to office, he is to act with the advice and consent of the Senate. The judicial power is vested exclusively in the Supreme and other courts of the United States, except in cases of impeachment, for which purpose the accusatory power is vested in the House of Representatives, and that of hearing and determining in the Senate. But although for the special purposes which have been mentioned, there is an occasional intermixture of the powers of the different departments, yet with these exceptions, each of the three great departments is independent of the others in its sphere of action; and when it deviates from that sphere, is not responsible to the others, further than it is expressly made so in the constitution. In every other respect, each of them is the co-equal of the other two, and all are the servants of the American people, without power or right to control or censure each other in the service of their common superior, save only in the manner and to the degree which that superior has prescribed.

The responsibilities of the President are numerous and weighty. He is liable to impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, and, on due conviction, to removal from office, and perpetual disqualification; and notwithstanding such conviction, he may also be indicted and punished according to law. He is also liable to the private action of any party who may have been injured by his illegal mandates or instructions, in the same manner and to the same extent as the humblest functionary. In addition to the responsibilities which may thus be enforced by impeachment, criminal prosecution, or suit at law, he is also accountable at the bar of public opinion, for every act of his administration. Subject only to the restraints of truth and justice, the free people of the United States have the undoubted right, as individuals or collectively, orally or in writing, at such times, and in such language and form as they may think proper, to discuss his official conduct, and to express and promulgate their opinions concerning it. Indirectly, also, his conduct may come under review in either branch of the legislature, or in the Senate when acting in its executive capacity; and so far as the executive or legislative proceedings of these bodies may require it, it may be examined by them. These are believed to be the proper and only modes in which the President of the United States is to be held accountable for his official conduct.

Tested by these principles, the resolution of the Senate is wholly unauthorized by the constitution, and in derogation of its entire spirit. It assumes that a single branch of the legislative department may, for the purpose of a public censure, and without any view to legislation or impeachment, take up, consider, and decide upon, the official acts of the Executive. But in no part of the constitution is the President subjected to any such responsibility; and in no part of that instrument is any such power conferred on either branch of the legislature.

The justice of these conclusions will be illustrated and confirmed by a brief analysis of the powers of the Senate, and a comparison of their recent proceedings with those powers.

The high functions assigned by the constitution to the Senate, are in their nature either legislative, executive, or judicial. It is only in the exercise of its judicial powers, when sitting as a court for the trial of impeachments, that the Senate is expressly authorized and necessarily required to consider and decide upon the conduct of the President, or any other public officer. Indirectly, however, as has already been suggested, it may frequently be called on to perform that office. Cases may occur in the course of its legislative or executive proceedings, in which it may be indispensable to the proper exercise of its powers, that it should inquire into, and decide upon, the conduct of the President or other public officers; and in every such case, its constitutional right to do so is cheerfully conceded. But to authorize the Senate to enter on such a task in its legislative or executive capacity, the inquiry must actually grow out of and tend to some legislative or executive action; and the decision, when expressed, must take the form of some appropriate legislative or executive act.

The resolution in question was introduced, discussed, and passed, not as a joint, but as a separate resolution. It asserts no legislative power; proposes no legislative action; and neither possesses the form nor any of the attributes of a legislative measure. It does not appear to have been entertained or passed with any view or expectation of its issuing in a law or joint resolution, or in the repeal of any law or joint resolution, or in any other legislative action.

Whilst wanting both the form and substance of a legislative measure, it is equally manifest that the resolution was not justified by any of the executive powers conferred on the Senate. These powers relate exclusively to the consideration of treaties and nominations to office; and they are exercised in secret session, and with closed doors. This resolution does not apply to any treaty or nomination, and was passed in a public session.

Nor does this proceeding in any way belong to that class of incidental resolutions which relate to the officers of the Senate, to their chamber, and appurtenances, or to subjects of order, and other matters of the like nature—in all which either House may lawfully proceed, without any co-operation with the other, or with the President.

On the contrary, the whole phraseology and sense of the resolution seem to be judicial. Its essence, true character, and only practical effect, are to be found in the conduct which it charges upon the President, and in the judgment which it pronounces on that conduct. The resolution, therefore, though discussed and adopted by the Senate in its legislative capacity, is, in its office, and in all its characteristics, essentially judicial.

That the Senate possesses a high judicial power, and that instances may occur in which the President of the United States will be amenable to it, is undeniable. But under the provisions of the constitution, it would seem to be equally plain that neither the President nor any other officer can be rightfully subjected to the operation of the judicial power of the Senate, except in the cases and under the forms prescribed by the constitution.

The constitution declares that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors"—that the House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment"—that the Senate "shall have the sole power to try all impeachments"—that "when sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation"—that "when the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside"—that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present"—and that "judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States."

The resolution above quoted charges, in substance, that in certain proceedings relating to the public revenue, the President has usurped authority and power not conferred upon him by the constitution and laws, and that in doing so he violated both. Any such act constitutes a high crime—one of the highest, indeed, which the President can commit—a crime which justly exposes him to impeachment by the House of Representatives, and upon due conviction, to removal from office, and to the complete and immutable disfranchisement prescribed by the constitution.

The resolution, then, was in substance an impeachment of the President; and in its passage, amounts to a declaration, by a majority of the Senate, that he is guilty of an impeachable offence. As such, it is spread upon the Journals of the Senate—published to the nation and to the world—made part of our enduring archives—and incorporated in the history of the age. The punishment of removal from office and future disqualification, does not, it is true, follow this decision; nor would it have followed the like decision, if the regular forms of proceeding had been pursued, because the requisite number did not concur in the result. But the moral influence of a solemn declaration, by a majority of the Senate, that the accused is guilty of the offence charged upon him, has been as effectually secured, as if the like declaration had been made upon an impeachment expressed in the same terms. Indeed, a greater practical effect has been gained, because the votes given for the resolution, though not sufficient to authorize a judgment of guilty on an impeachment, were numerous enough to carry that resolution.

That the resolution does not expressly allege that the assumption of power and authority which it condemns, was intentional and corrupt, is no answer to the preceding view of its character and effect. The act thus condemned, necessarily implies volition and design in the individual to whom it is imputed; and being unlawful in its character, the legal conclusion is, that it was prompted by improper motives, and committed with an unlawful intent. The charge is not of a mistake in the exercise of supposed powers, but of the assumption of powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both; and nothing is suggested to excuse or palliate the turpitude of the act.

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

In the absence of any such excuse or palliation, there is only room for one inference, and that is, that the intent was unlawful and corrupt. Besides, the resolution not only contains no mitigating suggestion, but, on the contrary, it holds up the act complained of, as justly obnoxious to censure and reprobation; and thus as distinctly stamps it with impurity of motive, as if the strongest epithets had been used.

The President of the United States, therefore, has been, by a majority of his constitutional triers, accused and found guilty of an impeachable offence: but in no part of this proceeding have the directions of the constitution been observed.

The impeachment, instead of being preferred and prosecuted by the House of Representatives, originated in the Senate, and was prosecuted without the aid or concurrence of the other House. The oath or affirmation prescribed by the constitution, was not taken by the Senators—the Chief Justice did not preside—no notice of the charge was given to the accused—and no opportunity afforded him to respond to the accusation—to meet his accusers face to face—to cross-examine the witnesses—to procure counteracting testimony—or to be heard in his defence.

The safeguards and formalities which the constitution has connected with the power of impeachment, were doubtless supposed by the framers of that instrument, to be essential to the protection of the public servant, to the attainment of justice, and to the order, impartiality, and dignity of the procedure. These safeguards and formalities were not only practically disregarded, in the commencement and conduct of these proceedings, but in their result, I find myself convicted, by less than two-thirds of the members present, of an impeachable offence.

In vain may it be alleged in defence of this proceeding, that the form of the resolution is not that of an impeachment, or of a judgment thereupon; that the punishment prescribed in the constitution does not follow its adoption; or that in this case, no impeachment is to be expected from the House of Representatives. It is because it did not assume the form of an impeachment, that it is the more palpably repugnant to the constitution; for it is through that form only that the President is judicially responsible to the Senate; and though neither removal from office nor future disqualification ensues, yet it is not to be presumed that the framers of the constitution considered either or both of those results, as constituting the whole of the punishment they prescribed. The judgment of guilty by the highest tribunal in the Union; the stigma it would inflict on the offender, his family and fame; and the perpetual record on the Journal, handing down to future generations the story of his disgrace, were doubtless regarded by them as the bitterest portions, if not the very essence of that punishment. So far, therefore, as some of its most material parts are concerned, the passage, recording, and promulgation of the resolution, are an attempt to bring them on the President, in a manner unauthorized by the constitution. To shield him and other officers who are liable to impeachment, from consequences so momentous, except when really merited by official delinquencies, the constitution has most carefully guarded the whole process of impeachment. A majority of the House of Representatives must think the officer guilty, before he can be charged. Two-thirds of the Senate must pronounce him guilty, or he is deemed to be innocent. Forty-six Senators appear by the Journal to have been present when the vote on the resolution was taken. If, after all the solemnities of an impeachment, thirty of those Senators had voted that the President was guilty, yet would he have been acquitted; but by the mode of proceeding adopted in the present case, a lasting record of conviction has been entered up by the votes of twenty-six Senators, without an impeachment of trial; whilst the constitution expressly declares that to the entry of such a judgment, an accusation by the House of Representatives, a trial by the Senate, and a concurrence of two-thirds in the vote of guilty, shall be indispensable prerequisites.

Whether or not an impeachment was to be expected from the House of Representatives, was a point on which the Senate had no constitutional right to speculate, and in respect to which, even had it possessed the spirit of prophecy, its anticipations would have furnished no just grounds for this procedure. Admitting that there was reason to believe that a violation of the constitution and laws had been actually committed by the President, still it was the duty of the Senate, as his sole constitutional judges, to wait for an impeachment until the other House should think proper to prefer it. The members of the Senate could have no right to infer that no impeachment was intended. On the contrary, every legal and rational presumption on their part ought to have been, that if there was good reason to believe him guilty of an impeachable offence, the House of Representatives would perform its constitutional duty by arraigning the offender before the justice of his country. The contrary presumption would involve an application derogatory to the integrity and honor of the representatives of the people. But suppose the suspicion thus implied were actually entertained, and for good cause, how can it justify the assumption by the Senate of powers not conferred by the constitution?

It is only necessary to look at the condition in which the Senate and the President have been placed by this proceeding, to perceive its utter incompatibility with the provisions and the spirit of the constitution, and with the plainest dictates of humanity and justice.

If the House of Representatives shall be of opinion that there is just ground for the censure pronounced upon the President, then will it be the solemn duty of that House to prefer the proper accusation, and to cause him to be brought to trial by the constitutional tribunal. But in what condition would he find that tribunal? A majority of its members have already considered the case, and have not only formed, but expressed a deliberate judgment upon its merits. It is the policy of our benign systems of jurisprudence, to secure, in all criminal proceedings, and even in the most trivial litigations, a fair, unprejudiced, and impartial trial. And surely it cannot be less important that such a trial should be secured to the highest officer of the Government.

The constitution makes the House of Representatives the exclusive judges, in the first instance, of the question, whether the President has committed an impeachable offence. A majority of the Senate, whose interference with this preliminary question has, for the best of all reasons, been studiously excluded, anticipate the action of the House of Representatives, assume not only the function which belongs exclusively to that body, but convert themselves into accusers, witnesses, counsel, and judges, and prejudge the whole case—thus presenting the appalling spectacle, in a free State, of judges going through a labored preparation for an impartial hearing and decision, by a previous ex parte investigation and sentence against the supposed offender.

There is no more settled axiom in that government whence we derived the model of this part of our constitution, than that "the Lords cannot impeach any to themselves, nor join in the accusation, because they are judges." Independently of the general reasons on which this rule is founded, its propriety and importance are greatly increased by the nature of the impeaching power. The power of arraigning the high officers of government before a tribunal whose sentence may expel them from their seats and brand them as infamous, is eminently a popular remedy—a remedy designed to be employed for the protection of private right and public liberty, against the abuses of injustice and the encroachments of arbitrary power. But the framers of the constitution were also undoubtedly aware, that this formidable instrument had been, and might be abused; and that from its very nature, an impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, whatever may be its result, would in most cases be accompanied by so much of dishonor and reproach, solicitude and suffering, as to make the power of preferring it, one of the highest solemnity and importance. It was due to both these considerations, that the impeaching power should be lodged in the hands of those who, from the mode of their election and the tenure of their offices, would most accurately express the popular will, and at the same time be most directly and speedily amenable to the people. The theory of these wise and benignant intentions is, in the present case, effectually defeated by the proceedings of the Senate. The members of that body represent, not the people, but the States, and though they are undoubtedly responsible to the States, yet, from their extended term of service, the effect of that responsibility, during the whole period of that term, must very much depend upon their own impressions of its obligatory force. When a body, thus constituted, expresses, beforehand, its opinion in a particular case, and thus indirectly invites a prosecution, it not only assumes a power intended for wise reasons to be confined to others, but it shields the latter from that exclusive and personal responsibility under which it was intended to be exercised, and reverses the whole scheme of this part of the constitution.

Such would be some of the objections to this procedure, even if it were admitted that there is just ground for imputing to the President the offences charged in the resolution. But if, on the other hand, the House of Representatives shall be of opinion that there is no reason for charging them upon him, and shall therefore deem it improper to prefer an impeachment, then will the violation of privilege as it respects that House, of justice as it regards the President, and of the constitution as it relates to both, be only the more conspicuous and impressive.

The constitutional mode of procedure on an impeachment has not only been wholly disregarded, but some of the first principles of natural right and enlightened jurisprudence, have been violated in the very form of the resolution. It carefully abstains from averring in which of "the late proceedings in relation to the public revenue, the President has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws." It carefully abstains from specifying what laws or what parts of the constitution have been violated. Why was not the certainty of the offence—"the nature and cause of the accusation"—set out in the manner required by the constitution, before even the humblest individual, for the smallest crime, can be exposed to condemnation? Such a specification was due to the accused, that he might direct his defence to the real points of attack; to the people, that they might clearly understand in what particulars their institutions had been violated; and to the truth and certainty of our public annals. As the record now stands, whilst the resolution plainly charges upon the President at least one act of usurpation in "the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," and is so framed that those Senators who believed that one such act, and only one, had been committed, could assent to it, its language is yet broad enough to include several such acts; and so it may have been regarded by some of those who voted for it. But though the accusation is thus comprehensive in the measures it implies, there is no such certainty of time, place, or circumstance, as to exhibit the particular conclusion of fact or law which induced any one Senator to vote for it. And it may well have happened, that whilst one Senator believed that some particular act embraced in the resolution, was an arbitrary and unconstitutional assumption of power, others of the majority may have deemed that very act both constitutional and expedient, or if not expedient, yet still within the pale of the constitution. And thus a majority of the Senators may have been enabled to concur, in a vague and undefined accusation, that the President, in the course of "the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," had violated the constitution and laws; whilst, if a separate vote had been taken in respect to each particular act included within the general terms, the accusers of the President might, on any such vote, have been found in the minority.

Still further to exemplify this feature of the proceeding, it is important to be remarked, that the resolution, as originally offered to the Senate, specified, with adequate precision, certain acts of the President, which it denounced as a violation of the constitution and laws, and that it was not until the very close of the debate, and when, perhaps, it was apprehended that a majority might not sustain the specific accusation contained in it, that the resolution was so modified as to assume its present form. A more striking illustration of the soundness and necessity of the rules which forbid vague and indefinite generalities, and require a reasonable certainty in all judicial allegations, and a more glaring instance of the violation of those rules, has seldom been exhibited.

In this view of the resolution, it must certainly be regarded, not as a vindication of any particular provision of the law or the constitution, but simply as an official rebuke or condemnatory sentence, too general and indefinite to be easily repelled, but yet sufficiently precise to bring into discredit the conduct and motives of the Executive. But whatever it may have been intended to accomplish, it is obvious that the vague, general, and abstract form of the resolution, is in perfect keeping with those other departures from first principles and settled improvements in jurisprudence, so properly the boast of free countries in modern times. And it is not too much to say of the whole of these proceedings, that, if they shall be approved and sustained by an intelligent people, then will that great contest with arbitrary power, which had established in statutes, in bills of rights, in sacred charters, and in constitutions of government, the right of every citizen to a notice before trial, to a hearing before conviction, and to an impartial tribunal for deciding on the charge, have been waged in vain.

If the resolution had been left in its original form, it is not to be presumed that it could ever have received the assent of a majority of the Senate, for the acts therein specified as violations of the constitution and laws were clearly within the limits of the Executive authority. They are, the "dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done." But as no other specification has been substituted, and as these were the "Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," principally referred to in the course of the discussion, they will doubtless be generally regarded as the acts intended to be denounced as "an assumption of authority and power not conferred by the constitution or laws, but in derogation of both." It is, therefore, due to the occasion that a condensed summary of the views of the Executive in respect to them, should be here exhibited.

By the constitution, "the executive power is vested in a President of the United States." Among the duties imposed upon him, and which he is sworn to perform, is that of "taking care that the laws be faithfully executed." Being thus made responsible for the entire action of the executive department, it was but reasonable that the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws—a power in its nature executive—should remain in his hands. It is, therefore, not only his right, but the constitution makes it his duty, to "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint," all "officers of the United States whose appointments are not in the constitution otherwise provided for," with a proviso that the appointment of inferior officers may be vested in the President alone, in the courts of justice, or in the heads of departments.

The executive power vested in the Senate, is neither that of "nominating" nor "appointing." It is merely a check upon the Executive power of appointment. If individuals proposed for appointment by the President, are by them deemed incompetent or unworthy, they may withhold their consent, and the appointment cannot be made. They check the action of the Executive, but cannot, in relation to those very subjects, act themselves, nor direct him. Selections are still made by the President, and the negative given to the Senate, without diminishing his responsibility, furnishes an additional guarantee to the country that the subordinate executive, as well as the judicial offices, shall be filled with worthy and competent men.

The whole executive power being vested in the President, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence, that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties, and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts. In strict accordance with this principle, the power of removal, which, like that of appointment, is an original executive power, is left unchecked by the constitution in relation to all executive officers, for whose conduct the President is responsible, while it is taken from him in relation to judicial officers, for whose acts he is not responsible. In the Government from which many of the fundamental principles of our system are derived, the head of the executive department originally had power to appoint and remove at will all officers, executive and judicial. It was to take the judges out of this general power of removal, and thus make them independent of the Executive, that the tenure of their offices was changed to good behavior. Nor is it conceivable, why they are placed, in our constitution, upon a tenure different from that of all other officers appointed by the Executive, unless it be for the same purpose.

But if there were any just ground for doubt on the face of the constitution, whether all executive officers are removable at the will of the President, it is obviated by the contemporaneous construction of the instrument, and the uniform practice under it.

The power of removal was a topic of solemn debate in the Congress of 1789, while organizing the administrative departments of the Government, and it was finally decided, that the President derived from the constitution the power of removal, so far as it regards that department for whose acts he is responsible. Although the debate covered the whole ground, embracing the Treasury as well as all the other executive departments, it arose on a motion to strike out of the bill to establish a department of Foreign Affairs, since called the Department of State, a clause declaring the Secretary "to be removable from office by the President of the United States." After that motion had been decided in the negative, it was perceived that these words did not convey the sense of the House of Representatives, in relation to the true source of the power of removal. With the avowed object of preventing any future inference, that this power was exercised by the President in virtue of a grant from Congress, when in fact that body considered it as derived from the constitution, the words which had been the subject of debate were struck out, and in lieu thereof a clause was inserted in a provision concerning the chief clerk of the department, which declared that "whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," the chief clerk should, during such vacancy, have charge of the papers of the office. This change having been made for the express purpose of declaring the sense of Congress, that the President derived the power of removal from the constitution, the act as it passed has always been considered as a full expression of the sense of the legislature on this important part of the American constitution.

Here, then, we have the concurrent authority of President Washington, of the Senate, and the House of Representatives, numbers of whom had taken an active part in the convention which framed the constitution, and in the State conventions which adopted it, that the President derived an unqualified power of removal from that instrument itself, which is "beyond the reach of legislative authority." Upon this principle the Government has now been steadily administered for about forty-five years, during which there have been numerous removals made by the President or by his direction, embracing every grade of executive officers, from the heads of departments to the messengers of bureaus.

The Treasury Department, in the discussions of 1789, was considered on the same footing as the other executive departments, and in the act establishing it, the precise words were incorporated, indicative of the sense of Congress that the President derives his power to remove the Secretary, from the constitution, which appear in the act establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs. An assistant Secretary of the Treasury was created, and it was provided that he should take charge of the books and papers of the department, "whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States." The Secretary of the Treasury being appointed by the President, and being considered as constitutionally removable by him, it appears never to have occurred to any one in the Congress of 1789, or since, until very recently, that he was other than an executive officer, the mere instrument of the Chief Magistrate in the execution of the laws, subject, like all other heads of departments, to his supervision and control. No such idea as an officer of the Congress can be found in the constitution, or appears to have suggested itself to those who organized the Government. There are officers of each House, the appointment of which is authorized by the constitution, but all officers referred to in that instrument as coming within the appointing power of the President, whether established thereby or created by law, are "officers of the United States." No joint power of appointment is given to the two Houses of Congress, nor is their any accountability to them as one body; but as soon as any office is created by law, of whatever name or character, the appointment of the person or persons to fill it, devolves by the constitution upon the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless it be an inferior office, and the appointment be vested by the law itself "in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

But at the time of the organization of the Treasury Department, an incident occurred which distinctly evinces the unanimous concurrence of the first Congress in the principle that the Treasury Department is wholly executive in its character and responsibilities. A motion was made to strike out the provision of the bill making it the duty of the Secretary "to digest and report plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of the public credit," on the ground that it would give the executive department of the Government too much influence and power in Congress. The motion was not opposed on the ground, that the Secretary was the officer of Congress and responsible to that body, which would have been conclusive, if admitted, but on other grounds, which conceded his executive character throughout. The whole discussion evinces a unanimous concurrence in the principle, that the Secretary of the Treasury is wholly an executive officer, and the struggle of the minority was to restrict his power as such. From that time down to the present, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer, Register, Comptrollers, Auditors, and Clerks, who fill the offices of that department, have, in the practice of the Government, been considered and treated as on the same footing with corresponding grades of officers in all the other executive departments.

The custody of the public property, under such regulations as may be prescribed by legislative authority, has always been considered an appropriate function of the executive department, in this and all other Governments. In accordance with this principle, every species of property belonging to the United States, (excepting that which is in the use of the several co-ordinate departments of the Government, as means to aid them in performing their appropriate functions,) is in charge of officers appointed by the President, whether it be lands, or buildings, or merchandise, or provisions, or clothing, or arms and munitions of war. The superintendents and keepers of the whole are appointed by the President, responsible to him, and removable at his will.

Public money is but a species of public property. It cannot be raised by taxation or custom, nor brought into the Treasury in any other way, except by law; but whenever or howsoever obtained, its custody always has been, and always must be, unless the constitution be changed, intrusted to the executive department. No officer can be created by Congress for the purpose of taking charge of it, whose appointment would not, by the constitution, at once devolve on the President, and who would not be responsible to him for the faithful performance of his duties. The legislative power may undoubtedly bind him and the President, by any law they may think proper to enact; they may prescribe in what place particular portions of the public money shall be kept, and for what reason it shall be removed; as they may direct that supplies for the army or navy shall be kept in particular stores; and it will be the duty of the President to see that the law is faithfully executed—yet will the custody remain in the executive department of the Government. Were the Congress to assume, with or without a legislative act, the power of appointing officers independently of the President, to take the charge and custody of the public property contained in the military and naval arsenals, magazines, and storehouses, it is believed that such an act would be regarded by all as a palpable usurpation of executive power, subversive of the form as well as the fundamental principles of our Government. But where is the difference in principle, whether the public property be in the form of arms, munitions of war and supplies, or in gold and silver or bank notes? None can be perceived—none is believed to exist. Congress cannot, therefore, take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, and a subversion of the first principles of the constitution.

The Congress of the United States have never passed an act imperatively directing that the public moneys shall be kept in any particular place or places. From the origin of the Government to the year 1816, the statute-book was wholly silent on the subject. In 1789 a Treasurer was created, subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury, and through him to the President. He was required to give bond safely to keep and faithfully to disburse the public moneys, without any direction as to the manner or places in which they should be kept. By reference to the practice of the Government, it is found, that from its first organization, the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the supervision of the President, designated the places in which the public moneys should be kept, and specially directed all transfers from place to place. This practice was continued, with the silent acquiescence of Congress, from 1789 down to 1816; and although many banks were selected and discharged, and although a portion of the moneys was first placed in the State banks, and then in the former Bank of the United States, and upon the dissolution of that, was again transferred to the State banks, no legislation was thought necessary by Congress, and all the operations were originated and perfected by executive authority. The Secretary of the Treasury, responsible to the President, and with his approbation, made contracts and arrangements in relation to the whole subject-matter, which was thus entirely committed to the direction of the President, under his responsibilities to the American people, and to those who were authorized to impeach and punish him for any breach of this important trust.

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

The act of 1816, establishing the Bank of the United States, directed the deposits of public money to be made in that bank and its branches, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, "unless the Secretary of the Treasury should otherwise order and direct," in which event, he was required to give his reasons to Congress. This was but a continuation of his pre-existing powers as the head of an executive department, to direct where the deposits should be made, with the superadded obligation of giving his reasons to Congress for making them elsewhere than in the Bank of the United States and its branches. It is not to be considered that this provision in any degree altered the relation between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, as the responsible head of the executive department, or released the latter from his constitutional obligation to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." On the contrary, it increased his responsibilities, by adding another to the long list of laws which it was his duty to carry into effect.

It would be an extraordinary result, if, because the person charged by law with a public duty is one of the Secretaries, it were less the duty of the President to see that law faithfully executed than other laws enjoining duties upon subordinate officers or private citizens. If there be any difference, it would seem that the obligation is the stronger in relation to the former, because the neglect is in his presence and the remedy at hand.

It cannot be doubted that it was the legal duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to order and direct the deposits of the public money to be made elsewhere than in the Bank of the United States, whenever sufficient reasons existed for making the change. If, in such a case, he neglected or refused to act, he would neglect or refuse to execute the law. What would then be the sworn duty of the President? Could he say that the constitution did not bind him to see the law faithfully executed, because it was one of his Secretaries, and not himself, upon whom the service was specially imposed? Might he not be asked whether there was any such limitation to his obligations prescribed in the constitution?—whether he is not equally bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, whether they impose duties on the highest officer of State, or the lowest subordinate in any of the departments?

Might he not be told, that it was for the sole purpose of causing all executive officers, from the highest to the lowest, faithfully to perform the services required of them by law—that the people of the United States have made him their Chief Magistrate, and the constitution has clothed him with the entire executive power of this Government? The principles implied in these questions appear too plain to need elucidation.

But here, also, we have a contemporaneous construction of the act, which shows that it was not understood as in any way changing the relations between the President and Secretary of the Treasury, or as placing the latter out of Executive control, even in relation to the deposits of the public money. Nor on this point are we left to any equivocal testimony. The documents of the Treasury Department show that the Secretary of the Treasury did apply to the President, and obtained his approbation and sanction to the original transfer of the public deposits to the present Bank of the United States, and did carry the measure into effect in obedience to his decision. They also show that transfers of the public deposits from the branches of the Bank of the United States to State banks, at Chillicothe, Cincinnati, and Louisville, in 1819, were made with the approbation of the President, and by his authority. They show, that upon all important questions appertaining to his department, whether they related to the public deposits or other matters, it was the constant practice of the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain for his acts the approval and sanction of the President. These acts, and the principles on which they were founded, were known to all the departments of the Government, to Congress, and the country; and, until very recently, appear never to have been called in question.

Thus was it settled by the constitution, the laws, and the whole practice of the Government, that the entire executive power is vested in the President of the United States; that, as incident to that power, the right of appointing and removing those officers who are to aid him in the execution of the laws, with such restrictions only as the constitution prescribes, is vested in the President; that the Secretary of the Treasury is one of those officers; that the custody of the public property and money is an executive function, which, in relation to the money, has always been exercised through the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates; that in the performance of these duties, he is subject to the supervision and control of the President, and in all important measures having relation to them consults the Chief Magistrate, and obtains his approval and sanction; that the law establishing the bank did not, as it could not, change the relation between the President and the Secretary—did not release the former from his obligation to see the law faithfully executed, nor the latter from the President's supervision and control; that afterwards, and before, the Secretary did in fact consult and obtain the sanction of the President, to transfers and removals of the public deposits; and that all departments of the Government, and the nation itself, approved or acquiesced in these acts and principles, as in strict conformity with our constitution and laws.

During the last year, the approaching termination, according to the provisions of its charter, and the solemn decision of the American people, of the Bank of the United States, made it expedient, and its exposed abuses and corruptions made it, in my opinion, the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, to place the moneys of the United States in other depositories. The Secretary did not concur in that opinion, and declined giving the necessary order and direction. So glaring were the abuses and corruptions of the bank, so evident its fixed purpose to persevere in them, and so palpable its design, by its money and power, to control the government, and change its character, that I deemed it the imperative duty of the executive authority, by the exertion of every power confided to it by the constitution and laws, to check its career, and lessen its ability to do mischief, even in the painful alternative of dismissing the head of one of the departments. At the time the removal was made, other causes sufficient to justify it existed; but, if they had not, the Secretary would have been dismissed for this cause only.

His place I supplied by one whose opinions were well known to me, and whose frank expressions of them, in another situation, and whose generous sacrifices of interest and feeling, when unexpectedly called to the station he now occupies, ought forever to have shielded his motives from suspicion, and his character from reproach. In accordance with the opinions long before expressed by him, he proceeded, with my sanction, to make arrangements for depositing the moneys of the United States in other safe institutions.

The resolution of the Senate, as originally framed, and as passed, if it refers to these acts, pre-supposes a right in that body to interfere with this exercise of executive power. If the principle be once admitted, it is not difficult to perceive where it may end. If by a mere denunciation like this resolution, the President should ever be induced to act, in a matter of official duty, contrary to the honest convictions of his own mind, in compliance with the wishes of the Senate, the constitutional independence of the executive department would be as effectually destroyed, and its power as effectually transferred to the Senate, as if that end had been accomplished by an amendment of the constitution. But, if the Senate have a right to interfere with the executive powers, they have also the right to make that interference effective; and if the assertion of the power implied in the resolution be silently acquiesced in, we may reasonably apprehend that it will be followed, at some future day, by an attempt at actual enforcement. The Senate may refuse, except on the condition that he will surrender his opinions to theirs and obey their will, to perform their own constitutional functions; to pass the necessary laws; to sanction appropriations proposed by the House of Representatives; and to confirm proper nominations made by the President. It has already been maintained (and it is not conceivable that the resolution of the Senate can be based on any other principle) that the Secretary of the Treasury is the officer of Congress, and independent of the President; that the President has no right to control him, and consequently none to remove him. With the same propriety, and on similar grounds, may the Secretary of State, the Secretaries of War and the Navy, and the Postmaster General, each in succession, be declared independent of the President, the subordinates of Congress, and removable only with the concurrence of the Senate. Followed to its consequences this principle will be found effectually to destroy one co-ordinate department of the Government, to concentrate in the hands of the Senate the whole executive power, and to leave the President as powerless as he would be useless—the shadow of authority, after the substance had departed.

The time and the occasion which have called forth the resolution of the Senate, seem to impose upon me an additional obligation not to pass it over in silence. Nearly forty-five years had the President exercised, without a question as to his rightful authority, those powers for the recent assumption of which he is now denounced. The vicissitudes of peace and war had attended our Government; violent parties, watchful to take advantage of any seeming usurpation on the part of the Executive, had distracted our counsels; frequent removals, or forced resignations, in every sense tantamount to removals, had been made of the Secretary and other officers of the Treasury; and yet in no one instance is it known, that any man, whether patriot or partisan, had raised his voice against it as a violation of the constitution. The expediency and justice of such changes, in reference to public officers of all grades, have frequently been the topics of discussion; but the constitutional right of the President to appoint, control, and remove the head of the Treasury, as well as all other departments, seems to have been universally conceded. And what is the occasion upon which other principles have been first officially asserted. The Bank of the United States, a great moneyed monopoly, had attempted to obtain a renewal of its charter, by controlling the elections of the people and the action of the Government. The use of its corporate funds and power in that attempt was fully disclosed; and it made known to the President that the corporation was putting in train the same course of measures, with the view of making another vigorous effort, through an interference in the elections of the people, to control public opinion and force the Government to yield to its demands. This, with its corruption of the press, its violation of its charter, its exclusion of the Government directors from its proceedings, its neglect of duty, and arrogant pretensions, made it, in the opinion of the President, incompatible with the public interest and the safety of our institutions, that it should be longer employed as the fiscal agent of the Treasury. A Secretary of the Treasury, appointed in the recess of the Senate, who had not been confirmed by that body and whom the President might or might not at his pleasure nominate to them, refused to do what his superior in the executive department considered the most imperative of his duties, and became in fact, however innocent his motives, the protector of the bank. And on this occasion it is discovered for the first time, that those who framed the constitution misunderstood it; that the first Congress and all its successors have been under a delusion; that the practice of near forty-five years is but a continued usurpation; that the Secretary of the Treasury is not responsible to the President; and that to remove him is a violation of the constitution and laws, for which the President deserves to stand forever dishonored on the Journals of the Senate.

There are also some other circumstances connected with the discussion and passage of the resolution, to which I feel it to be, not only my right, but my duty, to refer. It appears by the Journal of the Senate, that among the twenty-six Senators who voted for the resolution on its final passage, and who had supported it in debate, in its original form, were one of the Senators from the State of Maine, the two Senators from New Jersey, and one of the Senators from Ohio. It also appears by the same Journal, and by the files of the Senate, that the legislatures of these States had severally expressed their opinions in respect to the Executive proceedings drawn in question before the Senate.

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

The two branches of the legislature of the State of Maine, on the 25th of January, 1834, passed a preamble and series of resolutions in the following words:

[Here follows extracts from the legislative journals of the three States referred to, approving the President's conduct in removing the deposits, and instructing their Senators to sustain that act of the President.]

It is thus seen that four Senators have declared, by their votes, that the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, had been guilty of the impeachable offence of "assuming upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," whilst the legislatures of their respective States had deliberately approved those very proceedings, as consistent with the constitution, and demanded by the public good. If these four votes had been given in accordance with the sentiments of the legislatures, as above expressed, there would have been but twenty-two votes out of forty-six for censuring the President, and the unprecedented record of his conviction could not have been placed upon the Journals of the Senate.

In thus referring to the resolutions and instructions of the State legislatures, I disclaim and repudiate all authority or design to interfere with the responsibility due from members of the Senate to their own consciences, their constituents, and their country. The facts now stated belong to the history of these proceedings, and are important to the just development of the principles and interests involved in them, as well as to the proper vindication of the executive department; and with that view, and that view only, are they here made the topic of remark.

The dangerous tendency of the doctrine which denies to the President the power of supervising, directing, and removing the Secretary of the Treasury, in like manner with the other executive officers, would soon be manifest in practice, were the doctrine to be established. The President is the direct representative of the American people, but the Secretaries are not. If the Secretary of the Treasury be independent of the President in the execution of the laws, then is there no direct responsibility to the people in that important branch of this Government to which is committed the care of the national finances. And it is in the power of the Bank of the United States, or any other corporation, body of men, or individuals, if a Secretary shall be found to accord with them in opinion, or can be induced in practice to promote their views, to control, through him, the whole action of the Government, (so far as it is exercised by his department,) in defiance of the Chief Magistrate elected by the people and responsible to them.

But the evil tendency of the particular doctrine adverted to, though sufficiently serious, would be as nothing, in comparison with the pernicious consequences which would inevitably flow from the approbation and allowance by the people, and the practice by the Senate, of the unconstitutional power of arraigning and censuring the official conduct of the Executive, in the manner recently pursued. Such proceedings are eminently calculated to unsettle the foundations of the Government, to disturb the harmonious action of its different departments, and to break down the checks and balances by which the wisdom of its framers sought to ensure its stability and usefulness.

The honest differences of opinion which occasionally exist between the Senate and the President, in regard to matters in which both are obliged to participate, are sufficiently embarrassing. But, if the course recently adopted by the Senate shall hereafter be frequently pursued, it is not only obvious that the harmony of the relations between the President and the Senate will be destroyed, but that other and graver effects will ultimately ensue. If the censures of the Senate be submitted to by the President, the confidence of the people in his ability and virtue, and the character and usefulness of his administration will soon be at an end, and the real power of the Government will fall into the hands of a body holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people, and not to them directly responsible. If, on the other hand, the illegal censures of the Senate should be resisted by the President, collisions and angry controversies might ensue, discreditable in their progress, and, in the end, compelling the people to adopt the conclusion, either that their Chief Magistrate was unworthy of their respect, or that the Senate was chargeable with calumny and injustice. Either of these results would impair public confidence in the perfection of the system, and lead to serious alterations of its frame work, or to the practical abandonment of some of its provisions.

The influence of such proceedings on the other departments of the Government, and more especially on the States, could not fail to be extensively pernicious. When the judges, in the last resort of official misconduct, themselves overleap the bounds of their authority, as prescribed by the constitution, what general disregard of its provisions might not their example be expected to produce? And who does not perceive that such contempt of the Federal constitution, by one of its most important departments, would hold out the strongest temptation to resistance on the part of the State sovereignties, whenever they shall suppose their just rights to have been invaded? Thus, all the independent departments of the Government, and the States which compose our confederated Union, instead of attending to their appropriate duties, and leaving those who may offend to be reclaimed or punished in the manner pointed out in the constitution, would fall to mutual crimination and recrimination, and give to the people confusion and anarchy, instead of order and law, until at length some form of aristocratic power would be established on the ruins of the constitution, or the States be broken into separate communities.

Far be it from me to charge, or to insinuate, that the present Senate of the United States intend, in the most distant way, to encourage such a result. It is not of their motives or designs, but only of the tendency of their acts, that it is my duty to speak. It is, if possible, to make Senators themselves sensible of the danger which lurks under the precedent set in their resolution, and, at any rate, to perform my duty as the responsible head of one of the co-equal departments of the Government, that I have been compelled to point out the consequences to which the discussion and passage of the resolution may lead, if the tendency of the measure be not checked in its inception.

It is due to the high trust with which I have been charged; to those who may be called to succeed me in it; to the representatives of the people, whose constitutional prerogative has been unlawfully assumed; to the people and to the States; and to the constitution they have established, that I should not permit its provisions to be broken down by such an attack on the executive department, without at least some effort "to preserve, protect, and defend" them. With this view, and for the reasons which have been stated, I do hereby SOLEMNLY PROTEST against the aforementioned proceedings of the Senate, as unauthorized by the constitution; contrary to its spirit and to several of its express provisions; subversive of that distribution of the powers of Government which it has ordained and established; destructive of the checks and safeguards by which those powers were intended, on the one hand, to be controlled, and, on the other, to be protected, and calculated, by their immediate and collateral effects, by their character and tendency, to concentrate in the hands of a body not directly amenable to the people, a degree of influence and power dangerous to their liberties, and fatal to the constitution of their choice.

The resolution of the Senate contains an imputation upon my private as well as upon my public character; and as it must stand forever on my Journals, I cannot close this substitute for that defence which I have not been allowed to present in the ordinary form, without remarking, that I have lived in vain, if it be necessary to enter into a formal vindication of my character and purposes from such an imputation. In vain do I bear upon my person, enduring memorials of that contest in which American liberty was purchased; in vain have I since perilled property, fame, and life, in defence of the rights and privileges so dearly bought; in vain am I now, without a personal aspiration, or the hope of individual advantage, encountering responsibilities and dangers, from which, by mere inactivity in relation to a single point, I might have been exempt—if any serious doubts can be entertained as to the purity of my purposes and motives. If I had been ambitious, I should have sought an alliance with that powerful institution, which even now aspires to no divided empire. If I had been venal, I should have sold myself to its designs. Had I preferred personal comfort and official ease to the performance of my arduous duty, I should have ceased to molest it. In the history of conquerors and usurpers, never, in the fire of youth, nor in the vigor of manhood, could I find an attraction to lure me from the path of duty; and now, I shall scarcely find an inducement to commence the career of ambition, when gray hairs and a decaying frame, instead of inviting to toil and battle, call me to the contemplation of other worlds, where conquerors cease to be honored, and usurpers expiate their crimes. The only ambition I can feel, is to acquit myself to Him to whom I must soon render an account of my stewardship, to serve my fellow-men, and live respected and honored in the history of my country. No; the ambition which leads me on, is an anxious desire and a fixed determination, to return to the people, unimpaired, the sacred trust they have confided to my charge—to heal the wounds of the constitution and preserve it from further violation; to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid Government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that they will find happiness, or their liberties protection, but in a plain system, void of pomp—protecting all, and granting favors to none—dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt, save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce. It is such a government that the genius of our people requires—such a one only under which our States may remain for ages to come, united, prosperous, and free. If the Almighty being who has hitherto sustained and protected me, will but vouchsafe to make my feeble powers instrumental to such a result, I shall anticipate with pleasure the place to be assigned me in the history of my country, and die contented with the belief, that I have contributed in some small degree, to increase the value and prolong the duration of American liberty.

To the end that the resolution of the Senate may not be hereafter drawn into precedent, with the authority of silent acquiescence on the part of the executive department; and to the end, also, that my motives and views in the executive proceeding denounced in that resolution may be known to my fellow-citizens, to the world, and to all posterity, I respectfully request that this message and protest may be entered at length on the Journals of the Senate.

ANDREW JACKSON.

April 15th, 1834.

The Message having been read—

Mr. POINDEXTER said: I do not rise, Mr. President, to discuss at this time the various topics which are touched in the very extraordinary paper which has been just read to the Senate; nor, indeed, will I give utterance to those feelings of indignation which such a paper, coming from such a source, is so well calculated to excite in the bosom of every honorable member of this body, and of every patriotic citizen in the country. Leaving these matters for future discussion on a more suitable occasion, my purpose is at present to enter my solemn protest against the reception of this paper, and to submit a motion that it be not received. Sir, I should be disposed to go as far as any honorable Senator on this floor in paying due respect to every executive communication to the Senate, coming within the constitutional range of executive power. But when the Chief Magistrate shall think fit to depart from his constitutional sphere, and, under color of his official duties, attempt to make this body the conduit of his popular appeals to the people, fomenting, I will not say calumnies, but the most unfounded charges against the body through which he proposes to promulgate his appeal, I, for one, feel bound to resist him in such a course. Referring to the resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) the President says that it is "both novel and unprecedented." If it be so, I should be glad to know what appellation ought to be given to this extraordinary paper? Has it any parallel in the past political history of the country? Sir, I venture the declaration, that there is not on record any act of the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate bearing the slightest resemblance to this outrage on the dignity of the Senate, and the constitutional functions of the Executive Department of the Government. It may well be characterized as "both novel and unprecedented." No such paper was ever presented to either House of Congress, none such is to be found on the journals of our proceedings, as the one sent to us this morning, under the guise of official authority, from the foundation of the Government down to the present moment. Sir, I will not dignify this paper by considering it in the light of an executive message; it is no such thing. I regard it simply as a paper with the signature of Andrew Jackson, and, should the Senate refuse to receive it, it will not be the first paper with the same signature which has been refused a hearing in this body, on the ground of the abusive and vituperative language which it contained. It will be recollected, that a protest similar in its character, couched in terms grossly disrespectful to the Senate, was presented, somewhere about the year 1819, from the same individual, and such was its exceptionable character, that his own friends became ashamed of it. It was objected to, rejected, and sent back for modification, so as to render it respectful to the body to which it was presented. The offensive passages were stricken out, and, thus modified, it was presented and received at the next session of Congress. This effort to denounce and overawe the deliberations of the Senate may properly be regarded as capping the climax of that systematic plan of operations which for several years past has been in progress, designed to bring this body into disrepute among the people, and thereby remove the only existing barrier to the arbitrary encroachments and usurpations of executive power. Destroy public confidence in the Senate, which now stands, thank God, unmoved, between the Chief Magistrate and the people, and tyranny, in its worst forms, would very soon overshadow the land, and rule with an iron hand the destinies of the American people. The Senate, by its peculiar organization, is well calculated to preserve and perpetuate the great fundamental principles of public liberty to the latest posterity. Removed from popular impulses which sometimes arise in the convulsions incident to freedom of opinion, and of discussions of great political questions, it may look with calmness on the misguided multitude, misled by some popular demagogue, and thereby save the State from the deleterious consequences of errors which are the inevitable result of passion or precipitation. It is an integral part of the executive power, and, while it remains firm in its devotion to the constitution and the laws, uncorrupted by the temptations of office and emolument, no Chief Magistrate, whatever may be his reckless ambition, can successfully move beyond the bounds of his legitimate powers, and ride over the liberties of the people. Hence the untiring and anxious solicitude so often manifested to bring this body, thus constituted, into disgrace among the people. If there existed at this moment no such conservative body as the Senate, power would march onward to the climax of despotism. The republic might indeed exist, nominally, but in practice we should be bound to the car of some imperial dictator.

There does not appear to be a disposition in the House at the other end of this building, to arrest the inroads of arbitrary power; there the edicts of the Executive are registered, and his acts are defended by the force of party discipline, regardless of their injurious effects on the great interests of the country—and I repeat the question, What would be the condition of the country but for the salutary intervention of that Senate which has become the object of Executive vengeance, and which he now seeks to destroy by denunciations and appeals to the sympathies of the people, founded on his past services and personal popularity? Sir, is there a single power granted in the constitution which the President has not assumed and exercised? I know of none, except that he has not, as yet, followed the example of one of the kings of England, and taken his seat among the judges, to control their judicial decisions. This seems to be the only power which the President has not grasped, to complete the overthrow of all the other departments of the Government. By the frequent and unlimited exercise of the veto power, he has concentrated in himself the entire legislative authority of the country. We may, it is true, overrule his veto, by a majority of two-thirds in both Houses of Congress; but who is there among us, with the Blue Book in his hand, exhibiting the immense patronage of the Chief Magistrate, combined with the weight of his personal influence, that does not see and feel the impossibility of obtaining a union of opinion of two-thirds of Congress against any measure which has the sanction of the President? Such a triumph never has and never will occur in the legislative history of the country. He has declared his intention of applying this tremendous veto power to every bill which does not meet his approbation; or in other words, he will apply it to any bill against which he would record his vote as a member of either House of Congress. What, then, becomes of the legislative power of Congress? We are reduced to the condition of mere drudges, and the only duty which we can perform, is to prepare bills, discuss and amend them, and adapt them, as far as we can, to the public good, and, after passing them, they must be sent to the imperial head, and he will tell us whether they shall be enacted into laws or not. He might as well dispense with the legislature altogether, and call in the aid of the judges of the Supreme Court and the Attorney-General to prepare such bills as may suit his views, in technical language, and then issue his proclamation declaring that such and such laws had been incorporated in the statute book. Under the free use of the veto power, now for the first time introduced into practice by the President, the legislative power of the Union has dwindled into a mere mockery; the power, it is true, is qualified in the constitution, and may be controlled by two-thirds of Congress, but, in practice, it amounts to an absolute veto. He has the power of appointment and removal from office, and thereby becomes the fountain of honor, one of the high attributes of the British monarch, from whose dominion we had rescued ourselves by the war of the revolution, in asserting and maintaining the liberty and independence of these States; he is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and, by an assumption of power not delegated in the constitution and the laws, he has effaced the broad line, wisely drawn between the power which wields the physical force of the country and the National Treasury, for the obvious reason that these powers, separated, can never be dangerous to liberty, while a combination of them, in the same hand, is the very definition of military despotism. Thus the Chief Magistrate arrogates to himself, in the last resort, the legislative authority of the nation; he is placed by the constitution at the head of the military forces and the militia of the several States, when called into actual service; he is the fountain of honor, and may distribute offices and rewards at his own good will and pleasure; he has seized the public purse, by indirection, which is placed by the constitution in the hands of the representatives of the people of the States, and, I ask, what power remains unappropriated to the executive will, which is worth speaking of, or worth contending for?

Expunging Resolution—Notice of intended Motions to Expunge from the Journals the Sentence of Condemnation against President Jackson.

Mr. BENTON said that the public mind was now to be occupied with a question of the very first moment and importance, and identical in all its features with the great question growing out of the famous resolutions of the English House of Commons in the case of the Middlesex election in the year 1768, and which engrossed the attention of the British empire for fourteen years before it was settled. That question was one in which the House of Commons was judged and condemned, for adopting a resolution which was held by the subjects of the British crown to be a violation of their constitution, and a subversion of the rights of Englishmen: the question now before the Senate, and which will go before the American people, grows out of a resolution in which he (Mr. B.) believed that the constitution had been violated—the privileges of the House of Representatives invaded—and the rights of an American citizen, in the person of the President, subverted. The resolution of the House of Commons, after fourteen years of annual motions, was expunged from the Journal of the House; and he pledged himself to the American people to commence a similar series of motions with respect to this resolution of the Senate. He had made up his mind to do so without consultation with any human being, and without deigning to calculate the chances or the time of success. He rested under the firm conviction that the resolution of the Senate, which had drawn from the President the calm, temperate, and dignified protest, which had been read at the table, was a resolution which ought to be expunged from the Journal of the Senate; and if any thing was necessary to stimulate his sense of duty in making a motion to that effect, and in encouraging others after he was gone, in following up that motion to success, it would be found in the history and termination of the similar motion which was made in the English House of Commons to which he had referred. That motion was renewed for fourteen years—from 1768 to 1783—before it was successful. For the first seven years, the lofty and indignant majority did not condescend to reply to the motion. They sunk it under a dead vote as often as presented. The second seven years they replied; and at the end of the term, and on the assembling of a new Parliament, the veteran motion was carried by more than two to one; and the gratifying spectacle was beheld of a public expurgation, in the face of the assembled Commons of England, of the obnoxious resolution from the Journal of the House. The elections in England were septennial, and it took two terms of seven years, or two general elections, to bring the sense of the kingdom to bear upon their representatives. The elections of the Senate were sexennial, with intervalary exits and entrances, and it might take a less, or a longer period, he would not presume to say which, to bring the sense of the American people to bear upon an act of the American Senate. Of that, he would make no calculation; but the final success of the motion in the English House of Commons, after fourteen years' perseverance, was a sufficient encouragement for him to begin, and doubtless would encourage others to continue, until the good work should be crowned with success, and the only atonement made, which it was in the Senate's power to make, to the violated majesty of the constitution, the invaded privileges of the House of Representatives, and the subverted rights of an American citizen.

In bringing this great question before the American people, Mr. B. should consider himself as addressing the calm intelligence of an enlightened community. He believed the body of the American people to be the most enlightened community upon earth; and, without the least disparagement to the present Senate, he must be permitted to believe that many such Senates might be drawn from the ranks of the people, and still leave no dearth of intelligence behind. To such a community—in an appeal, on a great question of constitutional law, to the understandings of such a people—declamation, passion, epithets, opprobrious language, would stand for nothing. They would float, harmless and unheeded, through the empty air, and strike in vain upon the ear of a sober and dispassionate tribunal. Indignation, real or affected; wrath, however hot; fury, however enraged; asseverations, however violent; denunciations, however furious, will avail nothing. Facts—inexorable facts—are all that will be attended to; reason, calm, and self-possessed, is all that will be listened to. An intelligent tribunal will exact the respect of an address to their understandings; and he that wishes to be heard in this great question, or being heard, would wish to be heeded, will have occasion to be clear and correct in his facts; close and perspicuous in his application of law; fair and candid in his conclusions and inferences, temperate and decorous in his language; and scrupulously free from every taint of vengeance and malice. Solemnly impressed with the truth of all these convictions, it was the intention of himself, (Mr. B.,) whatever the example or the provocation might be—never to forget his place, his subject, his audience, and his object—never to forget that he was speaking in the American Senate, on a question of violated constitution and outraged individual right, to an audience comprehending the whole body of the American people, and for the purpose of obtaining a righteous decision from the calm and sober judgment of a high-minded, intelligent, and patriotic community.

The question immediately before the Senate was one of minor consequence; it might be called a question of small import, except for the effect which the decision might have upon the Senate itself. In that point of view, it might be a question of some moment; for, without reference to individuals, it was essential to the cause of free governments, that every department of the Government, the Senate inclusive, should so act as to preserve to itself the respect and the confidence of the country. The immediate question was, upon the rejection of the President's Message. It was moved to reject it—to reject it, not after it was considered, but before it was considered! and thus to tell the American people that their President shall not be heard—should not be allowed to plead his defence—in the presence of the body that condemned him—neither before the condemnation, nor after it! This is the motion, and certainly no enemy to the Senate could wish it to miscarry. The President, in the conclusion of his Message, has respectfully requested that his defence might be entered upon the Journal of the Senate—upon that same journal which contains the record of his convictions. This is the request of the President. Will the Senate deny it? Will they refuse this act of sheer justice and common decency? Will they go further, and not only refuse to place it on the Journal, but refuse even to suffer it to remain in the Senate? Will they refuse to permit it to remain on file, but send it back, or throw it out of doors, without condescending to reply to it? for that is the exact import of the motion now made! Will Senators exhaust their minds, and their bodies also, in loading this very communication with epithets, and then say that it shall not be received? Will they receive memorials, resolutions, essays, from all that choose to abuse the President, and not receive a word of defence from him? Will they continue the spectacle which had been presented here for three months—a daily presentation of attacks upon the President from all that choose to attack him, young and old, boys and men—attacks echoing the very sound of this resolution, and which are not only received and filed here, but printed also, and referred to a committee, and introduced, each one, with a lauded commentary of set phrase? Are the Senate to receive all these, and yet refuse to receive from the object of all this attack one word of answer? In this point of view—as a question concerning the Senate itself, it may become material to the Senate, in a country and in an age when no tribunal is too high for public opinion to reach it, it may become material to the Senate, in such a country, and such an age, to reject and throw out of doors the calm and temperate defence of the President, in the midst of the reception of a thousand memorials and resolutions condemning him for the very act which he is not allowed to defend. Is he to be the only citizen who is not to be heard by the Senate? Him whom it seems to be lawful for every one whose education and manners qualifies him for the application of billingsgate rhetoric, to lavish it upon him. Rejected or not, that communication cannot be secreted from the eyes of the American people. It has been read, and will be printed. An independent press will carry it to the extremities of the country, and hand it down to succeeding generations. It will be compared with speeches delivered for three months in this Capitol, against this President, and an enlightened and upright community will decide between the language of the defence, and the language of the accusation; between the temper of the accusers, and the temper of the accused; between the violent President who has violated the constitution and the laws, and the meek and gentle Senators who have sat in judgment upon him for it. The people will see these things—will compare them together—will judge for themselves; and that judgment, in this free and happy land, will be the final and supreme award, from which there is no appeal.

The great question, Mr. B. said, which was to go before the American people, and to claim from them that intense and profound consideration which the English people gave to the conduct of the House of Commons in regard to the Middlesex election, is the constitutionality of the Senate's conduct in adopting a resolution which condemned the President for a violation of the laws and of the constitution of his country. It was the conduct of the Senate which would now be on trial, and that conduct deserved to be tried, and as far as it depended upon him, should be tried, upon the facts of the case alone—upon the facts which our Journal contains—upon the resolutions as offered, and adopted, here—upon the authentic speeches which the supporters of these resolutions have published to the world, and which show the sense in which they understood the proceeding which they carried on. The proceeding he, Mr. B., held to be an impeachment, without the forms of an impeachment—a conviction, without the form of a trial—a sentence of condemnation for a high crime and misdemeanor against the Chief Magistrate of the republic, without evidence, without hearing, without defence, without the observance of a single form prescribed for the trial of impeachments; and this by the very tribunal which is bound to try the formal impeachment for the same matter, if duly demanded by the general inquest of the nation in their Hall of Representatives. This was the question which the country would have to try, and in the trial of which, furious passion, reckless denunciation, or even audacious assertion, will stand for nothing. The record! the record! will be the evidence which the country will demand. The facts! the facts! will be the data which they require. The speeches! the speeches! delivered on this floor, will be the test of the spirit and intention with which these proceedings were pursued and consummated, and without animadverting upon the manner in which the President's Message and protest had been received here, and which has presented such an extraordinary scene in the American Senate, he should proceed to lay before the people the authentic evidence, in the calmest manner, which it will be their business to weigh in the formation of their opinions on this momentous subject. The first evidence which he should submit, was the series of resolutions which were presented to the Senate, before one could be framed which could unite the votes of the 26 Senators who finally voted together in the adoption of one of them. He said he should present the series of these resolutions, for in the metamorphosis which they underwent, there was much for anxious reflection; the first one containing specifications, which were omitted in the second and third; while the second and third notoriously rested upon the specifications omitted, and which could not be retained on the face of the record!

President's Protest—Notice of Expunging Resolution.

[APRIL, 1834.]

Mr. B. then read the resolution at first offered by Mr. CLAY at the commencement of the debate. It was in the following words:

"Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

He then read the resolution as amended, or altered, by the same gentleman, and offered again to the Senate towards the close of the debate. It was as follows:

"Resolved, That in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States, the President of the United States has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

He then read the third edition, revised, amended, and altered, of the same resolution, as finally submitted to the Senate by the original mover, and adopted by the vote of the Senate:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Mr. B. then remarked upon the alteration which these resolutions had undergone, and begged it to be well remembered that none of these alterations were amendments made by the Senate, but were the voluntary and successive changes introduced by the mover himself. He remarked, first, upon the nature of these changes; secondly, upon the design which induced them; and thirdly, upon the effect of making them. The first change consisted in dropping the specification on which the general charge of violating the laws and the constitution rested, and retaining the formal impeachment conclusion, of dangerous to the liberties of the people. The second change consisted in the omission of the specification, and in the suppression of that regular impeaching clause dangerous to the liberties of the people! Now, said Mr. B., when were these alterations made? Certainly it was after the objection had been fully taken in the Senate that this resolution contained impeachable matter! It was after the original resolution had been denounced as a virtual impeachment of the President of the United States, and after the suppressed passages had been pointed out as proving and identifying the impeachment character of the resolution. It was after all this that the alterations were made. Having shown the time when the alterations were made, Mr. B. next showed the design with which they must have been made; and that evidently was to get rid of the criminal aspect of the proceedings, and to avoid a trial before the people on those specifications, on which, possibly, the 26 could not unite here, nor go to trial upon anywhere! He remarked, in the third place, upon the effect produced in the character of the resolution, and affirmed that it was nothing. He said that the same charge ran through all three. They all three imputed to the President a violation of the constitution and laws of the country—of that constitution which he was sworn to support, and of those laws which he was not only bound to observe himself, but to cause to be faithfully observed by all others. A violation of the constitution and of the laws, Mr. B. said, were not abstractions and metaphysical subtleties. They must relate to persons or things. The violations cannot rest in the air; they must affix themselves to men or to property; they must connect themselves with the transactions of real life. They cannot be ideal and contemplative. In omitting the specifications relative to the dismissal of one Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of another, what other specifications were adopted or substituted? Certainly none! What others were mentally intended? Surely none! What others were suggested? Certainly none! The general charge then rests upon the same specification; and so completely is this the fact, that no supporter of the resolutions has thought it necessary to make the least alteration in his speeches which supported the original resolution, or to say a single additional word in favor of the altered resolution as finally passed. The omission of the specification is then an omission of form and not of substance; it is a change of words and not of things; and the substitution of a derogation of the laws and constitution, for dangerous to the liberties of the people, is a still more flagrant instance of change of words without change of things. It is tautologous and nonsensical. It adds nothing to the general charge, and takes nothing from it. It neither explains it nor qualifies it. In the technical sense it is absurd; for it is not the case of a statute in derogation of the common law, to wit, repealing a part of it; in the common parlance understanding it is ridiculous, for the President is not even charged with defaming the constitution and the laws; and, if he was so charged, it would present a curious trial of scandalum magnatum for the American Senate to engage in. No! said Mr. B., this derogation clause is an expletion! It is put in to fill up! The regular impeaching clause of dangerous to the liberties of the people, had to be taken out. There was danger not to the people certainly, but to the character of the resolution, if it stayed in. It identified that resolution as an impeachment, and, therefore, constituted a piece of internal evidence which it was necessary to withdraw; but in withdrawing which, the character of the resolution was not altered. The charge for violating the laws and the constitution still stood; and the substituted clause was nothing but a stopper to a vacuum—additional sound without additional sense, to fill up a blank and round off a sentence.

After showing the impeaching character of the Senate's resolution, from its own internal evidence, Mr. B. had recourse to another description of evidence, scarcely inferior to the resolutions themselves, in the authentic interpretations of their meaning. He alluded to the speeches made in support of them, and which had resounded in this chamber for three months, and were now circulating all over the country in every variety of newspaper and pamphlet form. These speeches were made by the friends of the resolution to procure its adoption here, and to justify its adoption before the country. Let the country then read, let the people read, what has been sent to them for the purpose of justifying these resolutions which they are now to try! They will find them to be in the character of prosecution pleadings against an accused man, on his trial for the commission of great crimes! Let them look over these speeches, and mark the passages; they will find language ransacked, history rummaged, to find words sufficiently strong, and examples sufficiently odious, to paint and exemplify the enormity of the crime of which the President was alleged to be guilty. After reading these passages, let any one doubt, if he can, as to the character of the resolution which was adopted. Let him doubt, if he can, of the impeachable nature of the offence which was charged upon the President. Let him doubt, if he can, that every Senator who voted for that resolution, voted the President to be guilty of an impeachable offence—an offence, for the trial of which this Senate is the appointed tribunal—an offence which it will be the immediate duty of the House of Representatives to bring before the Senate, in a formal impeachment, unless they disbelieve in the truth and justice of the resolution which has been adopted.

Mr. B. said there were three characters in which the Senate could act, and every time it acted it necessarily did so in one or the other of these characters. It possessed executive, legislative, and judicial characters. As a part of the executive, it acted on treaties and nominations to office; as a part of the legislative, it assisted in making laws; as a judicial tribunal, it decided impeachments. Now, in which of these characters did the Senate act when it adopted the resolution in question? Not in its executive character, it will be admitted; not in its legislative character, it will be proved; for the resolution was, in its nature, wholly foreign to legislation. It was directed, not to the formation of a law, but to the condemnation of the President. It was to condemn him for dismissing one Secretary, because he would not do a thing, and appointing another that he might do it; and certainly this was not matter for legislation; for Mr. Duane could not be restored by law, nor Mr. Taney put out by law. It was to convict the President of violating the constitution and the laws; and surely these infractions are not to be amended by laws, but avenged by trial and punishment. The very nature of the resolution proves it to be foreign to all legislation; its form proves the same thing; for it is not joint, to require the action of the House of Representatives, and thus ripen into law; nor is it followed by an instruction to a committee to report a bill in conformity to it. No such instruction could even now be added without committing an absurdity of the most ridiculous character. There was another resolution, with which this must not be confounded, and upon which an instruction to a committee might have been bottomed; it was the resolution which declared the Secretary's reasons for removing the deposits to be insufficient and unsatisfactory, but no such instruction has been bottomed even upon that resolution; so that it is evident that no legislation of any kind was intended to follow either resolution, even that to which legislation might have been appropriate, much less that to which it would have been an absurdity. Four months have elapsed since the resolutions were brought in. In all that time there has been no attempt to found a legislative act upon either of them; and it is too late now to assume that the one which in its nature and in its form is wholly foreign to legislation, is a legislative act, and adopted by the Senate in its legislative character. No! This resolution is judicial; it is a judgment pronounced upon an imputed offence; it is the declared sense of a majority of the Senate, of the guilt of the President of a high crime and misdemeanor. It is, in substance, an impeachment—an impeachment in violation of all the forms prescribed by the constitution—in violation of the privileges of the House of Representatives—in subversion of the rights of the accused, and the record of which ought to be expunged from the Journal of the Senate.

Mr. B. said, the selection of a tribunal for the trial of impeachments was felt, by the convention which framed the constitution, as one of the most delicate and difficult tasks which they had to perform. Those great men were well read in history, both ancient and modern, and knew that the impeaching power—the usual mode for trying political men for political offences—was often an engine for the gratification of factious and ambitious feelings. An impeachment was well known to be the beaten road for running down a hated or successful political rival. After great deliberation—after weighing all the tribunals, even that of the Supreme Court—the Senate of the United States was fixed upon as the body which, from its constitution, would be the most impartial, neutral, and equitable, that could be selected, and with the check of a previous inquisition, and presentment of charges by the House of Representatives, would be the safest tribunal to which could be confided a power so great in itself, and so susceptible of being abused. The Senate was selected; and to show that he had not overstated the difficulties of the convention in making the selection, he would take leave to read a passage from a work which was canonical on this subject, and from an article in that work which was written by the gentleman whose authority would have most weight on this occasion. He spoke of the Federalist, and of the article written by Gen. Hamilton on the impeaching power:

"A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained, in a government wholly elective. The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offences which proceed from the misconduct of public men; or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may, with peculiar propriety, be denominated political, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to society itself. The prosecution of them for this reason, will seldom fail to agitate the passions of the whole community, and to divide it into parties more or less friendly or inimical to the accused. In many cases, it will connect itself with the pre-existing factions, and will enlist all their animosities, partialities, influence and interest, on one side or on the other; and, in such cases, there will always be the greatest danger that the decision will be regulated more by the comparative strength of parties, than by the real demonstration of innocence or guilt. The delicacy and magnitude of a trust which so deeply concerns the political reputation and existence of every man engaged in the administration of public affairs, speak for themselves. The difficulty of placing it rightly in a government resting entirely on the basis of periodical elections, will as readily be perceived, when it is considered that the most conspicuous characters in it will, from that circumstance, be too often the leaders or the tools of the most cunning or the most numerous faction; and, on this account, can hardly be expected to possess the requisite neutrality towards those whose conduct may be the subject of scrutiny.

"The division of the powers of impeachment between the two branches of the legislature, assigning to one the right of accusing, to the other, the right of trying, avoids the inconvenience of making the same persons both accusers and judges; and guards against the danger of persecution from the prevalence of a factious spirit in either of those branches."

Mr. B. said there was much matter for elucidation of the present object of discussion in the extract which he had read. Its definition of an impeachable offence covered the identical charge which was contained in the resolution adopted by the Senate against the President. The offence charged upon him possessed every feature of the impeachment defined by General Hamilton. It imputes misconduct to a public man, for the abuse and violation of a public trust. The discussion of the charge has agitated the passions of the whole community; it has divided the people into parties, some friendly, some inimical, to the accused; it has connected itself with pre-existing parties, enlisting the whole of the opposition parties under one banner, and calling forth all their animosities—all their partialities—all their influence—all their interest; and, what was not foreseen by General Hamilton, it has called forth the tremendous moneyed power, and the pervading organization of a great moneyed power, wielding a mass of forty millions of money, and sixty millions of debt; wielding the whole in aid and support of this charge upon the President, and working the double battery of seduction on one hand, and oppression on the other, to put down the man against whom it is directed! This is what General Hamilton did not foresee; but the next feature in the picture he did foresee, and most accurately describe, as it is now seen by us all. He said that the decision of these impeachments would often be regulated more by the comparative strength of parties than by the guilt or innocence of the accused. How prophetic! Look to the memorials, resolutions, and petitions, sent in here to criminate the President, so clearly marked by a party line, that when an exception occurs, it is made the special subject of public remark. Look at the vote in the Senate, upon the adoption of the resolution, also as clearly defined by a party line as any party question can ever be expected to be.

To guard the most conspicuous characters from being persecuted—Mr. B. said he was using the language of General Hamilton—to guard the most conspicuous characters from being persecuted by the leaders or the tools of the most cunning or the most numerous faction—the convention had placed the power of trying impeachments, not in the Supreme Court, not even in a body of select judges chosen for the occasion, but in Senate of the United States, and not even in them without an intervening check to the abuse of that power, by associating the House of Representatives, and forbidding the Senate to proceed against any officer until that grand inquest of the nation should demand his trial. How far fortunate, or otherwise, the convention may have been in the selection of its tribunal for the trial of impeachments, it was not for him, Mr. B., to say. It was not for him to say how far the requisite neutrality towards those whose conduct may be under scrutiny, may be found, or has been found, in this body. But he must take leave to say, that if a public man may be virtually impeached—actually condemned by the Senate of an impeachable offence, without the intervention of the House of Representatives, then has the constitution failed at one of its most vital points, and a ready means found for doing a thing which had filled other countries with persecution, faction, and violence, and which it was intended should never be done here.

Mr. B. called upon the Senate to recollect what was the feature in the famous court of the Star Chamber, which rendered that court the most odious that ever sat in England. It was not the mass of its enormities—great as they were—for the regular tribunals which yet existed, exceeded that court, both in the mass and in the atrocity of their crimes and oppressions. The regular courts in the compass of a single reign—that of James the Second; a single judge, in a single riding—Jeffries, on the Western Circuit—surpassed all the enormities of the Star Chamber, in the whole course of its existence. What then rendered that court so intolerably odious to the English people? Sir, said Mr. B., it was because that court had no grand jury—because it proceeded without presentment, without indictment—upon information alone—and thus got at its victims without the intervention, without the restraint, of an accusing body. This is the feature which sunk the Star Chamber in England. It is the feature which no criminal tribunal in this America is allowed to possess. The most inconsiderable offender, in any State of the Union, must be charged by a grand jury before he can be tried by the court. In this Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, a charge must first be presented by the House of Representatives, sitting as the grand inquest of the nation. But if the Senate can proceed, without the intervention of this grand inquest, wherein is it to differ from the Star Chamber, except in the mere execution of its decrees? And what other execution is now required for delinquent public men, than the force of public opinion? No! said Mr. B., we live in an age when public opinion, over public men is omnipotent and irreversible!—when public sentiment annihilates a public man more effectually than the scaffold. To this new and omnipotent tribunal, all the public men of Europe and America are now happily subject. The fiat of public opinion has superseded the axe of the executioner. Struck by that opinion, kings and emperors in Europe, and the highest functionaries among ourselves, fall powerless from the political stage, and wander, while their bodies live, as shadows and phantoms over the land. Should he give examples? It might be invidious; yet all would recollect an eminent example of a citizen, once sitting at the head of this Senate, afterwards falling under a judicial prosecution, from which he escaped untouched by the sword of the law, yet that eminent citizen was more utterly annihilated by public opinion, than any execution of a capital sentence could ever have accomplished upon his name. What occasion then has the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, for the power of execution? The only effect of a regular impeachment now, is to remove from office, and disqualification for office. An irregular impeachment will be tantamount, to removal and disqualification, if the justice of the sentence is confided in by the people. If this condemnation of the President had been pronounced in the first term of his administration, and the people had believed in the truth and justice of the sentence, certainly President Jackson would not have been elected a second time; and every object that a political rival, or a political party, could have wished from his removal from office, and disqualification for office, would have been accomplished. Disqualification for office—loss of public favor—political death—is now the object of political rivalry; and all this can be accomplished by an informal, as well as by a formal impeachment, if the sentence is only confided in by the people. If the people believed that the President has violated the constitution and the laws, he ceases to be the object of their respect and their confidence; he loses their favor; he dies a political death; and that this might be the object of the resolution, Mr. B. would leave to the determination of those who should read the speeches which were delivered in support of the measure, and which would constitute a public and lasting monument of the temper in which the resolution was presented, and the object intended to be accomplished by it.

It was in vain to say there could be no object, at this time, in annihilating the political influence of President Jackson, and killing him off as a public man, with a Senatorial conviction for violating the laws and constitution of the country. Such an assertion, if ventured upon by any one, would stand contradicted by facts, of which Europe and America are witnesses. Does he not stand between the country and the bank? Is he not proclaimed the sole obstacle to the recharter of the bank; and in its recharter is there not wrapped up the destinies of a political party, now panting for power? Remove this sole obstacle—annihilate its influence—kill off President Jackson with a sentence of condemnation for a high crime and misdemeanor, and the charter of the bank will be renewed, and in its renewal, a political party, now thundering at the gates of the Capitol, will leap into power. Here then is an object for desiring the extinction of the political influence of President Jackson! An object large enough to be seen by all America! and attractive enough to enlist the combined interest of a great moneyed power, and of a great political party.

FRIDAY, April 18.

Distress Memorial.

Mr. KENT presented a memorial from Prince George's county, in the State of Maryland, complaining of the removal of the public deposits, and the manner in which they had been removed through the agency of the President, and praying for their restoration and the recharter of the Bank of the United States.

[On presenting the above memorial, Mr. Kent addressed the Senate at great length in amplification and justification of its contents.]

President's Protest.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion not to receive the Message of the President of the United States on the subject of the resolution of the Senate of the 28th ult.; when

Mr. LEIGH said, that whatever surprise the paper sent hither by the President, and read yesterday, might have produced out of doors, he presumed there was no Member of the Senate to whom it came unexpected. Every man here must have been aware, for some time past, of the actual commencement of hostilities by that potentate against this body, and prepared, of course, for the public declaration of war that was soon to follow. The language of this manifesto had been described, by the friends of the administration, as temperate and moderate; and it was temperate enough, in the sense in which that epithet might be applied to all denunciations of war by civilized powers, in modern times—as temperate as is compatible with the nature and purpose of such denunciations. There was nothing in the mere language of this extraordinary paper that was offensive to him—it was the act itself that roused his indignation. He felt that sentiment very strongly; never, on any occasion, more strongly; and if he were to indulge the expression of his feelings, he should not, like the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. SPRAGUE,) speak more in grief than in anger, much less would his language be in unison with that cheerful mood in which the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. KING) had spoken on the subject, for he felt as if he were even now treading among the ruins of the constitution. He should, however, endeavor to suppress all emotions of passion. His purpose was to examine this act of the President, the motive that obviously dictated it, its manifest design and object, and the mischief which it but too certainly portended.

What, then, said he, is the true character of the act? It is apparent in every line of this paper, neither, in truth, is there any dispute about it; for the gentleman from Missouri, who had certainly been previously apprised of its contents, since he came prepared with extracts from the Federalist, to sustain some of the positions assumed by the President—extracts, of which, without the spirit of divination, he could not have seen the application to the purpose, unless he had a previous accurate knowledge—the gentleman from Missouri tells us that this is a solemn appeal to the American people, by the President, against the Senate; an appeal, he must allow, such as has never before been attempted, or thought of. And I add, and shall prove, that this is a quarrel causelessly sought by the President with the Senate, to be submitted to the decision of the people, in which he hopes for victory, and, if he succeeds, is prepared to avail himself of all the advantages of victory to the uttermost.

The President proposes a trial of the weight of his personal popularity and of the Executive influence, against the constitutional powers and rights of the Senate, and the privilege of this branch of the legislature to exercise its own judgment concerning its own rights and duties. He undertakes to prescribe to us the limits of our legislative functions. If he fail in this trial of his strength, the only consequence will be some mortification of his pride, and a grievous disappointment of the gratification of those fierce and burning resentments which but too plainly influence all his actions. The constitution will remain unaltered and unimpaired. But if the people shall sustain him in this appeal, the constitution of the Senate will be directly attacked. He has indicated his own personal motives, and the political objects he is seeking to accomplish in respect to the Senate, in this very paper, and that in language too plain to be misunderstood by any man who will not shut his mind to every thing but plain, unequivocal avowal. He says: "If the censures of the Senate be submitted to by the President, the confidence of the people in his ability and virtue, and the character and usefulness of his administration, will soon be at an end, and the real power of the Government will fall into the hands of a body, holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people, and not to them directly responsible. If, on the other hand, the illegal censures of the Senate should be resisted by the President, collisions and angry controversies might ensue, discreditable in their progress, and in the end compelling the people to adopt the conclusion, either that their Chief Magistrate was unworthy of their respect, or that the Senate was chargeable with calumny and injustice. Either of these results would impair public confidence in the perfection of the system, and lead to serious alterations of its frame work, or to the practical abandonment of some of its provisions." And in another part, he says: "But if the Senate have a right to interfere with the executive powers, they have also the right to make that interference effective; and if the assertion of the power implied in the resolution be silently acquiesced in, we may reasonably apprehend that it will be followed, at some future day, by an attempt at actual enforcement. The Senate may refuse, except on the condition that he will surrender his opinions to theirs, and obey their will, to perform their own constitutional functions, to pass the necessary laws, to sanction appropriations proposed by the House of Representatives, and to confirm proper nominations by the President." Who does not see, in these expressions, the manifestation of those personal motives, which have impelled the President to hostilities against the Senate; that "the confidence of the people in his ability and virtue, and the character and usefulness of his administration," is the object that constitutes the personal motive of his conduct? Who does not see that the refusal of the Senate "to sanction appropriations proposed by the House of Representatives, and to confirm proper nominations by the President," are to be regarded by him, and to be held up to the people, as "an attempt," on our part, "at actual enforcement" of our right "to interfere with the executive powers?" Who does not also see in those allusions to the constitution of this body, "holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people, and not to them directly responsible," the corrective which the President is aiming at? No one can suppose that "the serious alterations of the frame work, or the practical abandonment of some of the provisions" of the constitution, which he expects will grow out of these collisions between the Executive and the Senate, will be of a nature to reduce the patronage, power, and influence of the former. The House of Representatives (it must in decency be presumed) will make no appropriations, which it does not think wise and just, nor the President any nominations, which he does not think proper; but the Senate, in its legislative capacity, has an express power by the constitution, to agree to the appropriations proposed by the other House, or to dissent from them, according to its judgment; and, in the exercise of its executive functions, to give or withhold its assent to the nominations of the President, according to its sense of the merits or demerits of the nominees; and yet this exercise of our undoubted powers is to be held up to the people as a manifestation of the design of the Senate to concentrate "the real power of the Government into its own hands!" The disagreement of the Senate to appropriations proposed by the other House, is a very common case; and its disapprobation of some of the nominations already made by the President, or expected from him, may very certainly be anticipated. Such proofs of our lust of domination, he has reason enough to expect will soon be publicly exhibited to the world. And if the people shall sustain the President in this his appeal against the Senate, it requires no political sagacity to foresee, and I venture to predict, that he will then aim at absolute conquest over this devoted body; he will then insist that its share of the appointing power shall be taken away, that the Senatorial term of service shall be shortened; that the Senators shall be made subject to recall during their term, and, perhaps, that the election of them shall be transferred from the State legislatures to the people; and he will exert the whole influence of his personal popularity and executive patronage, (the latter of which is vast beyond calculation, almost beyond imagination,) to accomplish these "serious alterations in the frame work" of the constitution. It is not my purpose, at present, to inquire whether such alterations would be wise or not. I only say they would amount to a revolution in the Government. The adoption of them will abolish the only check which the wisdom of our fathers found it practicable to devise, to guard against the predominance of the National features of our institutions over the Federal, and of the executive over the other departments of this Government.

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

Sir, these designs against the Senate are only not avowed. I as confidently believe them to exist, as if they were ever so distinctly avowed. I shall never wait till politicians or generals think proper to promulgate their plans of operations. The love of contest, and the passion for conquest, have marked the conduct of General Jackson throughout his life. He has conquered every individual that stood in his way; he has conquered the bank; he is now aiming at conquest over the Senate; and if he shall achieve that, he may then turn his arms with success against the whole constitution. I do not say, because I do not suspect, that he is now looking to this ulterior conquest, but that, at present, he is aiming at conquest over the Senate; and if the people shall sustain him in this appeal against us, he will have it in his power to achieve this conquest over us, to the utmost extent of his wishes. I have not the least confidence in his moderation or clemency after victory.

An appeal of the President to the American people against the Senate, with a view to accomplish, or even to suggest a change, formal or informal, in the constitution of the latter, through the direct intervention of the people, is, in its very nature, of a revolutionary tendency. In representative republics like ours, when once the Government is established, the people always act through their agents—their constituted authorities; they never resume the original powers inherent in them, but for the purpose of altering or abolishing their ancient forms, and establishing new; and whenever one department of the Government appeals directly to the people against another, and invokes their interposition, it expects the people no longer to act through their constituted authorities, but to act against them—to supersede, to abolish, or at least to alter them. The House of Representatives and the Senate are co-ordinate branches of the Federal legislature. The Executive is not exactly a co-ordinate department of the Government. Until the President developed the faculties of the Executive power, all men thought it inferior to the legislative—he manifestly thinks it superior, and in his hands the monarchical part of the Government (for the Executive is monarchical, though it be elective for a term of years, by which it was hoped—I now fear, vainly hoped—to obviate mischief from its power) has proved far stronger than the representatives of the people, stronger than the representatives of the States, stronger than both combined; and if success shall still attend his inordinate pretensions, he will soon tame them to absolute submission. He has proclaimed to the world, that neither “the voice of the legislature, nor the will of the people,” shall induce him to change his course of measures. He has no respect for the opinion of the people, when that opinion is against him; he only appeals to the people when he wants their aid to subdue the Senate. The republic is in danger.

I have said that the President has raised this quarrel with the Senate without cause or provocation. His pretext for it is one of the resolutions of this House on the subject of the deposits, which is in these words: “Resolved, That the President of the United States, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.” The language of the resolution was carefully selected, in order to avoid the imputation of crime; it is not affirmed that he has usurped unconstitutional and illegal power, for that phrase would have imported design and wilfulness; it is not said that he has wilfully assumed, but, only, that he has assumed, namely, taken upon himself, such power; it is not said that he has done this in violation, in defiance, or in contempt of the constitution and laws, but in derogation from them—that is, that his measures tended to impair them, or to prevent or weaken their operation. There is not a word in the resolution that implies a criminal intent, nor was it intended to impute one. But the President reads this resolution as if it charged him with having criminally usurped power, in wilful violation of the constitution and laws. Behold how he justifies the interpretation of it! He says, “That the language of the resolution does not expressly allege that the assumption of power and authority which it condemns was intentional and corrupt, is no answer to the preceding view of its character and effect. The act thus condemned, necessarily implies volition and design in the individual to whom it is imputed, and, being unlawful in its character, the legal conclusion is, that it was prompted by improper motives, and committed with an unlawful intent. The charge is not of a mistake in the exercise of supposed powers, but of the assumption of powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both; and nothing is suggested to excuse or palliate the turpitude of the act. In the absence of any such excuse or palliation, there is only room for one inference, and that is, that the intent was unlawful and corrupt. Besides, the resolution not only contains no mitigating suggestion, but on the contrary it holds up the act complained of, as justly obnoxious to censure and reprobation, and thus as distinctly stamps it with impurity of motive, as if the strongest epithets had been used.” Now, I have always understood, and I should have supposed that the President, who has been a judge, would have known, that the allegation of a criminal intent is of the essence of every criminal accusation; and I apprehend that it never before was imagined that the omission to allege criminal intent was supplied by an omission of any circumstances of excuse or justification that might lead to acquittal. Neither is there but one supposition on which the reasoning of the President can hold good; and that is, that he is so profoundly versed in the constitution and laws, and so well known to the whole world, and especially to the Senate, to be an infallible judge of them, that it is impossible for any one to impute a departure from them by him, to mistake or error of judgment; and, therefore, the Senate must have intended to charge his aberrations to a wilful criminal design to violate the constitution and the laws, which it is his duty to observe and maintain. Surely, sir, this man is possessed with a degree of presumption that never mortal man beside was cursed withal! a presumption which, whether it proceeds from native vanity, or the favors of fortune, or the poison of flattery, must be to himself a copious source of error as well as of bitterness and of evil to his country. The Supreme Court of the United States has been often charged with giving judgments contrary to the constitution; the President himself has made such charges against that court. Congress has been, over and over again, charged with passing laws not warranted by the constitution; and the President has repeatedly alleged this against the legislature. Congress has been charged with passing, and the President with approving, unconstitutional acts; and, if I am rightfully informed, the President has alleged this in respect of acts, or parts of acts, which he himself has approved. In debate here, gentlemen are daily contending that the opinions and votes of each other are contrary to the constitution. Who ever thought that such allegations implied a charge of crime—of a wilful violation of the constitution? It is only, when such an allegation is brought by the Senate against the President—by this Senate against this President—that the Senate must necessarily intend to arraign him, without any impeachment from the other House, and to try and convict him without a hearing. And this is the daring violation of the constitution for which the President appeals to the American people against the Senate!

THURSDAY, April 24.

President's Protest.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the resolutions offered by Mr. POINDEXTER, as modified by Mr. CLAY.

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BIBB—

Mr. KANE said: Mr. President, I am amongst those who believe that this session has been already sufficiently extended; and that the time for action upon the necessary business of the country has arrived. My sentiments upon the present subject will be therefore delivered as briefly as possible. The proposition first made, in haste and without due consideration, not to receive the communication of the President, has, in some measure, given way to more sagacious counsels; more sagacious, because formed upon more reflection. Gentlemen in the opposition have trodden back their steps, and have consented to present their reasons upon record, in the shape of the resolutions now before you. It will not surprise me if our further progress should lead to further recessions. I take no pleasure in retorting upon Senators who have charged retraction of opinions upon the President, because of his supplemental explanations, the fact that their propositions have been thrice altered, and that down to this moment they have not agreed upon the course to be pursued.

Notwithstanding, Mr. President, the matters of grave import contained in the several resolutions submitted by the Senator from Mississippi, the first question presented for decision will be upon the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. BIBB.) That question is, Shall the paper be rejected?

Before we give an affirmative answer, it would be well to consider that the President of the United States represents an authority, under the constitution, conferred upon him by twelve millions of people—that they have lodged in his hands the Executive power of this Government—that it is the duty of the incumbent to guard that power from violation, that it may neither be diminished nor carried too far—that it is as much his right and his duty to guard that power, as it is the right and duty of any other department of the Government to guard its rights and powers from violation. When questions of difference with regard to power arise between the co-ordinate branches, of a nature not judicial, there is but one tribunal to appeal to, and that tribunal is the people—the fountain and parent of all the powers of the Government. It is the duty of the conflicting parties to present the matter of difference fairly, in a spirit of candor, that the points may be clearly presented, and fully understood. Remember that our duty requires us to conceal nothing from the great arbiter; that we have no right to treat him with contempt.

The reasons, then, for rejecting this paper, or refusing to receive it, must be overwhelming, to justify us in taking the course proposed, lest we subject ourselves to the charge of treating twelve millions of people, in the person of their President, contemptuously, and their undoubted power with scorn.

Will the Senate act courteously, or consult its self-respect, to read this protest, dissect it, condemn it, answer it by speeches, and then solemnly vote not to receive it? Would it be honorable in private life for a gentleman to receive a communication from an individual, open it, read it, answer it, abuse it, and condemn it by oral declarations, and then refuse to receive it? Let me now ask for the reasons which will govern the votes of those who will not consent to receive this paper.

Is its language disrespectful, is it indecent, is it insulting in its terms or its import? None of these things are pretended. Had the President no right to send it? If it be his duty to defend the powers of the Executive Department of the Government, his right is unquestionable. If he believed that the resolution of the Senate, in violation of the constitution, invaded the "Executive power," there was no course left him to pursue, than to protest against it.

He could not counteract the resolutions in any other way. If he submitted in silence, he would have acquiesced in what he believed an unauthorized interference with the rights of a branch of the Government confided to him by the constitution, and he would have been justly condemned by the people for his acquiescence. He would have surrendered the Executive office to a successor, impaired, so far as his silence against his duty could accomplish such an end. He had precedent for his course in the recorded proceedings of the Senate. How often have the State Legislatures sent protests here against the acts of the Congress of the United States, containing positive charges of violations of the Federal constitution on the part of Congress? Who ever made a motion not to receive a protest of this kind? And pray, sir, will gentlemen tell me why a co-ordinate branch of this Government cannot protest against a resolution of this body, and why, at the same time, he will allow a State Legislature to send a protest against the deliberate Legislative determinations of Congress.

Whatever objections have been made to the right of the President to send the paper, no one has denied the right of the Senate to receive it, and spread it upon the Journal; for however much we complain of the want of power in others, we seldom deny to ourselves the authority to do any thing. I place the right of the Senate to comply with the President's request to cause the protest to be spread upon the Journals, upon its unquestioned and unquestionable power over its own Journal. The President has no right to interfere with the Journal in any way, and therefore he appeals, in the form of a request, to your justice, to cause the protest to be placed side by side with your resolution.

It has been urged that the doctrines of the protest are unsound, its objects and designs impure, and that it is a declaration of war against the Senate. If this be all true, it would seem to be good policy in us to make these unsound doctrines and impurities of object and design as conspicuous and as durable as possible, that the world may know, and that posterity may justify the defensive operations of the Senate.

Suppose, however, sir, that the judgment of the country, as to these doctrines, objects, and designs, should be different; that the people should believe them sound and irreproachable, in what condition, then, will the Senate be placed? Will not the world suppose the reasons of our refusal to receive and record this document to be, that we could not controvert the principles, answer the arguments, and prove the charges, of impurity of motive and design? Depend upon it, sir, that the people of this country will not be pleased with efforts to degrade the President, unless such efforts have for their solid foundation, truth, justice, reason, necessity, and patriotism.

One gentleman has declared the paper in question to be a declaration of war against the Senate. Mild in its terms, to be sure, as all declarations of war between modern powers are required to be, by the courtesy of nations. Yet it is a declaration of war. I am totally at a loss to account for this opinion, unless, indeed, we take into view the statement so repeatedly made here, that the President had made war upon the bank. If that be true, if gentlemen have entered into the war as its allies, surely it is inglorious in them to complain that the auxiliary is treated in the same manner as the principal. If they have made it a common cause, they must abide together the common fortunes of the contest.

Let us, however, examine the facts in relation to this charge, though I shall be compelled to repeat some things often repeated. I shall do it in so brief a manner as not to be fatiguing. The sixteenth section of the bank law, confers, in terms, upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the right to remove the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, requiring him to give his reasons therefor to Congress. The terms of the law conferring this power are as general as the English language could make it; and the power given is without limitation as to time or condition. Yet the Senate, being one branch only of the Legislature, have, in effect, interpolated this section of the bank law with an entire sentence, so as to limit the exercise of this power of removal to two conditions, namely, when the deposits are unsafe, or when the bank fails to comply with the positive requirements of the charter, in transferring the public moneys whenever and wherever it may be required by the Government. I will not detain you by repeating the unanswered reasons repeatedly given, to show that it is impossible Congress could ever have consented to part with the public funds upon such grounds. If Congress intended to confine the action of the Secretary to these two contingencies, would it not have done so? That body was composed of men who could read and write and express their will. Yet we find a general power given, instead of this limited, restrained power.

The fixing this limitation by the Senate required a virtual interpolation, by one branch of Congress, of a regularly-established law of the land. Here, then, was truly an act of usurpation. One House of Congress, by resolution, amending a law of the United States.

Having thus made a law to suit themselves, gentlemen declare that the President has violated it, and the constitution also, because of the part he has taken to accomplish the removal of the public funds. Now, sir, it is easy to make out a charge of usurpation upon another, if you first usurp authority sufficient to lay the foundation of the charge. It is literally a charge of usurpation founded upon usurpation. Having in this manner laid the requisite foundation, the Senate passed the resolution against which the President thinks it his right and duty to protest, and defend himself. That resolution declares that the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, had assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both; and it is because he has sent us a defence against this declaration, in the mildest and most respectful terms, that he is charged now with making war upon this body. That the principles and arguments upon which his defence rests, are at war with the grounds assumed in support of the resolution, there can be no doubt. In this sense, and in this sense alone, does a war exist, and the declaration of it came unquestionably from the Senate. The Senate first charge him with a violation of the constitution, and all he has done has been to send us his vindication. He has not only been accused and found guilty by this body of violating the constitution and laws, without an opportunity of defence, but the resolution itself implies design and criminal intentions. The fact of violation is averred in terms without qualification; and what is the legal inference to be drawn from the finding of the fact, the naked fact, without extenuation? Was it intended to say that he did so innocently and ignorantly? If so, you draw a distinction, unknown to our constitution and laws, between the highest officer in the Government, who is supposed to be well acquainted with the laws of the land, and the lowest of our citizens. The rule universally applied to crime is, that ignorance does not excuse it. If this were not so, few crimes would be punished. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. Ligon) was understood to say that indictments for crimes always charged a criminal intent; and from thence the inference was drawn, that the resolution in question was not a charge of designed violation. Is this resolution of the nature of an indictment? The Senate has no power to originate prosecutions of any kind. It is the jury which finds the fact, and the court which pronounces judgment. When a crime is proved to have been committed, the inference is necessarily drawn that the intent was criminal, and the accused is thrown upon the necessity of proving facts inconsistent with the inference. If the speeches made by legislators in favor of the passage of laws, or of the adoption of resolutions, may be referred to as evidence of their meaning, I need not remind the Senate that a most prolific source of proof is before us, to show that the violation charged was meant to be a wilful, arbitrary, tyrannical one.

But, sir, will any man, after examining precedents, say, that, had the House of Representatives sent us an impeachment against the President in the very words of this resolution, so far as the point before us is involved, that the Senate would have refused to arraign, try, and condemn the accused, for the want either of jurisdiction or of an expressed charge of criminal intent? No, sir, the language which all Senators would use, would be, that the intent was implied, and that the accused must clear himself from its effects by proof. I shall have occasion hereafter to advert to a precedent to show what has been in this respect pursued in impeachments. After this view of this part of the subject, it will be perceived, that, if the Senate has not convicted the President of a criminal violation of his duty, with pursuing the regular constitutional course, the members voting for the resolution have, at least, forever disqualified themselves from being his triers upon a regular prosecution for this alleged violation of duty, by forming and expressing an opinion of his guilt. And whether the one or the other of these things has been done, the constitution has been equally and flagrantly violated.

Gentlemen object to receiving his protest, because they say it is an appeal to the people. If by this is meant that the President is desirous to submit, in a spirit of candor and decency, to the people of the United States, whose servant he is, an account of his stewardship in this matter of the bank, and to justify himself before those who have a right to call him to an account for his conduct in relation to it, the charge is true. He is neither afraid nor ashamed to acknowledge that all his powers are derived from the people, and that he is accountable to them. If he has consulted their substantial and durable prosperity, by interposing his character, and the constitution of his country, soundly construed, between the power of gold and the pending destruction of the liberties of his constituents, it is his duty to maintain himself, by the exhibition of the truths and reasons by which he has been governed. It will be for the people to decide now, and after he shall have left his station, upon the wisdom of his actions, and the virtue of his motives.

Whatever politicians may say, Washington, the Father of his country, was not ashamed to appeal to the people for their judgment upon his official conduct. I state upon the authority of Mr. Jefferson, contained in the fourth volume of his works, that, in 1793, when the country was convulsed upon the subject of Mr. Genet's conduct, who was the minister of France near the Government of the United States, when party violence ran high, and when his cabinet were divided as to the proper course to be pursued with regard to him, and other questions of a political nature, in a discussion which took place in his cabinet, Washington "manifestly inclined to the appeal to the people." His own character and motives had been impeached, and, during the same discussion, the Father of his country complained of "the personal abuse which had been bestowed upon him," and he "defied any man on earth, to produce one single act of his, since he had been in the Government, which was not done on the purest motives; that he had never repented but once, the having slipped the moment of resigning his office, and that was every moment since;" that "he had rather be in his grave than in his present situation; that he had rather be on his farm than be made emperor of the world;" "and yet, that they were charging him with wanting to be a king." What a striking parallel is here observed between the personal abuse heaped upon President Washington and General Jackson. Yet they both agree upon the propriety of appealing to the people, as the just and appropriate judges of their conduct and motives.

The President says in his protest, with regard to the condemnatory resolution, "It asserts no legislative power; proposes no legislative action." To my infinite surprise, one or two Senators have declared that legislative action was intended. The discussion upon the resolution was carried on here for about four months. It was repeatedly asserted, by friends of the administration, as an argument against the continuance of the discussion, and the adoption of the resolution, that it proposed no legislative action: this was never denied; nor did any one Senator, within my hearing, intimate, during the whole period, that any legislation was to grow out of its adoption. This resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, an appropriate committee to report the plan of action. Yet the committee reported no legislative proposition; in truth, sir, they disregarded this resolution altogether, and did not report upon it at all. Already have five months of the session elapsed, and not a word about the legislative action has been heard, except the mere assertion referred to, in contradiction to the President's allegation. Sluggish legislators indeed! One prediction I will venture upon, that if the Senate continues its session five months longer, we shall not see a legislative proposition brought forward in this body, to carry into effect any object whatever connected with this resolution. And for the most decisive of all reasons, viz., in its very nature it cannot be the subject of legislation. If it can, I should be glad to be informed how. The protest, therefore, is no interference with any business pending before the Senate.

Another objection is made to receiving this paper, for the reason that it contains the proceedings and resolutions of the Legislatures of three of the States of this Union, approving, in the most unequivocal terms, the course of the Executive, which has been here the subject of condemnation. It also states the fact, truly, that four Senators from these States voted for the resolution, and that had their votes been cast against it, it would not have been adopted. But the President, in thus referring to these resolutions and instructions, expressly disclaims and repudiates all authority or design to interfere with the responsibility due from members of the Senate to their own consciences, their constituents, and their country. Yet gentlemen charge him, notwithstanding this emphatic disclaimer, with the very design he repudiates. Where a pure and justifiable motive can be assigned for any particular transaction, it is the part and course of innocence and justice to assign it, rather than a corrupt one.

This is more especially necessary to avoid the suspicion that we reason from our own infirmities to those of others. Is it at all strange that the Executive, attacked in all the various ways which an ingenious and talented opposition could devise, and who had been condemned, too, by a vote of a co-ordinate branch of the Government, should, in the progress of a defence against his accusers and their accusations, avail himself of all the respectable authorities within his reach, to sustain the soundness of his principles and the correctness of his conduct? And what authority, in this country, is more to be relied on, in the construction of the constitution, than that of the States of the Union, who alone have the power to alter and amend it? The President says that the facts belong to the history of the proceedings, and are important to the just development of the principles and interests involved in them, as well as to the proper vindication of the Executive department. No other motive could have existed than the one stated. All the facts were known to the world; had been avowed by the Senators concerned, on this floor, and they justified their continued disobedience to the instructions of their several Legislatures. The object of the President was, to present to the country his defence in a connected form, and in a mode, too, which would perpetuate it through all time to come.

The resolutions now before us, charge upon the President another violation of the constitution, in sending to us his defence and protest, for which he is now upon trial again, without any opportunity of defending himself, and he is about to be tried and condemned for presenting a paper which we may, and probably shall, refuse to receive. So inexpressibly sublimated is the dignity of this august body, that we may well expect a proposition to condemn the Executive for violations of the constitution, whenever he shall look at the Capitol. But of all the extraordinary pretensions which any branch of a free Government ever set up, is the one contained in one of the resolutions declaring that the President had violated the privileges of the Senate, for daring to question the infallibility of their opinions and decisions. Gentlemen, too, with a wisdom and research which marks the course of the opposition to the present administration, refer us to the British history of parliamentary proceedings to show that the King cannot interfere with pending subjects of legislation before the House of Lords!

Yet, we have not been shown a case where the Lords have considered their privileges violated by the King's sending his defence and protest to them upon a matter determined, and no longer pending in a legislative shape, as was the case with the resolution against which our republican President protests.

Let us examine, however, the British doctrine of parliamentary privilege. The only definition of privilege which I have ever met with, is that given by Sir John Fortesque, described by Blackstone, as follows:

"The privileges of Parliament are likewise very large and indefinite. And, therefore, when, in 1811 Henry Sixth, the House of Lords propounded a question to the Judges concerning them, the Chief Justice, Sir John Fortesque, in the name of his brethren, declared that they ought not to make answer to that question; for it hath not been used afortime, that the justices should in any wise determine the privileges of the high court of Parliament. For it is so high and mighty in its nature, that it may make law; and that which is law, it may make no law; and the determination and knowledge of that privilege belongs to the Lords of Parliament, and not to the justices."

To exemplify this doctrine, I have looked into the practice of the British Parliament upon this their theory, and now beg leave to read to the Senate a case from an old standard English work, called "Lex Parliamentaria."

"Johnson, a servant to Sir James Whitlock, a member of the Commons House, was arrested upon an execution by Moore and Lock, who, being told that Sir James Whitlock was a Parliament man, Fulk, one of the prosecutors, said he had known greater men's men than Sir James Whitlock's taken from their master's heels in Parliament times. This appearing, Lock and Moore were called into the bar, and by the judgment of the House were sentenced, first, that at the bar they should ask forgiveness of the House and of Sir James Whitlock, on their knees; secondly, that they should both ride upon one horse, bare-backed, back to back, from Westminster to the Exchange, with papers on their breasts, and this inscription: For arresting a servant of a member of the Commons House of Parliament; and this to be done sedenti curia. Which sentence was pronounced by Mr. Speaker against them at the bar, upon their knees."

Thus we see, Mr President, something of the character of the privileges of an English Parliament, and it is by the aid of such authority that we are now called upon to decide that the President of the United States has committed a breach of the privileges of the Senate, in virtue of our power derived from our English prototype, to make that which is law no law, and vice versa. Can we appeal to nothing more rational? Have not the framers of our constitution given us all the security which reason and liberty require? The constitution has secured to each House of Congress, in express terms—

1st. The privilege of freedom from arrest of the persons of members.

2d. Exemption from question elsewhere for what is said in the House.

3d. Power over their own members and proceedings.

As illustrative of this view of our privileges, suffer me to read an extract from Jefferson's Manual:

"The editor of the Aurora having, in his paper of February 19th, 1800, inserted some paragraphs defamatory of the Senate, and failed in his appearance, he was ordered to be committed. In debating the legality of this order, it was insisted, in support of it, that every man, by the law of nature, and every body of men, possesses the right of self-defence; that all public functionaries are essentially invested with the powers of self-preservation; that they have an inherent right to do all acts necessary to keep themselves in a condition to discharge the trusts confided to them; that, whenever authorities are given, the means of carrying them into execution are given by necessary implication; that thus we see the British Parliament exercise the right of punishing contempts; all the State Legislatures exercise the same power; and every court does the same; that if we have it not, we sit at the mercy of every intruder who may enter our doors or gallery, and by noise and tumult, render proceeding in business impracticable; that, if our tranquillity is to be perpetually disturbed by newspaper defamation, it will not be possible to exercise our functions with the requisite coolness and deliberation; and that we must, therefore, have a power to punish these disturbers of our peace and proceedings.

"To this it was answered that the Parliament and courts of England have cognizance of contempts by the express provisions of their law; that the State Legislatures have equal authority, because their powers are plenary; they represent their constituents completely, and possess all their powers, except such as their constituents have expressly denied them; that the courts of the several States have the same powers by the laws of their States, and those of the Federal Government by the same State laws adopted in each State, by a law of Congress; that none of these bodies, therefore, derive those powers from natural or necessary right, but from express law; that Congress have no such natural or necessary power, or any powers but such as are given them by the constitution; that that has given them, directly, exemption from personal arrest, exemption from question elsewhere for what is said in their House, and power over their own members and proceedings; for these no further law is necessary—the constitution being the law; that, moreover, by the article of the constitution which authorizes them 'to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the constitution in them,' they may provide by law for an undisturbed exercise of their functions—e. g. for the punishment of contempts, or affrays or tumult in their presence, &c.,—but, till the law be made, it does not exist, and does not exist from their own neglect; that in the mean time, however, they are not unprotected, the ordinary magistrates and courts of law being open and competent to punish all unjustifiable disturbances or defamations, and even their own sergeant, who may appoint deputies ad libitum to aid him, (8 Grey 59, 147, 255;) is equal to small disturbances. That in requiring a previous law, the constitution had regard to the inviolability of the citizen, as well as of the member: as, should one House, in the regular form of a bill, aim at too broad privileges, it may be checked by the other, and both by the President; and also as, the law being promulgated, the citizen will know how to avoid offence. But if one branch may assume its own privileges without control; if it may do it on the spur of the occasion, conceal the law in its own breast, and after the fact committed, make its sentence both the law and the judgment on that fact; if the offence is to be kept undefined, and to be declared only ex re nata, and according to the passions of the moment, and there being no limitation, either in the manner or measure of the punishment, the condition of the citizen will be perilous indeed. Which of these doctrines is to prevail, time will decide. Where there is no fixed law, the judgment on any particular case is the law of that particular case only, and dies with it. When a new and even a similar case arises, the judgment which is to make, and at the same time apply the law, is open to question and consideration, as are all new laws. Perhaps Congress in the mean time, in their care for the safety of the citizen, as well as that for their own protection, may declare by law what is necessary and proper to enable them to carry into execution the powers vested in them, and thereby hang up a rule for the inspection of all which may direct the conduct of the citizen, and at the same time test the judgments they shall themselves pronounce in their own case."

I take it for granted, that, until Congress shall pass laws regulating its privileges, we must look alone at the enumerated grants of privileges in the constitution, and to the ordinary judicial tribunals, for our necessary protection and safety. The only interference with the doctrines of Mr. Jefferson, upon this point, happened in a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Anderson vs. Dunn. Although that opinion does not, in the slightest degree, touch the privilege now for the first time claimed in this or any other country, yet I must say, I am not reconciled to its doctrines. I understand the doctrine of that case to be, not only that the power of punishment for contempts is implied from necessity, but that the degree of punishment is only limited "to the least possible power adequate to the end"—which can mean nothing more nor less than a power of punishment to any extent which the offended party may deem adequate.

That case, however, furnishes a principle totally at war with the present charge upon the President, of breach of privilege. The court declare "that it cannot be denied that the power to institute a prosecution must be dependent upon the power to punish." What punishment, let me ask, can one co-ordinate branch of this Government inflict upon another? We can have no hesitation in deciding upon what some of his triers for this breach of privilege would deem "adequate" punishment, if the power to punish existed. More than one of his triers have already declared, that President Jackson has done that, in regard to this bank, which, if done by a British monarch, would have brought his head to the block. Most righteous and merciful judges! The President's only offence is, that he has presented a view of his own rights and powers, in opposition to the expressed opinions of the Senate, which no Senator has or can answer, except by declaring that he has been guilty of a breach of privilege! And this result is arrived at, not from any view of our own constitution and laws, but from researches into the unadulterated nonsense of the privileges of a British Parliament.

I cannot conclude, sir, without remarking upon the unkind criticisms of gentlemen upon the allusions which the President makes, in justification of his patriotic motives, to the enduring memorials of that contest in which American liberty was purchased, which he now bears upon his bosom. This, too, is charged to have been done with the low design of enlisting the feelings of the people on his side in this controversy, if controversy it must be called, and some doubts have even been expressed as to its truth. Enumerat vulnera miles. Let the soldier count his wounds without reproach. If this be crime, and a breach of privilege too, is there a revolutionary officer or soldier living, who is not equally guilty? Search your records, and ransack the pigeon-holes of your Secretary's office, find the name of every one who has presented a petition to you, and then send your sergeant-at-arms to bring them into your chamber. Arraign, try, condemn, punish, and incarcerate them; then put a tongue in every wound you see, and teach it to sing hosannas to the all-pervading, all-absorbing, transcendent, omniscient, omnipotent privileges of the Senate. It is the duty of patriotism to ask the remnant of our revolutionary veterans to leave us all the evidences of the hardship and dangers of the struggle through which they passed. Never did Desdemona listen with a more greedy ear to the tales of Othello's disastrous chances, than we, in our childhood, to the recitals of the battles, sieges, and fortunes of our revolutionary heroes: "so well their words become them as their wounds; they smacked of honor both." When they have gone, let us repeat their stories to our progeny, till we see the tear of gratitude glistening in their eyes, and their countenances lighted up with a glow of patriotism direct from the heart. Then turn to them the other side of the tapestry. Show them envy, the malice, uncharitableness, and mad ambition of the wretch in human form, who never perilled a hair of his country's service, stretching out his sacrilegious hand to snatch a laurel from the silvered brow of the aged warrior, sinking to his eternal rest.

Signers to Distress Petitions.

Mr. CLAY moved to take up the report containing an account of the aggregate number of individuals who had signed memorials for and against the United States Bank. By the report, it appears that 114,914 persons had petitioned for relief from the distress consequent upon the late act of the Executive, and 8,721 had presented memorials of an opposite character. Mr. C. moved that the report be printed, with 1,000 additional copies.

Mr. FORSYTH would like to know how many persons had signed memorials from the city of Philadelphia.

The Secretary intimated that he could not immediately give this information. The account of the meetings in Philadelphia was not in a condensed form—was scattered over the report.

Mr. FORSYTH then, with the permission of the Senator from Kentucky, would move to lay the report on the table until to-morrow. He would examine it in the mean time, and procure the information he required.

Mr. CLAY had no objection.

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

Polish Exiles.

Mr. POINDEXTER, with the leave of the Senate from Pennsylvania, would make a report. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of 285 Poles, recently arrived in this country, had intrusted him to make a report, accompanied with a bill. The committee did not recognize the policy of granting land, generally, to foreigners who sought refuge on these shores; but were of opinion that an exception should be made in favor of the gallant and unfortunate strangers, in the present case. After passing a eulogium upon Poland and her noble sons, the report went on to describe the peculiar case of the petitioners, and concluded by recommending that a portion of land be granted to them in Michigan, or some other suitable Territory. Mr. P. said he would ask that the bill he had presented be made a special order for Thursday week. If any thing were done in this matter, it was necessary that it should be done quickly. The early attention of the Senate would enable the House to act upon the subject during the present session.

The proposition was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, April 30.

President's Protest.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the resolutions offered by Mr. POINDEXTER, as modified by Mr. CLAY;

The question being on the motion of Mr. BIRN to amend—

Mr. CLAY rose. Never, said he, Mr. President, have I known or read of an administration which expires with so much agony, and so little composure and resignation, as that which now unfortunately has the control of public affairs in this country. It exhibits a state of mind, feverish, fretful, and fidgety, bounding recklessly from one desperate expedient to another, without any sober or settled purpose. Ever since the dog-days of last summer, it has been making a succession of the most extravagant plunges, of which the extraordinary cabinet paper, a sort of appeal from a dissenting cabinet to the people, was the first; and the protest, a direct appeal from the Senate to the people, is the last and the worse.

A new philosophy has sprung up within a few years past, called phrenology. There is, I believe, something in it, but not quite as much as its ardent followers proclaim. According to its doctrines, the leading passion, propensity, and characteristics, of every man are developed in his physical conformation, chiefly in the structure of his head. Gall and Spurzheim, its founders, or most eminent propagators, being dead, I regret that neither of them can examine the head of our illustrious Chief Magistrate. But, if it could be surveyed by Dr. Caldwell, of Transylvania University, I am persuaded that he would find the organ of destructiveness prominently developed. Except an enormous fabric of Executive power for himself, the President has built up nothing, constructed nothing, and will leave no enduring monument of his administration. He goes for destruction, universal destruction; and it seems to be his greatest ambition to efface and obliterate every trace of the wisdom of his predecessors. He has displayed this remarkable trait throughout his whole life, whether in private walks or in the public service. He signally and gloriously exhibited that peculiar organ when contending against the enemies of his country in the battle of New Orleans. For that brilliant exploit, no one has ever been more ready than myself to award him all due honor. At the head of our armies was his appropriate position, and most unfortunate for his fame was the day when he entered on the career of administration as the chief Executive officer. He lives by excitement, perpetual, agitating excitement, and would die in a state of perfect repose and tranquillity. He has never been without some subject of attack, either in individuals, or in masses, or in institutions. I have been myself one of his favorites, and I do not know but that I have recently recommended myself to his special regard. During his administration this has been his constant course. The Indians and Indian policy, internal improvements, the colonial trade, the Supreme Court, Congress, the bank, have successively experienced the attacks of his haughty and imperious spirit. And if he tramples the bank in the dust, my word for it, we shall see him quickly in chase of some new subject of his vengeance. This is the genuine spirit of conquerors and of conquest. It is said by the biographer of Alexander the Great, that, after he had completed his Asiatic conquests, he seemed to sigh because there were no more worlds for him to subdue; and, finding without no further employment for his valor or his arms, he turned within himself to search the means to gratify his insatiable thirst of glory. What sort of conquest he achieved of himself, the same biographer tragically records.

Already has the President singled out and designated, in the Senate of the United States, the new object of his hostile pursuit; and the protest, which I am now to consider, is his declaration of war. What has provoked it? The Senate, a component part of the Congress of the United States, at its last adjournment left the Treasury of the United States in the safe custody of the persons and places assigned by law to keep it. Upon re-assembling, it found the treasure removed; some of its guardians displaced; all, remaining, brought under the immediate control of the President's sole will; and the President having free and unobstructed access to the public money. The Senate believes that the purse of the nation is, by the constitution and laws, intrusted to the exclusive legislative care of Congress. It has dared to
